Mr. Speaker, one other observation and I have done. The honorable gentleman's form of proceedings, he says, better protects the character of individuals charged, than that adopted at the last Congress. I say no, sir. It leaves it open to a thousand suspicions that no man can ever correct. In that last committee, where witnesses were summoned before them, every member of it had the counsel of the House, and the counsel of the man who was mentioned, and earnestly and honestly probed every witness as to every statement and every fact, rigidly and carefully confining themselves more than they were bound to do within the technical rules of regular evidence; and when the evidence was taken, it was not spread before the country until the party implicated had been notified, until he had appeared before that committee, until he had had the opportunity of calling his own additional witnesses; until he had had an opportunity of recalling the witnesses which the committee had already examined, and of reexamining those witnesses, and that with an advantage that no criminal before any tribunal has ever received; for, sir, we know that the plan which the gentleman wishes to pursue is that of the grand jury, which investigates in secret, keeps no record of the evidence, lays the indictment upon the table of the court, and calls upon the defendant to plead to it. Then the suggestions of the grand jury are whispered into the ear of the prosecuting attorney, and these form the blank unwritten brief for his guidance in the course of the prosecution. They do not hear the sworn testimony before the grand jury; nor have the opportunity to contradict a witness, nor the opportunity of testing the accuracy of the witness's memory; nor the opportunity of bringing into collision his memory at the first examination with his memory of the subsequent examination; nor the opportunity of exposing him to the inevitable contradictions of a false story. I say, sir, that the course pursued by the committee was wise, and threw more guards round character than the methods of the ordinary procedure of the law.

Mr. Speaker, one other word. In regard to the investigating committee, which is to play the part of the grand jury in the scheme proposed by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] what is to become of their record? Is that to remain in their breasts, and are they to be allowed to say, on evidence that the country is never to see, that Mr. A B has been guilty of being bribed, and Mr. C D has received money? And, on the statement of the gentlemen appointed by this House, is that to go before the country, and then, because another committee shall come to a different conclusion, it may be on different evidence, without anything to guide them in going over the same evidence which left the impression upon the first committee, is that man's character to go languishing to a dishonorable grave? Or is there any mode of avoiding that result? Sir, the only course is, that the evidence shall be taken; when taken, that it shall be submitted to the party implicated, who shall have an opportunity of controverting it by new evidence, and of bringing his own evidence; to re-examine the witnesses already examined, before anything sees the light; before it is even hinted that any man's character is suspected; before the mendacious press shall set its worms to eat it, as if it were already dead and rotten. It is requisite that the most delicate of all things, human character, shall be protected; and while I am for investigation, and while I fear no investigation, either for myself or others in this House, I wish it done, so that the man who is clear shall come forth clear; that the stain shall not rest upon the character that every man ought to bring into this House clean, and which every man ought to carry out with him clean; and, in the shape in which the honorable gentleman moves his investigation, it leaves a man who is charged where every man is left who has had a bill of indictment found against him by the grand jury; ay, sir, and worse, for the law still presumes he is innocent. Nobody knows upon what evidence the indictment is found. Only that against the prisoner is considered by the grand jury. Here it is virtually the judgment of his peers saying that they, after investigating all the evidence on the subject they could find for and against him, have been satisfied that there ought to be inquiry; and there is no mode of disproving the accuracy of their judgment. The same witnesses are not called, the same questions may not be propounded, the same course of investigation may not be pursued; it may appear that the same persons who were examined may have given one statement before the first investigating committee and another before the subsequent one. Their evidence will not be published; yet it is the sworn foundation upon which the investigation has to proceed; and when the witnesses come face to face with the party accused, they may deny it.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman from Maryland is proceeding upon an entire misapprehension of what is contemplated by my resolutions. I propose, at the suggestion of some friends, to modify the resolutions by inserting in them a provision that the committee shall report the facts if they find any one guilty. But the point to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland is this: I do not propose that no record shall be kept of the testimony given before the committee first appointed. All I propose is that the testimony taken by that committee shall not be used against the party upon his trial before this House, because he had not been present when it was taken. But I do propose that this committee shall keep a full record of all the testimony taken before it, and whenever occasion requires it—if the reputation of the party, or the justification of the committee requires it, or if there is any demand in any quarter for the facts upon which the committee act in either charging or discharging the party—that that testimony shall be exhibited to the public.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman takes away from the scheme which he proposes everything which is of advantage, and leaves it cumbered still with the difficulties of a double process. The course pursued by the committee of investigation of the last Congress was to take the evidence, and to have it written down and submitted to the party before the world knew anything about it. The gentleman either does or does not propose that the evidence shall be submitted to the party accused, before the world knows anything about it. If he does not, then the charge comes before the world before the facts and the evidence upon which it is based. And when he says the evidence should not be used against the party, because not taken in the presence of the person charged, I beg to call his attention to the fact that the evidence taken by the committee of investigation of the last Congress was not used, excepting by the assent of the party charged, after he had seen the case already made against him, with the option and the time to call witnesses. The member's own preference was that the evidence should be taken and used against him, and if he preferred that course, it is fair and reasonable that it should be so.

I submit, therefore, that the course proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, accomplishes no purpose, but necessitates a double process; when the party implicated might prefer not to take that course, but, to save time, might prefer to submit the case, as the gentleman in the last Congress did, upon the evidence taken in writing, in the first instance.

Now, in reference to the analogy quoted here, and quoted in the last Congress, about the same body of gentlemen occupying the double position of grand and petit jury, with all respect to my honorable friend, he is not accurate in his legal analogies. The committee was neither a grand jury nor a petit jury. We put no man upon trial. This House put them upon trial. We were merely commissioners of the House to take evidence for the House and lay it before them, to see whether the House would put the parties upon trial upon that evidence. When the committee came before the House, the House, if it had seen fit not to put the parties upon trial, would have laid the resolutions reported by the committee upon the table. When the House ordered the resolutions to be considered, the House then put them upon their trial upon the evidence already taken, with the parties before the committee. When the gentleman from Ohio speaks about the same body of gentlemen holding the position of grand and petit jury, my honorable friend is still more inaccurate; because it assumes that the committee of the last Congress found some facts conclusively against the party charged. You know, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House know, and the report shows upon its face that the committee did not claim any power of making even a prima facie case; that they executed merely the order of the House, and reported what the House ought to do. It is the shape every measure has to assume before the House can accept it for consideration, or reject it without consideration. It is the ordinary form every bill has to assume before it is laid upon your table. It is the shaping of the measure upon which the House is to determine, when first brought before them, whether they will or will not consider it; and it is in determining whether the House will or will not consider it, that the House determines the great point whether the party shall or shall not be placed upon trial. Before that time the committee has acted as the hand of the House to write the evidence, in order that the House may be enlightened upon two questions at the same time; first, whether they will try; and, second, when they have determined to try, what judgment they will render.

I therefore, as the shortest way to accomplish the purpose intended; as the best way to shield human character; as the best way to facilitate the progress of justice; as the shortest way to sweep away all the stumbling-blocks and difficulties which the progress of the investigation at the hurried close of the session may throw in the way of what we may then wish to do, move to amend the resolutions by striking out the last two resolutions, and to change the first resolution by striking out all after the word "report," and inserting:

All the evidence, and summon before it such persons as it may see fit, and shall report to this House what, in their opinion, this House should do in the premises.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I have a very few words to say. I know that this investigation—as all investigations of the kind do—will involve time, trouble, and expense; but I am anxious to have this investigation. The charges set forth in the preamble are made quite extensively over this whole Union; and if there were nothing more than these charges in the newspapers, circulated so extensively as these have been, I would be still for the investigation.

Sir, I cannot agree with the gentleman from Maryland in the opinion he expressed as to the newspaper press of the country. I believe that it has a function to serve in a free Government, and that the newspaper press of this country has not yet ceased to serve that function. I believe, sir, you may put corrupt men in this House; you may put corrupt men in the Senate; corruption may crawl and creep along all the avenues to this Capitol; and yet, with a free, unshackled, faithful press, the interests, rights, and liberties of the people will be preserved. But, sir, this charge is not only made upon the authority of the newspaper press, but, as I understand it, it appears in the report made by a committee of the stockholders of this Middlesex Manufacturing Company to the stockholders themselves. I know nothing about Lawrence, Stone & Co. The gentleman from Massachusetts says they are among the merchant princes of New England. But this I do know, that these merchant princes and manufacturing princes of New England struck hands with the free-trade interest in the last Congress, and prostrated the industry of my State. I know that the faith of the manufacturing interest of New England, in relation to the other industrial interests of the country, as exhibited last winter, was Punic. Gentlemen get up here, and tell us of the high character of Lawrence, Stone & Co. I ask, are men to be eulogized in the American Congress whose books exhibit—what? The expenditure of $87,000 to influence and control the legislation of this country.

Mr. BURLINGAME. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is laboring under a misapprehension as to what I said. I did not for a moment attempt to shield the name of the senior member of the firm of Lawrence, Stone & Co. I simply said, touching that name, that I would not deepen the shadow which rested on it. I said that the name—because of the honored dead who bore it and because of the noble and generous living who bear it—had stood, and still stands to-day, as the synonym of mercantile integrity and honor. I do not wish to shield the senior member of that firm from investigation at all. I would shield no man. But when misfortune comes upon a man or upon a name, I am not the person to stand by, or to sit by, without saying whatever I can in favor of that name; without bringing forward what I can that is in its honor. If the gentleman deems that a eulogy on the character of the senior member of that firm, then let him make the most of it. I do not consider it a eulogy.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Well, Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to say at first, just what he says now: that he would not deepen the cloud which rests on that house; but I understood him to go into a very considerable eulogy on the character of Lawrence, Stone & Co. If he retracts it all, I am perfectly satisfied. If not, I am satisfied anyhow.

Mr. BURLINGAME. I retract nothing, sir; I never said it.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Very well; if the gentleman avers that he did not pronounce anything like a eulogy, I must be mistaken; but other gentlemen heard him as I did. However, it is of no account.

It appears, on the books of these merchant princes of New England, that $87,000 were expended to influence legislation. The gentleman from Maryland says that it does not appear but this sum may have been spent in some appropriate way. In what appropriate way could that enormous sum be expended in this country to influence legislation in this House? I cannot see. I do not know. Year after year we are constantly assailed with the cry of corruption in regard to the tariff policy. Over and over again we hear men, who have held position in this country, charged with combining together, for mercenary considerations, to affect that policy, to refund duties on railroad iron, to have a revision of the tariff; and thus that great interest in my State is kept in perpetual anxiety and suspense.

These charges have been made over and over again. I heard them here at the close of the last Congress, when the act of last year was pending. I heard them when I went home. They come now in a more authoritative shape, and I am for investigation. I do not know whether they affect any man in this House, or whom they are to affect—nor do I care. They are made; and the legislation of last winter, pressed upon this House by New England merchant princes, and passed by New England votes, was a sacrifice of the industrial interests of my State, and, with other causes, helped to paralyze the arm of honest and willing labor in that State, so that at this day, and at this very hour, were it not for the interposition of a benevolent Providence in this mild and genial winter, there would be distress and starvation in all her borders.

Now, in this state of things, with these charges made and reiterated, and coming before the House in this way, I want this investigation. I do not care in what shape it is had—whether we adopt the course taken last winter, and which was doubtless entirely satisfactory to the public mind; or whether we adopt the resolutions as offered by the gentleman from Ohio, which I prefer. I want the investigation in the broadest, fullest shape possible. Let all the facts connected with the matter be given to the country. Let it be known if there be a single member in this House influenced by corrupt motives. Let the fact be ascertained whether New England manufacturers operate in this way. If they do, they will be less entitled to the regard of American Representatives than they have been heretofore supposed to be.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman yield to me, to modify the resolution?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to modify the first resolution so as to add to the powers of the committee by adding, "and also to report all the facts found by the committee," so that the resolution would read:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to investigate said charge, and to inquire whether any member or officer of this House received any part of said sum, and the facts found by the committee; and that said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. HOUSTON. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, I would say to the gentleman from Ohio, that I do not think his modification covers the point he seeks to attain. The original resolution confines the investigation to those who may be members or officers of this House. Now what I suppose the gentleman endeavors to accomplish, and what I think ought to be accomplished is, that the examination of the committee should not be confined to the officers and members of the present House, but that the committee should examine the entire subject and report all the evidence, whether it implicated men now in the House or out of the House.

Mr. STANTON. I suppose that my resolution covers that ground.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken. It does not. It is confined in its express terms to members and officers of this House.

Mr. STANTON. It confines only the power to present charges to the members and officers of the present House; but it also directs the committee to report what facts they may find.

The resolution as modified was again read.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Ohio will see that my point is well taken. The resolution confines the inquiry to members and officers of this House; so that it may be that members and officers of the last House were implicated in this business of corruption—if corruption there was—and yet this resolution does not authorize the committee to look into their acts. And while I admit that we have no power to punish those who are not members of this House, yet I think we ought to bring the whole facts before the country by the investigation by this committee, and let the country deal with those implicated as public sentiment may require.

Mr. STANTON. If the gentleman from Alabama has any apprehension as to the scope of the resolution, he will oblige me if he will prepare what he thinks will meet his views, and I will accept the modification.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to enter into a discussion of the merits of these resolutions. So far as personal considerations are concerned, they affect neither me nor those who voted with me. I think, however, from what has transpired since the investigation of the last session, and from what is being promulgated every day through the press of the country, it is due to the character of the House that some investigation should be had.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to know by what authority the gentleman says the facts of this investigation cannot affect those who voted with him?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will answer that, and also any other questions the gentleman may choose to ask. I have the record before me showing the votes of members upon the proposition at the last session of Congress for a modification of the tariff. There has been nothing which has transpired, or which has met my observation, that goes to show in what direction it may be alleged that this money has gone. But from what transpired at the last session, in the investigations which were then had, we have very little to fear from any investigations that may now be instituted. The respective characters of the two sides of the House were fully portrayed in the reports which were made on that occasion, and until this side of the House is assailed, it needs no defense; and any assault that it is proposed to make, is here most cordially defied.

There are some questions, however, connected with this matter, which may not inappropriately be considered. The House will very well recollect, and the Journals furnish proof to those who do not recollect, that there were resolutions reported at the last session, by a select committee, which implicated the character of a member of the House, and that person is now a member of the House. Fortunately, he is not upon this side of the House. And, sir, while it is proposed to go to Boston to investigate what has been done there, connected with the corrupt legislation of the House, it may be well enough for us to turn our eyes and see what is actually presented here in our midst—what we know by the record. In order to complete the purification of the House, and the expurgation of offensive members, and that the whole matter may be presented in its proper form, I send to the Chair an amendment, which I propose as an additional resolution. I move to add the following:

Whereas, at the last session of Congress, a select committee of this House reported the following resolutions, to wit:

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, did incite parties deeply interested in the passage of a joint resolution for constraining the Des Moines grant, to have here and to use a large sum of money and other valuable considerations corruptly, for the purpose of procuring the passage of said joint resolution through this House.

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, in declaring that a large number of the members of this House had associated themselves together and pledged themselves, each to the other, not to vote for any law or resolution granting money or lands unless they were paid for it, has falsely and wilfully assailed and defamed the character of the House, and has proved himself unworthy to be a member thereof.

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, be, and is hereby, expelled therefrom."

And whereas, the first of said resolutions was adopted by the House of Representatives on the 27th of February last, by a vote of 145 yeas to 17 nays; and the said second resolution was adopted by the House on the same day without a division; and whereas, said MATTESON had, prior to any vote being taken on the last resolution, resigned his seat in the House, and thus avoided the effect of the same; and whereas, the said MATTESON is a member of this House, with the imputations conveyed by the passage of the first two of the foregoing resolutions still upon him, and without having been subsequently indorsed by his constituents; therefore,

Resolved, That said committee take the aforesaid state of facts into consideration and report to this House, if any, and if so, what action may be necessary and proper to maintain and vindicate the character of this House.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the amendment is not germane to the resolutions under consideration. It relates to an entirely different subject-matter—to an entirely distinct inquiry. I do not want the resolutions which I have presented to the House burdened by the addition of any such proposition.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The Chair will decide the question of order. I am perfectly willing, however, if the gentleman objects to it, that the matter shall stand as the gentleman has offered it. I do not want my proposition yoked to his unless it is strictly in order. I do not wish to embarrass his resolutions; and if there is any objection upon that side of the House, I withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is not in order. It is not germane to the original proposition.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Very well. Then I will present it as an independent proposition whenever I shall have an opportunity.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move the previous question on the resolutions.

Mr. GROW. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question a moment; I will renew it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I cannot do so. I want to get to the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution affecting certain naval officers, for if we do not pass it to-day, we need not pass it at all.

Mr. GROW. I do not propose to occupy the time of the House for more than five minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I cannot withdraw the demand. I insist on it.

Mr. STANTON. I desire the attention of the gentleman from Georgia. As the mover of the resolutions, I desire five minutes to reply to remarks which have been made by the gentleman from Maryland, and I will then move the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have just now been informed, that, from action taken by the Senate, yesterday, it is not indispensably necessary for us to act upon the joint resolution relative to these naval officers. I will therefore withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STANTON obtained the floor.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Ohio has already spoken on this question, and I insist that he cannot speak again, until other members, who have not spoken, have had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. STANTON. The resolutions have been modified, and there are amendments pending upon which I have not spoken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to call the attention of the House to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.] I regret that the gentleman from Illinois should have deemed it proper, upon this occasion, to allude to parties in this House, and the manner in which they may be affected by this or any other investigation. My position in regard to a question of that kind is, that it is the duty of every family and every political party to see to its own household; and if there be a corrupt man upon this side of the House, I would vote to expel him sooner than I would to expel a man of the other side, because it is indispensable to the maintenance of any political party that its integrity should be preserved, and that it shall command the confidence of the country. Now, the gentlemen upon the other side have some family affairs that they have not disposed of, in relation to the sale of Fort Snelling and other matters. Let them get along with that, and then they can talk to us about their character.

I regret exceedingly that anything of a party character should have been brought into this discussion. But when the gentleman said that that side of the House could not be charged, there was another idea which occurred to me. Why, sir, the cardinal object of these Massachusetts manufacturers was to get rid of the duty on wool, and every gentleman on the other side voted to take off the duty on wool under twenty cents per pound. The vote to reduce the duty on wool was a party vote. They, then, are the very men who are implicated in this charge.

Mr. Speaker, I desire now to call the attention of the House for a few moments to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland. It is claimed that inasmuch as a committee of the last House performed the functions of inquirers and triers of parties charged with corruption, it is therefore a safe rule, a safe practice. It is said that no injustice was done; that these parties had great privileges and facilities extended to them, for the purpose of presenting their defense before the committee. I think, sir, that that is true. I think that it is possible that no injustice was done to any of the parties charged by that committee. I think that they had all fairness extended to them that it was within the power of the committee to extend, without a total defeat of the purposes of the investigation. But the proposition I desire to make is, that gentlemen in this House shall not depend for their rights upon the discretion of a few gentlemen who may happen to compose an investigating committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat. He alludes to a family quarrel upon this side of the House in reference to the sale of Fort Snelling. I want to know whether he means to intimate that any member here has any connection, immediate or remote, with that sale?

Mr. STANTON. No, no, I do not; but I mean that the Administration which the gentleman helped to bring into power and now supports, made the sale, and a member on that side of the House moved for the investigation, and it seems to be a family affair.

Mr. Speaker, a committee of this House, it is said, in a single instance, performed impartially, without any injustice to the parties charged, the functions of grand and petit jurors.

Now, the inquiry I desire to present, (and I regard it as exceedingly important,) is, whether the House regard it as right and just and safe for the rights and honor of members to be intrusted to the discretion of five gentlemen selected by the Speaker? It is said that copies of the testimony were furnished to the parties charged. But, if that was so, was it not within the discretion of the committee to withhold them? There was no obligation on the committee to present copies of the testimony. I desire, with the assistance of the House, to set a precedent which, in times of high party excitement, will prevent a prejudiced or corrupt Speaker from placing the rights or the honor of members of this House in the power of a packed committee, with power to inquire, investigate, and condemn in secret. I want some security against the abuse of that unlimited and boundless discretion which was conferred upon the committee of the last House, and which it is now proposed to confer upon this committee.

There is another fact, worthy of consideration. The committee which investigated the charges presented against members of this House, at the last session, accused one of the four persons whose cases were investigated, with an offense for which they presented a resolution of expulsion; and every member of the committee, I believe, voted for that resolution, when it was rejected in the House by a vote of 119 to 42. The House differed with that committee. Such a committee, acting in the capacity of grand jurors, who enter into the spirit of the prosecution, feel that it is their function and their business to purge the body and to expel unworthy members; and they lose sight, to a very considerable extent, of the rights and privileges of individual members.

I am at a loss to comprehend how the resolutions I submitted complicate the proceedings of the House. It is said by the gentleman from Maryland, that perhaps, when a charge is presented against a member, he will not desire to have another committee. Very well. There is no difficulty in the world about a party waiving rights which he is entitled to. I take it that if a gentleman is charged here with an offense, and does not desire an investigation, he has nothing to do but to say so; let him plead guilty or let him elect another mode of trial; let him agree to go before the House upon the testimony reported by the first committee, and these resolutions, providing for his benefit and protection, will not stand in his way.

But there is another difficulty in relation to the testimony to be taken before the first committee. The first committee should take down the testimony in writing, and it should be kept in its possession. It should not be reported, nor made public without the consent of the party charged, until the witnesses have been reexamined in his presence, subject to his cross-examination, and such other testimony has been offered as he chooses to submit in his defense. The testimony should be reduced to writing, and preserved for the purpose of aiding the prosecution before the second committee.

So far as I am personally concerned, Mr. Speaker, if the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland prevails, I shall certainly feel it my duty to transfer this investigation to him. I will not, as a member of this House, undertake to investigate charges against a member, and report to this House testimony taken in his absence, upon which this House is to act in determining the merits of his case. There are two reasons for it: in the first place, I want, when the testimony is taken before the committee, not to be under the necessity of furnishing to the party charged a copy of the evidence during the progress of the investigation. Their right would seem to require that they should have a copy; and yet the furnishing of a copy may be the means of counteracting the object of the examination, and may set them to work to use instrumentalities to prevent further investigation, and prevent the corroborating of testimony already taken.

I do not desire to be embarrassed with an investigation prosecuted in such form as to prevent me from making a full development of the whole case. I do not desire it, acting in that capacity, and charged mainly with the duty of inquiring into abuses, and not of trying anybody. My object would be to hunt up what abuses and what corruptions have been practiced by any member of this House; and therefore I should not feel bound to guard the rights of the party charged, to the same extent that I would if I were taking the testimony upon which the party was to be tried.

The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] is seeking to gather to a single committee the united functions of a petit and a grand jury; and commits the honor, the rights, and the privileges of the members of this House to the hands of a body constituted at the pleasure of the Speaker of the House. With all due deference to, and expressing the utmost confidence in, the Presiding Officer of this House, I am not willing to set a precedent which, in future time, may work great prejudice and evil to the members of this House.

I therefore trust that the House, if they intend to have an investigation at all, will suffer it to proceed in the manner indicated in the resolutions which I have offered; and that the committee raised shall be a mere committee to inquire, and not to take the testimony upon which any member of this House shall be charged with bribery or corruption.

Mr. GROW obtained the floor.

Mr. PURVIANCE. I ask my colleague to yield me the floor for one moment. I think I have a resolution which will meet the approbation of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROW. I will yield to my colleague if thereby I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. PURVIANCE. I ask to have my resolution read; and I hope the gentleman from Ohio will accept it as a modification of his own.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, a committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the company of Lawrence, Stone & Co., of Massachusetts, amongst other things, report: That $87,000, as appears from papers in possession of said company, were paid to secure the passage, at the last session of Congress, of the law reducing the duty on foreign imports; and whereas, said report has found its way into the public journals, accompanied by severe reflections upon the members of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, some of whom being members of the present, and therefore exposed to suspicions which require immediate investigation: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed to inquire into and investigate said charge, and if found to be true, to ascertain whether any member, officer, or employee of the then or present House were, in any way, connected with the receipt or disbursement of said sum of money, or any part thereof, and if so, the names of said parties, and the facts elicited, of which the parties implicated shall be notified by the committee, and shall have an opportunity of appearing before the same, there to be heard fully—the result of which to be communicated to the House for its action.

Mr. STANTON. If the gentleman will omit the last part of it, and leave it as a substitute for my first resolution, I am willing to adopt it. But I am not willing that the committee shall take and report the evidence in the case, upon which the party is to be tried by the House.

Mr. GROW. On the introduction of this resolution, it was not my intention to take part in this discussion. I shall trespass now but a few moments upon the attention of the House, and should have been content to give my vote for the resolution in silence but for the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS], and those that fell from the lips of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS], who seems to-day to be imitating the example of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKIN] the other day, who paid a high compliment to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER], by admitting in his mode of reply that he was so completely impaled that there was no way for him to extricate himself except by a wholesale charge upon a great party in this country. Instead of meeting the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he chose to make a charge upon the integrity of one of the great parties of this country, and upon every member of it upon this floor. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] to-day imitates his example, and instead of replying to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN], he attempts to cast suspicion upon the integrity of all the members on this side of the House, and like the man of old who stood up and thanked God that he was not like other men, he wraps around himself his cloak of self-righteousness, and hurls anathemas upon the members upon this side of the Hall.

Sir, the attempt to make the course of proceedings of the investigating committee of the last Congress a precedent to be followed hereafter, is an invasion of the privileges guaranteed by the Constitution to every citizen. Why, sir, should the character of members of Congress be placed at the mercy of the abandoned and debased more than that of others? I would throw around them, as I would throw around the humblest criminal in the courts, the safeguard which the Constitution of the country gives to personal liberty and to personal character. That Constitution permits you to try no man charged with the least offense in a court of justice, without confronting him with his accuser. The committee of the last Congress brought before them profligates from the streets to blacken the characters of members of this House, and allowed them, in secret, to give evidence, solitary and alone, to disgrace the accused forever.

Mr. RITCHIE. I rise to a question of order. It is not in order to discuss the action of the committee of the last Congress, the matter not being properly before the House.

Mr. GROW. It was brought before the House by the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. RITCHIE. Well, the gentleman from Maryland was out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair dislikes very much to have that question of order raised, inasmuch as the occupant of the chair was a member of that committee.

Mr. RITCHIE. The matter was fully discussed last session, and the action of the House had upon it.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman [Mr. RITCHIE] was a member of that committee, and if he is unwilling to have its proceedings investigated—

Mr. RITCHIE. If the gentleman [Mr. GROW] moves for a committee to investigate the conduct of that committee, I am perfectly willing it should be done; but I do not wish to have a controversy now on a subject which was fully discussed before, and where the whole matter was investigated from beginning to end.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] will confine his remarks to the resolution before the House.

Mr. GROW. I stand here, then, to protest against this House raising a committee, at any time, to investigate the conduct of any of its members charged with I care not how small an offense affecting his integrity, without that member being called to confront the witnesses against him. I ask that his character shall not be, because he is a member of Congress, held less sacred than that of a petty thief in courts of justice. That was done in the last Congress, and will be again, if the precedent referred to by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] becomes the settled practice. Witnesses collected from your streets, with malignity in their hearts, and who can gloat over the ruin of those on whom they desire to avenge their supposed wrongs, will, in the dark, give testimony which, with the eye of their victim flashing full in their face, they dare not give; their tongue would cleave to the roof of their mouth, and they cannot utter the falsehood. Why have the sages of the law built around every man that great bulwark of liberty and personal rights, by requiring his accuser to be confronted with him? It is because such is human nature that guilt and wrong quails before the indignant frown of innocence, truth, and justice. Therefore the perjured witness on the stand confronting him whom he accuses, face to face, does not tell the tale of falsehood that he would utter in the dark.

Now, I am in favor of the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Ohio; and I trust the House will not regard the innovation of the investigating committee of last Congress as affording a precedent to be followed; for never, in the history of the Government, till then, did a committee, appointed to investigate the conduct of members, sit with closed doors, and deprive the member implicated of the right to confront the witnesses face to face. "Oh!" say gentlemen, "no harm can come of it; no man can be hurt by it; is he not to be tried by the House?" If you take the proceedings in last Congress as a precedent, he is not to be tried at all. The House gave no trial to the members impeached. They were tried on the testimony taken in the star chamber—in the dark—and on that alone, when the examination-in-chief of the witnesses was in the absence of the accused. Your grand juries have no record of the testimony taken before them to blast the character of the victim accused. You bring him into court not to try him on the testimony taken before the grand jury, but on testimony of witnesses face to face with the accused. The men who are to find the verdict that is to affect the character of the accused, know nothing of what took place in the grand jury room. There is, therefore, no similarity between this course of proceeding and that of a grand jury, and especially as this grand jury can do as it did last Congress, suppress a portion of the testimony of witnesses, and then come in and ask the House to pass judgment on these ex parte statements.

I sought the floor, sir, not for the purpose of making a speech, but merely to enter my protest against any precedent being established that would deprive a member of Congress of the same protection to liberty and character which the wisest and sagest of your law-makers, from the time that civilized society began, to this hour, have thrown around criminals in courts of justice. Why should a man, because he chanced to occupy a seat on this floor, be left to the mercy of the profligates who surround these Halls, who may go before committees, in the absence of the member implicated, and give testimony to blacken his character and affix disgrace to it for all time?

Mr. LETCHER obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to yield to me, that I may reply to a remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LETCHER yielded the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. With the consent of the gentleman from Virginia, for one moment, I wish to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Grow,] who has just taken his seat. It seems very hard to satisfy that gentleman as to the manner of the investigation. It is very difficult to suit him as to the form of the resolution. About that I am entirely indifferent, provided the facts are got at.

But the gentleman said that we on this side, or perhaps myself, were disposed to be like the man of old, who stood afar off, and thanked God that he was not as other men. If he means to say that myself, or those who act with me, do offer up such thanks as that we are not as some other men, then he is correct. And if the gentleman will also imitate the example of him who was put in contradistinction to the one who stood afar off, he may with some sort of sincerity exclaim, "God be merciful to me, a sinner!" I have no doubt that his exclamation would meet a hearty amen from every gentleman on this floor.

Mr. RITCHIE. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to say a word now?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RITCHIE. My colleague [Mr. Grow] seems to intimate that the members inculpated by the investigating committee of the last Congress had no opportunity afforded them of knowing the testimony of the witnesses till it was brought before the House. I wish merely to state that we furnished to all the members inculpated copies of the testimony against them, and invited them to come and reexamine the witnesses whose testimony had been furnished to them, and to produce witnesses of their own; and in two cases gentlemen did that.

Mr. GROW. That was after the testimony of the witnesses was taken, that he might cross-examine.

Mr. RITCHIE. Copies of the testimony were furnished in all cases, and an opportunity given to reexamine the witnesses, and to produce witnesses of their own.

Mr. GROW. Was it not twenty days after the time when the testimony was taken, that a copy of it was furnished to Mr. Gilbert?

Mr. RITCHIE. I do not recollect the time; but I think it was nothing like that length of time.

Mr. LETCHER. It seems to me somewhat remarkable, that while two investigating committees have been organized during the present session, my friend from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] and my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] should have both remained silent. Why were they not roused up then, to the necessity of protecting congressional and official character? Why did they sit, there in their seats while the resolution in reference to the late Clerk, and the resolution in reference to the Fort Snelling matter, were introduced into this House, without raising their voices against the enormity which they say was practiced at the last session, and which they seek to avoid being practiced at the present?

Mr. GROW. Will the gentleman permit me to answer him?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROW. The resolution in reference to the sale of Fort Snelling involves no person by name, nor has it any reference to a member of the House, as I understand it.

Mr. LETCHER. Nor do these proceedings involve the name of any member of this House, or of the other; so that the gentleman's explanation does not meet the case, and he remains hampered by the same difficulty now as he was before he made it. So far as the resolution about the Clerk was concerned, a name was involved there. Why did not the gentleman rise then, and undertake to hamper the proceedings in reference to him, by this cry in behalf of congressional and official character? Not one word about it was said then; but now, when this proposition is introduced, gentlemen rise here and tell us that it is a great outrage; that it is not to be tolerated; that parties ought not to be arraigned in secret, and then brought here to this House for final judgment.

Now I am opposed to the shape in which the resolutions offered by my friend from Ohio have been got up.

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. LETCHER. Wait till I state my objections.

Mr. STANTON. I was going to answer the gentleman's inquiry why I did not oppose these other resolutions.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. STANTON. In the resolution in regard to the Clerk of the House, the party charged was named. The resolution in regard to the sale of Fort Snelling was not based on any imputation against any member of the House, or against the body at large. It was not supposed by any man to involve the character of the House, or of any member of the House. It was an inquiry into an act of one of the Executive Departments. We had no power to try, and could not pass censure or sentence on the parties supposed to have been guilty of misconduct in that matter.

Mr. LETCHER. Then the gentleman's explanation is, that he did not raise the question on the one because nobody was named, and that he did not raise it on the other because somebody was named. That is just the amount of his explanation. But I regretted to hear the gentleman from Ohio, who is usually so fair, who may be called upon to pass judgment in regard to this investigation about the Fort Snelling matter, undertake to declare in a breath that there was corruption in that matter, and that it attached to my party friends.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman from Virginia is mistaken. I did not say that any person was implicated in the Fort Snelling matter.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, the gentleman said it was a family affair, growing out of these charges. Now, sir, let me say to that gentleman, that, so far at least as the officer of the Government supposed to be implicated by that proceeding is concerned, I have no doubt that he will demonstrate to this House, and demonstrate to the country at large, that an assault move unfounded never was made upon any public officer.

So much for the present. I want this investigation to proceed. Let the facts come before the country, and see how nearly my prediction will be verified by the results.

But, sir, that has nothing to do with the proposition before the House; or, at least, it ought to have nothing to do with it. We ought to have none of this crimination and recrimination about facts which have no tendency to throw any light upon the subject, or prepare the minds of members of the House for as deliberate action as we might otherwise have.

Mr. STANTON. I trust the gentleman from Virginia will do me the justice to say that none of the crimination came from me, or from this side of the House. It came from the gentleman's own party.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, sir, I thought there was some of it on both sides.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. LETCHER. I will, if the gentleman does not take too long.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I introduced the resolution into this House to make inquiry into the circumstances of the sale of the Fort Snelling reservation. But, sir, I did not, and the resolution does not, cast any imputation upon any gentleman. I feel it, perhaps, due to myself to say that I know a good deal about that matter. I have never said, and I do not say now, that the Secretary of War did anything wrong in the matter. But I have felt from the knowledge I have upon the subject that it is a case which requires investigation; that it is due to the Secretary of War, that it is due to the Administration, and that it is due to the Democratic party that an investigation should be had. I may have some feeling in the matter, and for that reason I declined to accept a place upon the committee. But I signified to the chairman of the committee that when they were organized, I would appear before them at any time they might designate, and tell my story. I think there was something wrong in relation to that sale. But, sir, I said, and I repeat, that I do not charge, by implication or otherwise, anything wrong on the Secretary of War. I say again that it is due to that officer, it is due to the Administration, and it is due to the country, that a rigid examination should be made in relation to that sale. For myself, as a civilian, I think it was all wrong, unwise, and imprudent to sell the buildings at Fort Snelling, and I have no doubt at all that this House will concur with me in that opinion when the facts and circumstances come before it. But I protest that it is not a legitimate deduction from the resolution that there is any fraud charged upon any one. That wrong has been done I have no doubt; but it may have been done as innocently as any transaction which ever took place in the country.

Mr. LETCHER resumed the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that rather too great latitude of debate has been indulged in upon the proposition before the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I should not have alluded to this Fort Snelling affair at all, but for the allusion of the gentleman from Ohio to it, as a family matter which I thought required a response.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the gentleman to confine his remarks to the subject before the House, and he will endeavor to hold other gentlemen who may address the House to the same rule.

Mr. LETCHER. That is what I intend to do. I was about remarking, when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Illinois, that I do not like the shape in which those resolutions are presented by my friend from Ohio. If I understand his resolutions correctly, he proposes, in the first place, to organize a committee who shall be charged with the duty of taking this testimony, and that they shall then report to the House after the testimony has been taken; that the matter shall then undergo a further investigation upon that testimony as a basis, and upon such additional testimony as may be brought forward.

Mr. STANTON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that my resolution does not contemplate that any of the testimony taken by this first committee be reported to the House, unless the party implicated claims it as a right.

Mr. LETCHER. Then, it strikes me that it is a very useless operation, if you are to raise a committee to take testimony, and that committee is not to report that testimony to the House unless the party acknowledges his guilt and presents himself here for judgment.

Now, sir, I prefer the mode of proceeding adopted at the last session of Congress. I think it is more simple, that it is more direct, and that it will be more likely to result in something than the plan proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, in the resolutions now under consideration. Let this committee be appointed, let them summon their witnesses, let them have before them the necessary papers, let them have all the records before them and report the facts to the House, with such resolutions as the testimony taken before them may call for. That seems to me to be the most simple mode.

But suppose you institute this grand-jury proceeding, and the parties come forward and demand a trial: are they to be brought before the bar of the House and formally arraigned? Are witnesses to be summoned and examined before the House, day after day, before you can come to any conclusion? It would seem that such is the purpose. It does seem to me that to adopt such a course, and arraign the parties before the House, would require months, if it did not consume the entire session, before you could bring the examination to a conclusion.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, addressed the Speaker.

Mr. LETCHER. I have not yielded the floor, but I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I only desired, supposing the gentleman was through, to get the floor to call for the previous question; but as an intimation was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] that the tariff bill of the last Congress was the act of the Republican party, I will call the attention of the House to the vote on the passage of that act. Upon examination, I find that but thirty-six Republicans voted for it, and that ninety-eight of those who opposed the Republicans voted for it. Among those who voted against it I find but two Democrats, and seventy Republicans, myself among the number. I think, therefore, if we are to examine into the motives that influenced members in voting for that bill, that the gentleman and his political friends will have to render an account as well as the few Republicans who voted with them.

Mr. LETCHER. So far as that is concerned one good turn deserves another. Now I do not consider the chances are that we are involved, because with the practical illustration of the last session, the gentleman's party—particularly his party ex nomine as the Republican—was the only one that was found guilty.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The only cases which were investigated were those of one or two Republicans. But here the charge is based upon a vote on a bill, now a law, against which seventy Republicans and two Democrats voted. I desire, as the Union and other party newspapers have tried to cast some reproach upon the party to which I belong, to call the attention of the House and the country to the fact, that if there is any wrong, any fraud, any robbery in anything ingrafted in the legislation of the country by the tariff law, that it was not done by the Republican party, but thirty-six of whom voted for and seventy-two against it.

Mr. LETCHER. I will come to that after a little. I do not mean to indulge in this crimination, that either those who voted for it, or those who voted against it, did it from corrupt motives; but there are one or two things connected with the progress of that tariff measure to which I desire to allude—not for the purpose of criminating this man or that man, or to cast a suspicion upon any one party in this House. I desire to offer a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio that embodies my own views, and that, I think, if adopted, will enable us to get to a conclusion in a reasonable time, and with some degree of certainty. It is as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed to investigate the charges preferred against the members of the last and present Congress, growing out of the disbursement of $87,000 by Lawrence, Stone & Co., of Boston, and to report the facts to the House, with such recommendations as they may deem proper.

Now, sir, as I understand the charge which appeared in the New York Herald, connected with the tariff of 1857, it was that the particular bill to which Lawrence, Stone & Co., and those who were employed in manufactures of the same kind, were wedded, was the bill originally reported by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and to which I offered a substitute at a subsequent period of the session. The vote was taken on my substitute, and it was rejected; and the original bill, with some modifications, was passed and went to the Senate, where it was substituted by a proposition somewhat similar to, though not entirely the same as the one I had offered in this House. It came back here. It was considered by the House, and it resulted in a call for a committee of conference; and that committee of conference reported a bill, which was subsequently passed. Now, my own belief is that the bill as subsequently passed was in accordance with the peculiar views of Lawrence, Stone & Co. Their sine qua non—what they insisted on from the start, as I understood, was that they should have free wool. They complained, and complain still, that free wool was not introduced into this last proposition. They complained, also, that there was a reduction of duty upon certain qualities of printed and stained goods, which operated to their prejudice as the duty was arranged under the bill which finally passed.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I would ask the gentleman whether the bill, as it was finally passed, was not supported by the New England manufacturing interest?

Mr. LETCHER. I believe it was, sir, by nearly the whole of them.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I would ask whether the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means was any more favorable to woolen manufacturers than the bill as it now stands?

Mr. LETCHER. It was more favorable, because it was free wool.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. That is not my recollection; but the reverse was the fact.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to the gentleman from Virginia farming out the floor in this way.

Mr. LETCHER. I was not farming out the floor; and it is only civil, when a gentleman wants to ask a question, to give him an opportunity to do so; and it is no sort of inconvenience to me. [Laughter.] While I have high regard for my friend from Georgia over the way, I hope, when he finds I am getting along tolerably well, that he will not put in a word to disturb me.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I call for the previous question.

Mr. STANTON. I propose to modify my first resolution by substituting for it the following:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker, to investigate said charges, and to inquire whether any member or officer of the present or of the last Congress has received any part of said sum, and to report all the facts to the House; and if any member or officer of the present House shall be found to have received any part of said sum, they shall report specific charges against the party implicated, and shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time.

Mr. LETCHER. I modify my amendment, so as to make it include officers of the House, and to leave the sum indefinite; "any sum," instead of "$87,000."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland proposes to amend the first resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, by striking out all after the word "report," and inserting "all the evidence, and summon before it such persons as it may see fit; and shall report to this House what, in their opinion, this House should do in the premises." Also, to strike out the second and third resolutions.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question being first upon striking out the second and third resolutions,

Mr. STANTON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adair, Ahl, Anderson, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Blair, Bocoock, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Chingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Cox, James Craig, Burton Cragge, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eastis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Macley, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ruffin, Sandidge, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippie, Underwood, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Zollicoffer—120.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Coffax, Conins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Pettit, Potter, Pottier, Purviance, Quitman, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Wadbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, and Wood—77.

So the second and third resolutions were stricken out.

The question now being upon the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, to the first resolution, to strike out and insert, it was put; and said amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the substitute offered by Mr. LETCHER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would inquire if that substitute provides for the production and procurement of papers?

The SPEAKER. It does not; but if there be no objection, the word "papers" can be inserted.

No objection being made, the substitute was so modified.

The substitute, as modified, was then agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. The substitute, as agreed to, is designed in its phraseology to stand alone without the preamble. The House has seen fit to transfer the whole thing to the other side, and I withdraw the preamble.

Mr. LETCHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed an act for the relief of William K. Jennings and others, and an act for the relief of John R. Temple, of Louisiana; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

NAVAL OFFICERS AGAIN.

Mr. BOCOOCK. I now move, as the morning hour has expired, that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, with a view to take up the joint resolution of which I spoke this morning.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman consent to withdraw that motion for a moment, to allow me to introduce a bill?

Mr. BOCOOCK. I cannot, sir; this is a public matter of much importance, and I am very anxious to get it passed to-day.

ORSAMUS B. MATTESON.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I rise to present to the consideration of the House a question of privilege. I offer the following resolutions:

Whereas, at the last session of Congress a select committee of the House reported the following resolutions, to wit:

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, did incite parties deeply interested in the passage of a joint resolution for constraining the Des Moines grant to have here and to use a large sum of money, and other valuable considerations, corruptly, for the purpose of procuring the passage of said joint resolution through this House.

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, in declaring that a large number of the members of this House had associated themselves together, and pledged themselves, each to the other, not to vote for any law or resolution, granting money or lands, unless they were paid for it, has falsely and willfully assailed and defamed the character of this House, and has proved himself unworthy to be a member thereof.

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, be, and is hereby, expelled therefrom."

And whereas, the first of said resolutions was adopted by the House of Representatives on the 27th of February last by a vote of 145 yeas to 17 nays, and the said second resolution was adopted by the House on the same day without a division; and whereas, the said MATTESON had, prior to any vote being taken on the last resolution, resigned his seat in this House, and thus avoided the effect of the same being adopted by this body; and whereas, the said MATTESON is a member of this House, with the imputations conveyed by the passage of the first two of the foregoing resolutions still upon him, and without having been subsequently indorsed by his constituents: Therefore,

Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, be, and is hereby, expelled from this House.

I do not see the member from the Ulrica district [Mr. MATTESON] in his seat, and I simply propose to let the resolution stand, and call it up at some future day.

Mr. BOCOOCK. The gentleman had better move to postpone the future consideration of it to a day certain.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move to postpone its further consideration till Monday next. But first I wish to correct the phraseology of the preamble in one word. Instead of the word "indorsed" by his constituents, I ask to insert the word "re-elected."

It was so modified.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move to postpone its further consideration till Monday next; and on that I ask the previous question.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, I would suggest to him that he had better have it postponed till Monday week, so that the gentleman implicated may have an opportunity to be present.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will adopt that suggestion. I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed till Monday week.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to say to the House that the member named in the resolution has been called home on account of sickness in his family; and I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that it would be as well to let the matter lie until the gentleman returns.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. When the time arrives to which the consideration of the subject may be postponed, if the gentleman [Mr. MATTESON] be not then in his seat, and if there be good reasons why he is not, it will then be time enough to consider what ought to be done. I call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. What will be the effect of seconding the previous question?

The SPEAKER. To cut off the motion to postpone, and bring the House to a vote on the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Exactly; I thought so.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Then I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. A motion to amend is not in order, pending a motion to postpone. That motion must first be disposed of.

Mr. BLAIR. Then let the question be taken on the postponement; and I will offer my amendment when the resolution comes up again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri can do that.

The amendment was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the testimony taken by the investigation committee and suppressed, said testimony having been left out of the report of the committee, as printed, and appearing in the manuscript record of said committee, with red lines drawn around it, and being thus designated for omission, was of great importance as tending to develop the corrupt practices in procuring legislation by Congress; and said committee, in failing to follow up the matters developed in said suppressed testimony, and in suppressing the testimony, failed in the discharge of their duty.

Mr. SEWARD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois to let his resolution go to the Judiciary Committee, as it involves a question of jurisdiction; and let that committee report on the legal effect of the expulsion of a member from the last Congress. The question has not been settled. Let it therefore go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and let that committee report on it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. These questions have all been before committees of the House. The facts on which the resolution is predicated, and the entire matter, are of record, and are open to the examination of every gentleman.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman does not understand my proposition. The question that occurs to my mind is, has this House of Representatives jurisdiction of a question which was decided at the last Congress? The gentleman from New York [Mr. MATTESON] having been put upon trial and expelled, can we act on the matter a second time, whether he has been reelected before or since that action was taken?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I do not see the pertinency of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. SEWARD. That is the gentleman's fault, and not mine. [Laughter.]

The question was taken; and the further consideration of the resolution was postponed till Monday week.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I move that the House do now proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, (at half past three o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. READY. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. That subject has been already disposed of to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been unable to find but two precedents in the last ten or fifteen years where such a motion has not been entertained more than once on the same day. In every other instance the motion has been allowed to be repeated time and again on the same day.

Mr. GARNETT demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Bishop, Blair, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burroughs, Caskie, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dodd, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Macley, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Milson, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Niblack, Nichols, Payson, Phelps, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Rice, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Slater, Stickle, Singleton, Robert Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Underwood, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elithu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zolligoffer—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adair, Ahl, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Boeck, Brayton, Butlin, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clemens, Cobb, Cockrell, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Curtis, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Duwart, Dick, Dowdell, Durfee, Elliott, Farnsworth, Foster, Garnett, Garrett, Giddings, Gilmer, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Murray, Pendleton, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, William Smith, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, George Taylor, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walton, White, and Whiteley—89.

So the House agreed to adjourn over.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to adjourn over, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, sir, I rise to what I suppose to be a privileged question. I desire to state that, had I been here this morning, I should have voted to adjourn over. [Laughter.] I was temporarily absent, and therefore deprived of the privilege of recording my vote upon that motion.

DELEGATE FROM ARIZONA.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to make a motion to change the reference of some papers. I observe, by the report of the proceedings of the House published in the Globe, that there was presented yesterday, under the rules, the certificate of election of Sylvester Mowry, as Delegate from Arizona, and that it has been referred to the Committee on Territories. Now, sir, I submit, in the first place, that the rules of the House require that such a certificate must be presented in open House; and, in the next place, that if it could be presented under the rule, it should go to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. By what mode does the gentleman propose to correct the error?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I propose to reconsider the vote referring the matter to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The motion can only be entertained by unanimous consent, inasmuch as the paper was referred more than two days ago.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I want to know what are the facts. Is there any such certificate of the election of a Delegate to this House from Arizona?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It is so stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the motion to reconsider could be entertained at all, it is too late, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. GROW. I object.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Then I make the question of order, that the certificate could not be presented under the rule, and go to the Committee on Territories. The rule allows petitions and memorials to be presented in this manner, but papers of this character must be presented in open House. You might as well present bills under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman, that as the reference has been improperly made, and it is too late to reconsider the vote, if the committee to whom it has been referred report upon it, it will then be competent for the gentleman from Illinois to raise a question of order and send it to the proper committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. But it has got into the House in violation of the rules. The rule is expressly limited to memorials and petitions. A certificate of election could not be presented in that way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not seen the paper, and had not heard of it before.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It is stated in the Journal, I believe, that it was presented and referred.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. By whom was it presented?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. By Mr. OTERO, the Delegate from New Mexico.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. To move that the Journal be corrected by striking out the part referred to, would concede the point that the certificate has been properly presented under the rules. In my judgment, the certificate could not be referred under the rules to any committee.

The SPEAKER. That portion of the Journal in which references of petitions and memorials are noted, is never read to the House at all. It is not reported to the House. The Chair entertains a very grave doubt whether a motion is in order to amend the Journal of three or four days ago, which has been approved.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. This occurred yesterday, I understand.

The SPEAKER. No, it occurred the day before yesterday.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. It is clearly not before the House.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair thinks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. It has not been referred; and to move to reconsider its reference, would imply that the note of its reference to the Committee on Territories was correct and in order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I suggest that the correction be made by unanimous consent. I presume the Committee on Territories will report the certificate back.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It is not before the committee, and cannot be reported back.

Mr. HOUSTON. I presume, Mr. Speaker, that the rules do not permit of any presentation of a certificate of election, unless it be publicly done during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that other papers accompany it; but he has not them before him, and therefore cannot state what they are.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware that the Chair's attention has not been called to them. It is a new point. There is nothing tending to reflect upon the action of the Speaker. Though we can present certain papers, under the rules, at the Clerk's desk, bills, resolutions, and certificates of election must be presented in open House by members from their seats. If this be true, then the presentation, under the rules, of this certificate, is a nullity, and the point presented by the gentleman from Illinois is a good one, which the House ought to enforce; for if the rule be enlarged once by acquiescing in this presentation, you acknowledge the right of presentation of such things in that way, and one half or two thirds of the business sent in may be kept from the knowledge of the House. I regard, in my view of the rules, that what has been done is invalid and of no effect, and that, in consequence, the Committee on Territories have no jurisdiction over the subject. It has not gone to them correctly. The paper is not, and has not, been before the House. I suppose it is also within our province, under the circumstances, to order a correction of the Journal.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What then is the use of talking about it, when it can be done by common consent?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move that the gentleman from New Mexico have leave to withdraw that paper.

The SPEAKER. No paper is before the House.

Mr. GROW. I made the objection, and I want to state why I did it. I have no desire to complicate this matter. As I understand the paper, it is the memorial of the people of Arizona asking that a territorial government be granted to them.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. It is not a memorial, but a certificate of election.

Mr. GROW. I was coming to that. With this memorial may be a certificate of election of the individual whom the people there desire to be their representative. Of course the election was not held under any law, and no man holds that any legal election has taken place. But this is a memorial of the people of Arizona, asking that they may have extended to them a separate territorial organization, and as such, it belongs to the Committee on Territories; and so far as the question of order touches this memorial, I take the ground that the reference to the Committee on Territories is the proper reference. I say nothing of the election; because we know that no legal election for a Delegate could be held there.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am not aware of any such papers having been referred to the Committee on Territories. I have not heard of them. I hope this proceeding will receive the attention of the House. I understand that this Delegate elect from Arizona is an officer of the United States Army. This is an extraordinary state of things.

Mr. BOCK. What question is before the House?

The SPEAKER. There is no question before the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I am not disposed to complicate the question by drawing in any other matters connected with it. I look at it as a question of order, whether this paper, purporting to be the certificate of election of a member to a seat upon this floor, was presented as it ought to have been, and whether, having been presented in violation of the rules, as I allege it has been, that presentation ought to be held good. I move that the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of the paper, and that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will change his motion, so as to discharge the Committee on Territories from the consideration of that paper, and that it be returned to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I accept of that modification.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. That would imply that the paper is in possession of the Committee on Territories. I hold that it cannot be legally there, and what has not been done legally cannot be regarded as done at all.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the previous question.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of order. The SPEAKER. One question of order is already pending.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire, then, to make a suggestion. I understand that under the rules, where a paper has not been presented in open session and which ought not to be received, it is in the power of the Speaker to direct it to be returned to the person from whom it came. If that be so, the Speaker could make the necessary order upon this subject.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. After the record has been made and signed by the Speaker, it is not in his power to make any such order.

The SPEAKER. The 24th rule is as follows:

"24. Members having petitions and memorials to present may hand them to the Clerk, indorsing the same with their names, and the reference or disposition to be made thereof; and such petitions and memorials shall be entered on the Journal, subject to the control and direction of the Speaker; and if any petition or memorial be so handed in, which, in the judgment of the Speaker, is excluded by the rules, the same shall be returned to the member from whom it was received."

Mr. HOUSTON. Then the Speaker can return the paper to the gentleman who presented it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. If it be the sense of the House, the Chair will withdraw the paper and return it to the gentleman who presented it.

There was no objection.

INDIAN WARS IN OREGON AND WASHINGTON.

Mr. QUITMAN. I offer the following resolutions for the purpose of procuring some important information for the committee of which I am a member:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to this House a copy of the report of the commissioners appointed under the eleventh section of the act of 18th of August, 1856, to ascertain and report the expenses incurred in the late Indian wars in Oregon and Washington Territories.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to transmit to this House a copy of the report of J. Ross Browne, special agent of the Indian department, on the late Indian wars in Oregon and Washington Territories.

A single word of explanation. The Committee on Military Affairs have now before them a bill to reimburse to the Territories of Oregon and Washington, the expenses incurred in the prosecution of Indian wars. It is impossible for them to proceed with their examination, without having the report of the commissioners appointed last year, as to the actual expenses which they found and reported to the Secretary of War. This information is necessary, to enable the committee to make their report.

The resolutions were agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House copies of the laws of the Territory of Minnesota, passed at the regular session and at the extra session of the Legislature; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of State, requesting an appropriation to compensate R. C. Murphy, late consul at Shanghai, for judicial services, &c.; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Department of State, inclosing a letter to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, requesting additional appropriations for the northeast executive building; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a list of clerks and other persons employed in the State Department during the year ending June 30, 1857; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, inclosing a statement of the expenditure of the appropriations for the contingencies for the Department of War; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOCK. I would inquire if the House did not resolve to go to the business upon the Speaker's table? If so, then anything except business upon the table is out of order, except by unanimous consent. I shall have to object to all other business unless the House will let me take up the bill to which I have heretofore referred, and have a vote upon it. If they will allow me to do that, I shall not stand in the way of any one.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There are several bills upon the table, and I think we can dispose of all of them.

Mr. REAGAN. I hold in my hand a bill of great importance to my people. It provides for the Government of the United States, in connection with the government of Texas, running the boundary line between the United States and Texas. I wish to introduce it and have it referred.

Mr. BOCK. I want to get a vote upon my bill, and if I yield to the gentleman from Texas, I shall have to yield to others.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the House adjourn. The motion was not agreed to.

The House then proceeded to take up the business upon the Speaker's table, as follows:

GEORGE P. MARSH.

An act for the relief of George P. Marsh.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If there is no objection, I should like to have that bill referred to the Secretary of State to report how much Mr. Marsh has already been paid for the services mentioned in that bill.

Mr. TOMPKINS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The House can hardly refer a bill to a jurisdiction over which they have no control.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to add to the motion to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the words, "with instructions to procure from the State Department information in regard to the amount of money already received by Mr. Marsh."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I accept the amendment.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

SELMA A PORT OF DELIVERY.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 27) to detach Selma, in the State of Alabama, from the collection district of New Orleans, and make it a port of delivery within the collection district of Mobile.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it in order to take up any but private bills to-day?

The SPEAKER. Private bills have priority to-day.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it in order to take up any others?

The SPEAKER. It is, after the private bills have been disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is this not private bill day?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the Chair had called the committees for reports to-day, would it have been in order to have reported any but private bills?

The SPEAKER. After all the private bills had been reported, the Chair would have received reports of other business. Such was the practice of the House during the last Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the House adjourn, and I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

WILLIAM K. JENNINGS AND OTHERS.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 29) for the relief of William K. Jennings and others.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I should like to have the bill read, as I desire to make a remark or two upon the reference.

The bill, which was read in extenso, provides for the payment, in a certain manner, and to certain parties, for slaves taken and carried away by force by Great Britain during the war of 1812.

Mr. BLISS. If my colleague will yield the floor, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will yield for that purpose, and only for that purpose.

Mr. BLISS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at half past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday.

IN SENATE.

Monday, January 18, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. Jabez Fox.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, communicating, in obedience to law, lists of the clerks, messengers, laborers, and packers employed in that Department during the year 1857; which was, on motion of Mr. YULEE, ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICEPRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Nebraska, in relation to the establishment of a new surveying district, and the creating the office of surveyor general for that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SEWARD presented a memorial of the goldbeaters of the city and State of New York, praying for an increase of the duty on gold-leaf; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the town of Phelps, New York, praying for the adoption of some measure for the pacific and gradual extinction of slavery; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Ashtabula, Ohio, praying for the repair or rebuilding of the light-house and pier at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FITZPATRICK presented a memorial of the register and receiver of the land office at Montgomery, Alabama, praying that the compensation of registers and receivers may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented papers in relation to the claims of Daniel S. Ryan and Henry C. Wyley, administrators of R. D. Rowland and James M. Crook, to the reimbursement of an amount paid by them for certain lands purchased of the Government, and of which they have been deprived by the claims of certain Indians thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HARLAN presented five petitions of citizens of Iowa, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Burlington to Farmington in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PUGH presented a petition of merchants and others at Toledo, Ohio, praying for the enactment of a law to regulate and establish a system of lights to be carried at night by sailing vessels navigating the lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of merchants and others at Toledo, Ohio, praying that the act of March 5, 1856, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of vessels in certain cases, be repealed; which was ordered to lie on the table, the Senate having already passed a bill for this object.

Mr. STUART presented a memorial of the Oakland County Agricultural Society, praying that a donation of public land be made to each of the States, for the encouragement and promotion of agricultural education; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of that portion of the public domain situated on the west side of Lake Pepin and the Mississippi river, in the Territory of Minnesota, praying to be allowed the benefits of the preemption law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES presented a memorial of the register and receiver of the land office at Fort Dodge, Iowa, praying that the compensation of registers and receivers may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BIGLER presented the memorial of Douglass Ottinger, of the United States revenue service, praying for permission to exhibit before the appropriate committee, his invention of an apparatus for rescuing the passengers and crews of sinking vessels, on the open sea; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. YULEE presented the petition of Bernard M. Byrne, a surgeon in the Army, praying to be allowed compensation for certain special services rendered under contract with the commanding officer at Fort Gillette, Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BRIGHT presented a memorial of the register and receiver of the land office at Indianapolis, Indiana, praying that the compensation of registers and receivers may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SLIDELL presented the petition of George Frasier, praying for compensation for losses occasioned by the unauthorized acts of Mexican authorities, in the year 1840; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FOSTER presented the memorial of Henry Collins Flagg, of New Haven, Connecticut. The memorialist sets forth that he is the oldest and only surviving son of the late Doctor Henry Collins Flagg, of Charleston, South Carolina; that his father served during the war of the Revolution as surgeon, and as apothecary general from the commencement to the close of the war, and died in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, in the month of April, 1801, leaving a widow and three children; the widow has since died, and of the three children the memorialist is one, Mrs. Wigfall, the widow of Thomas Wigfall, of South Carolina, another, and Ebenezer Flagg, since deceased, leaving a widow and children, the third, Doctor Flagg, under the resolves of the Continental Congress, was entitled to half pay for life both as surgeon and as apothecary general from the close of the war to the time of his death. During his life he never received that half pay, nor any commutation or consideration for it. His descendants since his decease have received nothing.

The memorialist, under these circumstances, presents his memorial, because it is in no other way that he can bring the subject to the attention of the Government. He disclaims, however, altogether, the idea of standing in the attitude of appealing to the generosity or the magnanimity of Congress. He places his claim on the ground that he is a creditor of the Government, and asks pay for an honest debt. He asks, of course, only that proportion which would belong to him as one of the children of the late surgeon general. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That Eliza G. Townsend have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Lewis Morris, and the petition of S. W. Aldrick, and other officers of the Tanpico Mounted Rangers, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

On motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Daniel Whitney, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. JONES, it was Ordered, That the petition of William White, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 35) for the relief of Michael Kinny, late a private in company I, eighth regiment, United States Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the letter of William D. Elam, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of citizens of Mississippi in relation to the office of chaplain in the public service, presented January 12, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of members of the bar of the circuit and criminal courts of the District of Columbia, reported a bill (S. No. 64) to equalize the salaries of certain judges of the courts for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of War, in relation to the erection of a fort at New Inlet, North Carolina, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia; which was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORT.

The Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report of the Committee on Public Lands on the petition of the children of Polly Colgrove; the memorial of W. P. Wright, Mark Sheppard, and others; the petition of John A. Ragan; the petition of Salmon G. Grover, and others; the petition of J. M. Morrill; and the petition of citizens of New York, asking a division of the public domain into farms for actual settlers; and the report was concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HUNTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 8) to provide ice-boats on the Potomac river; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 63) making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 62) to establish an additional land district in the State of Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BIGLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 9) for the compensation of R. R. Richards, late chaplain to the United States penitentiary, for his salary up to the 30th of June, 1857; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

TROOPS IN KANSAS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish the Senate a statement showing the number of troops stationed in Kansas each quarter, since the 1st day of January, 1855, down to the present time.

NATIONAL FOUNDRY.

Mr. BIGGS. I offer the following resolution, and ask that it may be considered now:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a national foundry on Deep river, in the State of North Carolina; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BIGGS. I do not propose to detain the Senate, but simply to call the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs to an important report made on this subject by a very distinguished geologist, now the State geologist of North Carolina, and favorably known throughout the country—Professor Emmons. On this important subject, he has made a special report to the Governor of North Carolina, with which I will, at the proper time, furnish the committee, in which he enumerates the advantages of a foundry at this particular point, as follows:

"Its abundant supply of bituminous and semi-bituminous coals of the best qualities; its vast resources for the manufacture of iron; its materials for construction in wood and stone; ample water power; its soil and productions; and its climate and good water. Besides, it will be out of the reach of any enemy in time of war.

"A railroad is now being constructed from the coal fields to Fayetteville, which would give the United States Arsenal at the latter place easy communication with the foundry."

I hope it will receive the favorable consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution was adopted.

CAPITOL EXTENSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in reference to assigning the rooms in the north wing of the Capitol.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. DAVIS. I propose to make one change in the assignment, so that the room which was assigned to the Vice President be given to the Committee on Finance, and the room assigned to the Committee on Finance be given to the Vice President.

The amendment was agreed to; and the report as modified was adopted.

HENRY VOLCKER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 39) to confirm the title of Henry Volcker to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. STUART. When that bill was up the other day, I remarked that I thought it was important that the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims should state to the Senate the grounds on which the committee had acted. The honorable Senator was not then in his seat, and the bill was laid over for the purpose of obtaining that information. It seemed to me, from the reading of it, to involve some important questions. It would appear that this land was granted by the State of Texas, it being now in New Mexico; I therefore inferred that it was land which was within a boundary formerly claimed by Texas; but that in adjusting the boundary, when Texas was admitted into the Union, it fell within the limits of New Mexico, and consequently was paid for by the United States, the United States having given $10,000,000 to Texas to accept of that boundary. Now the case, as presented, so far as I can learn from the bill, proposes that the United States shall confirm the grant which was made by Texas. It may be right; but it seemed to me to be a case which needed some explanation, and I hope the honorable Senator will state what the facts are.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, the facts connected with this claim are stated in the report made by the committee. By an act of the Congress of the Republic of Texas, approved the 19th of December, 1836, the western boundary of Texas was declared to extend to the Rio Grande river; and by a map prepared under the direction of the War Office, in 1844, the Rio Grande was also laid down as the western boundary of Texas. After the annexation of Texas to the United States, this Government recognized the boundaries of Texas as defined by the act of Congress of the Republic of Texas, approved the 19th of December, 1836; so at the date of the certificate from the board of commissioners, to a period beyond the time of the location and survey of this land, the land covered by the location and survey was within the territory belonging to Texas, and was subject to location and settlement under the authority of that State. Texas was on the eve of issuing a patent for this land—the survey was completed on the 22d of July, 1850—but by the series of compromise measures which took effect on the 9th of September, 1850, this portion of the Territory of Texas was ceded to the United States.

The question simply is, whether this inchoate title does not vest in the petitioner a right to claim from the Government a patent for his land. That, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, even in the case of territory acquired from enemies, is beyond question. This man had his survey, his location, his confirmation, and would have had his patent within a month, had not the act of Congress of the 9th of September, 1850, intervened, which deprived the government of Texas of the power of issuing a patent to protect this inchoate title. This bill merely perfects the inchoate title of this man, who has settled on this tract of land by virtue of the authority of the State of Texas, and has a perfect title from that State, with the exception of the issuing of a patent, and had it at the time of the passage of the act of Congress of 1850.

Mr. STUART. From my recollection of the portion of the report which was read on Thursday, this tract of land was received by this individual from the State of Texas by way of donation, the consideration being settlement upon it. Am I right about that?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STUART. So that there was never any thing paid to the State of Texas. He went on the ground and occupied it as a citizen of Texas, and now claims title under that grant.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STUART. Well, Mr. President, I certainly, not being any better informed about this case than I am, cannot undertake to dispute the propriety of it; but it struck me, on the first reading of the report, and does now, that there was no ground on which this individual should receive this land as a mere donation from the Government of the United States. I did not hear any facts in the report which went to show a set of equitable circumstances—

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The original certificate is dated in the year 1846, and shows the settlement, by one Simon Prado, upon this land, by virtue of the laws of Texas, which authorized the settlement, and granted a certain tract of land to the person who had settled. The laws of the State of Texas required a location and survey of the land. The right of this settler was recognized by the State of Texas. The land was located and surveyed. It is the homestead of the grantee.

Mr. STUART. Does he reside on it?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The present petitioner is the assignee of the original settler.

Mr. STUART. Does he reside on it?

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is not stated in the petition. I am not aware that the present petitioner resides on the land, but he purchased it from the settler who did reside on the land, and whose title was perfect with the exception of the paper patent. The location, the survey, the confirmation by the commissioners, everything was complete at the moment of the passage of the act of Congress. The survey having been completed in July, and the act of Congress passed in September of the same year, there was not time for the issuing of a patent before the annexation of this portion of the territory of Texas to New Mexico. The inchoate title, the equitable title in the man, is complete.

Mr. STUART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in connection with this subject? Does he know the character of this land? Is it agricultural or mineral? Do the papers in the case show?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I understand it to be agricultural land.

Mr. STUART. Do the papers in the case show that?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The papers do not show it, but they show that the grantee settled upon the land and had his homestead there; and this land, thus settled upon, granted by the State of Texas to the settler, was transferred by him to the present petitioner. The original settler was named Simon Prado. I have not the slightest idea that this land is mineral land. It is not in the section of country where mineral lands are found. It is on this side of the Rio Grande.

Mr. STUART. I dislike to interfere with any such case as this which I have not had an opportunity to examine. The proceedings on the bill to-day were had when my attention was drawn away from the business before the Senate; and I would be obliged to the Senator if he would allow me to enter a motion to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to a third reading, and let it stand a day or two, and I will look into the papers and see if I find any objection to it.

I say to the Senator again, that I do not wish to interfere with the business of his committee; but it strikes me there is something in this case which ought to be looked into. If this is mineral land, there is strong reason why the title should not be granted; and also, if it is a grant made on condition of settlement, and there is no settlement on it now, and it is not really the homestead of the person who makes the claim, then I see no reason why it should be done; but if it is not mineral land, and the present claimant is the occupant of the land under the original grant from Texas, I should think the grant ought to be made by the United States. I should be glad to have a little time to look into it, if the Senator has no objection.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I certainly can make no objection to that.

Mr. STUART. Then I make the motion to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to a third reading, and allow it to be passed over.

The motion to reconsider was entered.

PRESENTATION OF MEDALS.

The joint resolution (S. No. 5) to authorize certain officers and men engaged in the search for Sir John Franklin, to receive certain medals presented to them by the Government of Great Britain, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. There being no amendment offered, the joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MALLORY. This joint resolution was introduced at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy, who has furnished the Committee on Naval Affairs with a letter, stating that several medals, prepared by the British Government, are ready for presentation to parties who have gone on the expeditions fitted out in the United States for the search of Sir John Franklin. The resolution is simply to enable the officers and men to receive them.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM B. TROTTER.

The bill (S. No. 52) for the relief of William B. Trotter, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William B. Trotter, of Clarke county, Mississippi, $1,680, in full of all demands growing out of the emigration and subsistence of Choctaw Indians in the State of Mississippi, in the year 1831, under a contract with the United States.

The United States obliged itself, by a treaty with the Choctaw Indians, in 1830, to remove the Choctaw people from the lands which they then occupied in the State of Mississippi, to other lands which had been set apart for them in the West. In pursuance of this obligation, the Government, through its agent, George S. Gaines, Esq., contracted with the petitioner to subsist a party of thirteen hundred and thirty-two Indians while they should be on their way from the rendezvous to Pearl river, at the rate of six cents per ration. The party set out on October 26, and reached its destination on November 12, 1831. It is shown by the official certificate of the assistant emigrating agent, and by the vouchers filed, that the petitioner executed his contract according to its stipulations. The certificate is in these words: "I do certify, on honor, the above rations (23,976) were issued at six cents per ration, and I believe must have cost the contractor twenty-six cents."

The petitioner complains that he was grossly misled by representations made to him as to the quantity and price of provisions in the country through which he was to pass; and of the truth of this declaration, the committee entertain no doubt.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the motion to refer so much of the President's message as relates to Kansas affairs to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in addressing myself to the Senate, on this occasion, permit me to say that I am not one of those who think that the introduction of this subject into the debates of the Senate was either premature or ill-timed. I believe that it was appropriately introduced; that its introduction was expected by the public; and, considering the extraordinary position of the President of the United States, I should think that those who differed from him widely upon the measure which is so prominent would have been derelict in their duty if they had failed to challenge at the very outset the doctrine promulgated in his message. I may excuse myself—and I can only speak for myself, though it is not impossible that some friends who sympathize with me may have been governed by the same motive—when I say that thus far I have refrained from throwing myself prominently before the Senate and before the country on this question, for the reason that I believed there was a greater curiosity in the land to know what other men thought, and what they would say, than there was to know what so humble an individual as myself would say.

Amongst those gentlemen for the expression of whose sentiments the public waited with deep, and earnest and anxious solicitude, prominent stood the Senator from Illinois, and however I may animadvert upon his position in some respects, I must do him the credit to say that in that emergency he fully met the public expectation, and frankly and ably met the issue which the President had tendered to him. So far I accord with him, and as I accord with him on one other point, I may as well mention it at once, and then go on to the divergence. I agree with him in opposing this Lecompton constitution, in opposing the recommendation of the President to force it on the necks of an unwilling people; I agree with him there entirely and fully; but I am not opposed to the Lecompton constitution, I am not opposed to the President's attempt to force it on the necks of that people, I am not opposed to this attempt to substitute force for reason, because it is contrary to the principles and policy of the Nebraska bill, but because it is in exact conformity with them, part of the original programme, carrying it out, if not in letter, in spirit exactly. Sir, if there has been a controversy between that distinguished Senator and the President of the United States, I think the palm of victory must be awarded to the President, and that notwithstanding he was out of the country, away over in England, discharging the high diplomatic duties which his country had devolved on him, I think when he undertakes to bring in the Federal army to force this constitution on the people of Kansas, he shows that he understands the Nebraska bill just exactly as well as if he had been here, part and parcel of it at the time it was passed. That is the reason why I am opposed to this measure. I was opposed to the bill; I have been opposed to it in its origin, in its progress, in its consummation, and in its effects. I was opposed to the planting of the seed, to its swelling and bursting into life, to its spreading foliage, and I am opposed to the ripe fruit which we are about to gather from it. Having said that, I come back to say what the object of the bill was.

I have but one rule by which to judge of the objects of public acts, and that is, by reading them; and thus seeing what their purport, their meaning, their object, and their intent is, as embodied in the bill itself. I do not go to the motives of individual gentlemen who voted for the bill and ask them what it means; and if I were in a court of law, and the construction of the Kansas-Nebraska act was up, and I could bring the affidavit of every man that voted for it, and that they should swear that it was not their intention to introduce slavery into any Territory or State, that would not be received by the court; it would not begin to raise a presumption as to what the intention of the act was. But, sir, you must look to the act itself, to the history of the times in which it was passed, and to the state of things to which it was made to apply, in order to get at its object.

The Kansas-Nebraska bill on its face professes to be a very harmless affair. The gist of it is comprised in these few lines:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

We begin to understand something of the great popularity of this bill at the South. It is because Congress most graciously condescends to inform the slave States that they do not mean to abolish slavery in those States—"it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to"—"exclude slavery from any State." The representatives of those States must have breathed more freely, as Mr. Webster said on another occasion, when they were assured that Congress did not mean to abolish slavery in their States. We had said so individually, over and over again; but, I take it, the public mind must have been put at rest when it was embodied in a solemn legislative enactment, that the Congress of the United States did not mean to abolish slavery in any State. The act goes further, and assures us of the free States that Congress did not mean to legislate slavery into our States. Sir, this was gracious and gratuitous. I do not know how gentlemen may receive it, but I tell the Congress of the United States that when they declare that they do not mean to legislate slavery into New Hampshire, and when the Supreme Court of the United States say they mean to adjudicate that it is there or is not there, I will fling it in their face with the contempt that such a gratuitous offer deserves. I shall have something to say about the Supreme Court by-and-by; and lest I should shock the sensibilities of some men who look with great reverence on that tribunal, I shall preface my remarks, in regard to it, with some extracts from the writings of Jefferson, as a sort of breaking-up plow, before I come with a sub-soil one. I shall come to that, however, presently.

I aver here that the object of the Nebraska bill was to break down the barrier which separated free territory from slave territory; to let slavery into Kansas and make another slave State, legally and peacefully if you could, but a slave State anyhow. I gather that from the history of the times, from the character of the bill, from the measure, the great measure, the only measure of any consequence in the bill, which was the repeal of the Missouri restriction. I know gentlemen say they did not mean it, but I cannot deal with individuals. I must deal with the act and with the Government; I must deal with the purport of the act, and the policy of the Government in passing it. I know no other rule by which to judge of an act but to examine the natural and legitimate consequences that are to follow from it. In discussing this matter I may say some things that have been said by others, and possibly some that have been said by myself before; but the difficulty is, that these obnoxious doctrines are pushed at us so frequently that in meeting and resisting them it sometimes becomes necessary to travel over ground which has been occupied before.

I say then, sir, that the rule by which to judge of the intent, the object, the purpose of an act is to see what the act is calculated to do, what its natural tendency is, what will in all human probability be the effect. Before the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act there stood upon your statute-book a law by which slavery was prohibited from going into any territory north of 36° 30'. The validity and constitutionality of that law had been recognized by repeated decisions of the courts of the several States. If I am not mistaken, I have a memorandum by me showing that it had been recognized by the supreme court of the State of Louisiana. So far as I know, the constitutionality of that enactment was unquestioned, and the country had reposed in peace for more than a generation under its operation. By-and-by, however, it was discovered to be unconstitutional, and it was broken down. The instant it was broken down slavery went into Kansas; but still gentlemen tell us they did not intend to let slavery in; that was not the object! Let me illustrate this. Suppose a farmer has a rich field, and a pasture adjoining, separated by a stone wall which his fathers had erected there thirty years before. The wall keeps out the cattle in the pasture, who are exceedingly anxious to get into the field. Some modern reformer thinks that moral suasion will keep them in the pasture, even if the wall should be taken down, and he proceeds to take it down. The result is that the cattle go right in; the experiment fails. The philosopher says: "Do not blame me—that was not my intention; but it is true, the effect has followed." I retort upon him: "You knew the effect would follow, and knowing that it would follow you intended that it should follow."

But, sir, we are not without the book on this subject, if we are compelled to go to the avowed declarations and sentiments of the gentlemen who advocated the bill. An honorable Senator who usually sits before me, but who is not now in his seat—I mean the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. EVANS,] and I may say of him, what I would not say if he were present, a man in whose heart and in whose lips there is no guile and no deceit, a man who could not utter a falsehood if he tried—in 1856 delivered a speech on this question, in which he divulged and laid open, as his own character, is the purpose he had in voting for the bill. He was speaking for the South, and no man of all the South controverted him and said nay. I will tell you what he said—I shall not use his very words, but I will state his argument fairly. He referred to a declaration of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] and said the Abolitionists had avowed that it was their intention to abolish slavery in the Territories and in the District of Columbia, and he apprehended that their purpose was to abolish it everywhere when they could, and that they would, when they got the power, abolish slavery, not only in this District and in the Territories, but in the States. He said that that consummation was to be reached by an amendment to the Federal Constitution authorizing Congress to do this, which requires the assent of three fourths of the States, and in this view of the controversy, one slave State was as good as three free States, and therefore as a guarantee against the encroachments of the anti-slavery spirit, they wanted Kansas for a slave State. That is the argument of the honorable Senator from South Carolina. It is the truth—no more true after he said it than it was before; no more palpable to any man who would not see after the avowal, than it was before.

That was the purpose, but the bill itself says its object was to leave the people "perfectly free." It seemed to intimate that we had a kind of freedom in this country before, but it was an imperfect sort. They were mere tyros, those old men of the revolution, those gray-headed sages of the Federal convention, hoary and venerable with age, ripe with experience, honored and venerated for their lives of fidelity and of valor; they had but an imperfect notion of freedom. It was reserved to the new lights of this latter day to discover and proclaim to the world what perfect freedom was, and the illustration was to be made in Kansas. I shall trace the history of it presently. It seemed to be implied that there never had been perfect freedom in the formation of any constitution before. I stand here, sir, amid the representatives of thirty-one States, a majority of whom, I think, have emerged from a territorial condition to one of State sovereignty; and I ask the Senators from each and every one of them, if, in the formation of your State constitutions, your people did not enjoy perfect liberty? Was any restraint imposed upon you? In the case of California, it was said that her constitution was formed under the prestige of a military proclamation issued by General Riley; but I ask the Senators from California, called as that convention was, whether, when the delegates got together, they did not exercise perfect freedom, and form and submit to Congress just exactly the constitution which the popular sense of that State demanded? I ask the representatives of those States carved out of the Northwestern Territory, where the great ordinance of freedom, which is attempted to be stricken down, was in force, whether, when they came to deliberate upon the high question of the formation of a State constitution, preparatory to their admission into the Federal Union, they were not perfectly free? Was any restraint imposed upon Ohio, that giant State of the West? Did she inscribe freedom upon her constitution, contrary to the wishes of her people, at any one's behest? Was it so in Illinois? Was it so in Indiana? Has any State of this Union, anywhere, formed a constitution and presented it to Congress without the exercise of perfect freedom? If there be any, let them speak. No, sir; it is not true. Our fathers knew what perfect freedom was, and they exercised it. I have inquired as to the new States, and no man gainsays me. Now, let me ask how was it in the old States? Were their constitutions formed under constraint, or were the people of each and every one of these confederated States perfectly free in the formation of their constitutions? No one will deny that they enjoyed perfect freedom.

Having stated what I believe to have been the object of the bill, I propose to inquire how perfect freedom has been carried out in Kansas. Another term became popular about the same time, about which I have a word to say, and I will carry it along with perfect freedom, and that is "popular sovereignty." What has been the history of the application of "perfect freedom" and "popular sovereignty" to Kansas? The people of Kansas were to have the real, the unadulterated, the genuine "perfect freedom." They were to illustrate the great doctrine of popular sovereignty as it never had been illustrated on this continent before. What was the first step? In the first place you made a code of laws for these sovereigns. You would not let them begin under their own laws. To start with, you piled upon them every law that Congress, in its wisdom or folly, had ever made from the beginning of the Government to the passage of that act, except, as Mr. Benton well said on another occasion, a little short act, not as long as your finger, made expressly for them, and the only one in the whole nine volumes that was made for them, and that was one abolishing slavery. That act you excepted; but you piled upon them every other law you had passed without distinction, except those which were locally inapplicable. You made a Governor for them; you appointed their marshals, their attorneys, and all their officers; you made their laws, and sent the men to administer them. Thus you started them on the great career of developing and illustrating popular sovereignty.

What was the next chapter? You left to them on paper the poor privilege of voting; and having been flattered into the idea that they were a community of popular sovereigns, I suppose they came together with high hopes of manifesting that sovereignty at the first opportunity which presented itself, and that was when an election came off for members of the Territorial Legislature. When that came what did they find? Did a mob go over from Missouri? No, sir. I will not do them that discredit. There was not a mob, but an army there—an army with flags flying, drums beating, with tents and all the paraphernalia and equipments of an army. They went over, took possession of the Territory, drove the popular sovereigns from the ballot-box, substituted the cartridge-box for the ballot-box, elected their own men, and then went back over the river singing their songs of triumph, and proclaiming through the columns of the public papers in the State of Missouri, the great victory which they, by their prowess, had achieved. This was the second illustration of popular sovereignty in the history of Kansas.

If I understand the history of the times, I am not speaking of matters in regard to which there is any dispute or controversy. About some things there may have been some doubt, some cavil, some controversy; but I believe the truth of the statement will not be disputed, that at the first election in Kansas for members of the Territorial Legislature, the legal voters were forcibly expelled, and illegal voters took possession of the ballot-boxes. It is wide of my argument to say in how many election precincts this was done. If it was done in one, that is enough for my argument. I believe it was done in a majority of them; but if it was done in one, all that I endeavor to maintain is maintained by this argument. I believe the fact which I have stated will not be controverted. These men elected a Legislature, and they elected their own friends, as was natural. Having got possession of the ballot-box, they were not going to elect their antagonists. The Legislature came together, and what did they do? How did they carry out "perfect freedom?"

It is said now that the controversy was narrowed down to the question whether they should have domestic slavery in Kansas or not. For the purpose of my argument I am willing to concede that. How was "perfect freedom" illustrated on that question? The first Legislature passed an act making it a penal offense, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, for any man to deny that it was right to hold slaves there. This was a glorious chance for "perfect freedom" and "free discussion"—was it not? I can imagine an assembly of the people called together, and they are about discussing the question of what policy shall be inaugurated there, what policy shall be started in their laws, and the great question, which it is said is the only one that divides them, is brought into consideration, and one man gets up and argues in favor of slavery. He says that it is right; that it is a divine institution; that it is one of those things which can be proved by the Bible, and by the Constitution, and by every other book that is worth quoting. He delivers an eloquent, able, and forcible speech demonstrating the propriety, the expediency, the policy, and the righteousness of slavery. After he has sat down, having electrified the audience and convinced their understanding, some man on the opposite side gets up. He says: "Mr. President, I do not believe that slavery is right." His antagonist gets up and calls on the marshal to arrest him, and put him in custody, for he has committed a State-prison offense the moment he opens his mouth, because he has denied that it is right to hold slaves in Kansas; and that, by your authority, by the Federal authority, is declared to be a penitentiary offense.

This Legislature undertake to regulate the right of suffrage there, and they make the right of suffrage dependant on the taking of a test oath to support acts which I think—as we are now satisfied a majority of the people of that Territory hold to be—wrong and abhorrent. But, sir, they cannot exercise the poor right, not of a sovereign, but of a citizen. They cannot go to the ballot-box and deposit a ballot for any officer there until they have taken these odious test oaths. That is the third chapter of popular sovereignty and perfect freedom in Kansas. I think the people of Kansas, by their experience thus far, have become convinced that they do not want any more perfect freedom; but they would like a little of that imperfect kind which the people used to enjoy before the passage of this act.

The Legislature thus imposed upon them by the people of Missouri against their will, was imposed by force and not by fraud. I exempt them from that. They were no vulgar rascals that went over there. It was a conquering army. Having gone over and thus elected a Legislature, and thus made a code of laws which made the annunciation of the great and eternal principles of liberty a penitentiary offense, the government was set in motion. What was the history of that government? One of lawless violence. Your marshal appointed by the President of the United States, summoned together what he called a posse—not from Kansas, but from Missouri, by his written handbills sent over to Missouri—and with that posse goes into the city of Lawrence to execute some process. After the process is executed, he turns over his posse—he got them together for a very innocent purpose—to Mr. Sheriff Jones, and then the law is executed by rifling the houses of Kansas; robbing them even of the clothing of females and children; the Lawrence hotel is sacked and plundered, the press taken and thrown into the river, and the town set on fire; the inhabitants driven from their homes, houseless wanderers at midnight, without a place to lay their heads, and the flames of their burning dwellings literally painting hell on the sky. These facts, just as notorious as the sun in the heavens, were perpetrated in Kansas, all known to you, sir; all known to the President of the United States; all known to the friends of popular sovereignty and perfect freedom here, in this body, and not a single one of them has a word of condemnation for them. If there is one that lisps a single syllable of blame, he pours out twice as much condemnation upon the victims as he does upon the perpetrators of this outrage.

Well, sir, we go on. This is but a specimen, and is not the whole history. I have not time to go over the whole of it. A second Legislature is elected under the operation of these test oaths, and all these disqualifications. A second time the farce of an election is gone over, and that Legislature, that is to be elected, is about to take the initiatory steps for forming a State constitution, and still, up to the second election, it is a State-prison offense to deny that it is right to hold slaves in Kansas. A second election is had under all these disqualifications—a second chapter of "perfect freedom," and "popular sovereignty!" That Legislature met. They took measures for calling a convention of the people, and, to their credit be it said, they repealed two of the most obnoxious, the most odious, the most indefensible of their statutes; the one that made it a criminal offense to deny that it was right to hold slaves in Kansas, and the other imposing test oaths. Those, I believe, were all the alterations that were made. They make provision according to law for taking the sense of the people and calling a convention. I must hurry over these particulars. The convention is called. It meets in September to frame a constitution. Was it a constitution that was to be framed, and imposed upon the people of Kansas without their consent, and against their will? There were some factious Abolitionists and Black Republicans that did undertake to intimate such a thing, that this convention might form a constitution embodying slavery in it; and that it might be forced on the necks of the people by Federal power and Federal patronage without their consent. But, sir, when that suggestion was made, how was it met? It was met on the part of these gentlemen by an indignant denial. I had not the pleasure of listening to the speech made by the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] the other day; but I understand that he embodied in his speech a written pledge, which the leading gentlemen on that side of the question published and signed their names to, and sent it out to the country, denying the imputation, and pledging themselves that the constitution they were about to form should be submitted to a popular vote.

Under that pledge they were elected; but there were certain preliminaries which were to be gone through with—a census and a registry to be taken and made in the various counties—before they were qualified to vote. The Territory of Kansas was divided, if I am not mistaken, into thirty-four counties; and we have the authority of Governor Walker for saying—it has never been controverted, and the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] called upon the President for information on that fact, which was charged by Governor Walker, and I have never heard it denied—that in fifteen out of those thirty-four counties, steps were not taken by the Government by which the people could come to the polls. The census and registry were omitted. So says Governor Walker in his letter.

Such as it was, the convention came together, elected under a pledge of many of its members to submit the constitution to the people. They met in September. They took the initiative; they appointed their committees; they laid out the work; and then they adjourned. I am not disposed to deny that that was proper: I suppose it was; but there are some astonishing and curious coincidences about this convention. They adjourned to a period subsequent to the time when the people of Kansas were to vote for the election of a Territorial Legislature, and a Delegate to this Congress. They adjourned to November. The election took place in October; and then, for the first time, as the test oaths had been repealed, the people of Kansas, without distinction of parties, went to the polls, and the result was, that your pro-slavery Democracy found themselves in a minority of less than one third. The people spoke, nay, they thundered at the polls; and they returned, by an overwhelming majority, a free-State Legislature and a free-State Delegate to the Congress of the United States.

After this expression of public opinion on behalf of the people of Kansas, in November, this convention, which was pledged to submit their constitution to the people, had ascertained that, if they did submit it to the people, the people would reject it; and, therefore, inasmuch as popular sovereignty and perfect freedom were very good things to talk about, but very inconvenient when you come to submit them to a practical test at the polls, by a people that had already pronounced their opinions, it was thought that the safest and most convenient way was to violate their pledges, break their promises, and not submit it to the people. They did not have the courage or manliness to do that right out, but they adopted a subterfuge. They undertook to adopt a mode by which the forms of a submission should be had, while the substance was wanting. I will read to you an extract from a newspaper, and I think that will show you how it was understood by the friends of slavery at that time. I read an extract from a letter published in the Mississippi of November 27th last, in which the writer says:

"Thus you see that whilst, by submitting the question in this form, they are bound to have a ratification of the one or the other; and that, while it seems to be an election between a free-State and pro-slavery constitution, it is, in fact, but a question of the future introduction of slavery that is in controversy; and yet it furnishes our friends in Congress a basis on which to rest their vindication of the admission of Kansas as a State, under it, into the Union, while they would not have it sent directly from the convention."

"It is the very best proposition for making Kansas a slave State, that was submitted for the consideration of the convention."

Yes, sir, that is what they thought in the slave States; that this convention had adopted the very best mode that could be possibly devised for making a slave State of Kansas, and I agree to his judgment that it was; because there was no legal way left by which a man could vote against slavery. He voted for "the constitution with slavery," or "the constitution without slavery." But there is one remarkable fact, and I call the attention of the Senate to it, and it may explain the vote that was given: if they had adopted the constitution without slavery, it would have been a more stringent pro-slavery constitution than it would if they had voted for the constitution with slavery; and I will tell you why. If they had voted for the constitution with slavery they would have left the seventh article entire; and the seventh article contains a provision for the future emancipation of slaves. This article says, in granting powers to the Legislature, in regard to slavery:

"They shall have power to pass laws to permit the owner of slaves to emancipate them, saving the rights of creditors, and preventing them from becoming a public charge."

This seventh article, if that were voted in, gives the Legislature a right to provide for the future emancipation of slaves; but if that were voted out, it left in the schedule the only provision on that subject; and in the schedule the provision is:

"If, upon such examination of said poll-books, it shall appear that a majority of the legal votes cast at said election be in favor of the 'constitution with no slavery,' then the article providing for slavery shall be stricken from this constitution, by the president of this convention, and slavery shall no longer exist in the State of Kansas, (except that the right of property in slaves now in this Territory shall in no manner be interfered with.)"

If they had voted out the slavery clause, this provision that the right of property in slaves should in no manner be interfered with, was left the permanent law. If they voted in the permanent law, they voted a provision by which the Legislature might emancipate slaves; and then further in the schedule they have a provision that in all future alterations of their constitution no alteration shall be made to affect the right of property in slaves. That was the doing of this convention, and that is called by Mr. Buchanan a submission to the people. Somehow, when I come to speak of Buchanan, I almost involuntarily call him Van Buren. [Laughter.] I do not know why. There must be something similar in their characters. When you come to speak of it as Mr. Buchanan does, it seems to me that you cannot by any possibility vindicate it at all.

But I wish to speak of this provision in the constitution that no amendment shall be made in reference to slaves. I know we are living in a day of new lights. New doctrines are constantly propounded, and some rampant Democrats of the new-light order laugh at such a constitutional provision as that. They say, no matter if it be in there; it is idle; a majority of the people can come together and alter the constitution just as they please, or form a new one notwithstanding that provision. I am not going to controvert that doctrine; but I will say that the State which I have the honor in part to represent used to be considered tolerably good Democratic authority; and in our State we have never believed, and have never acted upon the belief, that a mere majority could come together and amend our State constitution; because our fathers inserted in the old constitution a provision that it should require a vote of two thirds to amend it. The doctrine that a mere majority can alter the constitution, never found favor there. We had, a few years ago, a convention called to revise our constitution, and the late President of the United States presided over it. They submitted a great many amendments, and the people voted on them and rejected them all. They then met together again and submitted two specific amendments. The people came together, and by a two thirds vote agreed to adopt one of those amendments; and thereupon it was adopted, and is part of our constitution. As to the other provision, the people voted by an immense majority, lacking a few hundred only of two thirds, to adopt the amendment; but it was not adopted, and forms no part of the constitution. So, sir, Democratic as we have been, we have never held in our State, and never believed, and we have never had a man there who contended, that a mere democracy of numbers could uproot and overturn and eradicate and destroy the fundamental principle of our constitution.

Let me call your attention to another illustration. We have a provision in the Constitution of the United States, by which an equal vote is secured on this floor to every State. Delaware, with her ninety thousand people, and New Hampshire, with her three hundred thousand, stand here voting equally with New York, with her three millions, and with Ohio and Pennsylvania, with their two millions each. It may be that those little States do not send such able men as those great ones. All the preponderance which Pennsylvania or New York can claim on account of the preëminent talent of the gentlemen whom they send to represent them, they are entitled to; but when we come to the sober matter of voting, our little States, with our handful of men, stand equal with the great Empire State of the Union; and our fathers, in their wisdom, or their folly—I do not know what modern Democracy will call it—have provided that, in that feature, the Constitution never shall be amended. Now, sir, I put it to you, I ask you if a mere democracy of numbers came together, in these United States, and undertook to make a new constitution, and to strike out that great radical, fundamental principle, securing the equality of the States on this floor, if this Union would survive that act a day? No, sir; not a day. This Federal Congress never will assemble after that amendment to the Constitution shall be made. Do not talk to me about what numbers can do. There are some things numbers can do, and some things they cannot do. They cannot amend the Constitution of the United States in that behalf in which its framers said it should never be amended. Our fathers thought the equality of States on this floor was the great fundamental principle on which the Constitution should rest, and therefore they have said that, in that respect, it shall never be amended. The framers of the Lecompton constitution, in their wisdom, have thought that slavery is the great corner-stone on which they can best erect an edifice of republican government, and they have said that, in that respect, it shall never be altered and never be amended. Now, sir, if a mere democracy of numbers may come together and blot out that feature of this State constitution, I stand here in behalf of one of the smallest States of the Union, and I ask you what security, what guarantee have we that that same mad spirit, miscalled reform, will not undertake to strike down also this great fundamental principle of the Federal Constitution? I profess to be a good deal of a Democrat myself, and I am willing to carry out the Democratic principle as far as anybody; but I believe that even democracy itself, sometimes, on extraordinary occasions, requires a little check. The fathers of the Federal Constitution thought so. They thought equality of States was the great vital point which the hand of amendment should not touch. The framers of the Lecompton constitution thought that their great fundamental corner-stone was slavery, and they said that it should not be touched. With this I leave that point.

Now, sir, what had the people of Kansas—sent into the wilderness to build themselves new homes, to subdue the forest, to carry the arts of civilization, of science, of learning and religion, and found and build there a new empire, under the guarantee of perfect freedom—a right to expect? Had they not a right to expect that when a constitution was formed they were to be heard upon it? Had they not a right to expect it, when the delegates whom they elected had pledged themselves that they should have it; when the President had sent out his Governor with instructions that they should have it; and when, as the President of the United States says, he and all his friends were pledged to it? I will read from his message:

"The act of the Territorial Legislature had omitted to provide for submitting to the people the constitution which might be framed by the convention; and, in the excited state of public feeling throughout Kansas, an apprehension extensively prevailed that a design existed to force upon them a constitution in relation to slavery against their will. In this emergency it became my duty, as it was my unquestionable right—having in view the union of all good citizens in support of the territorial laws—to express an opinion on the true construction of the provisions concerning slavery contained in the organic act of Congress of the 30th May, 1854. Congress declared it to be 'the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way.' Under it, Kansas, when admitted as a State, was to 'be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission.'

"Did Congress mean by this language that the delegates elected to frame a constitution should have authority finally to decide the question of slavery; or did they intend, by leaving it to the people, that the people of Kansas themselves should decide this question by a direct vote? On this subject, I confess I had never entertained a serious doubt; and, therefore, in my instructions to Governor Walker, of the 25th of March last, I merely said that when 'a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence.'"

I will not read much longer, but I wish to read this extract:

"The friends and supporters of the Nebraska and Kansas act, when struggling on a recent occasion to sustain its wise provisions before the great tribunal of the American people, never differed about its true meaning on this subject. Everywhere throughout the Union, they publicly pledged their faith and their honor that they would cheerfully submit the question of slavery to the decision of the bona fide people of Kansas, without any restriction or qualification whatever."

Then the President, after this avowal, goes on to say that that has been fairly done. Sir, it would be insulting to the intelligence of the Senate and of the country, to argue the question whether it has been fairly done, any longer. This omission to submit the constitution to the people of Kansas is not accidental. I am sorry to find, as I have found out this session, that the omission to put it in the original bill was not accidental. We have a little light on this subject from a gentleman who always sheds light when he speaks to the Senate—I mean the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER.] He says that this was not accidental, by any means. He has spoken once or twice about a meeting that was held in the private parlor of a private gentleman. There was a good deal of inquiry and anxiety to know what sort of a meeting that was. The gentleman who owns the house, said he did not know anything about it. That is not strange. The hospitable man let his guests have the use of any room they please. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania said this meeting was "semi-official." I do not know what kind of a meeting that was. I have heard of a semi-barbarous, a semi-civilized, and a semi-savage people; I have heard of a semi-annual, and semi-weekly; but when you come to semi-official, I declare it bothers me. [Laughter.] What sort of a meeting was it? Was it an official meeting? No. Was it an unofficial meeting? No. What was it? Semi-official. [Laughter.]

I have never met anything analogous to it but once in my life, and that I will mention by way of illustration. A trader in my town, before the day of railroads, had taken a large bank bill, and he was a little doubtful whether it was genuine or not. He concluded to give it to the stage-driver, and send it down to the bank to inquire of the cashier whether it was a genuine bill. The driver took it, and promised to attend to it. He went down the first day, but he had so many other errands that he forgot it, and he said he would certainly attend to it the next day. The next day he forgot it, and the third day he forgot it; but he said, to-morrow I will do it if I do nothing else; I will ascertain whether the bill is genuine or not. He went the fourth day, with a like result—he forgot it; and when he came home he saw the nervous, anxious trader, wanting to know whether it was genuine or not; and he was ashamed to tell him he had forgotten it, and he thought he would lie it through. Said the trader to him, "Did you call at the bank?" "Yes." "Did the cashier say it was a genuine bill?" "No, he did not." "Did he say it was a bad one?" "No." "Well, what did he say?" "He said it was about middling—semi-genuine." [Laughter.] I have never learned to this day whether that was a good or a bad bill. [Laughter.] They used to say, in General Jackson's time, that he had a kitchen cabinet as well as a regular one. This could not be a meeting of the kitchen cabinet, because it sat in a parlor. [Laughter.] It was semi-official in its character also.

Again, sir, there is another thing remarkable about this meeting. The Senator says: "It was semi-official and called"—it was a called meeting; it was not a mere accidental gathering of a few gentlemen coming in to pay their respects to the distinguished Senator in his hospitable mansion; it was "semi-official and called." For what? "Called to promote the public good." Yes, sir; a semi-official meeting called to promote the public good; and what did it do? The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania says:

"My recollection was clear that I left the conference under the impression that it had been deemed best to adopt measures to admit Kansas as a State through the agency of one popular election, and that for delegates to the convention. This impression was the stronger, because I thought the spirit of the bill infringed upon the doctrine of non-interference, to which I had great aversion; but with the hope of accomplishing a great good?"

The meeting was called for the "public good"—and as no movement had been made in that direction in the Territory, I waived this objection, and concluded to support the measure. I have a few items of testimony as to the correctness of these impressions, and with their submission I shall be content."

Then he goes on to say:

"I have before me the bill reported by the Senator from Illinois, on the 7th of March, 1855, providing for the admission of Kansas as a State; the third section of which reads as follows:

"That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention of the people of Kansas, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection; which, if accepted by the convention, and ratified by the people at the election for the adoption of the constitution, shall be obligatory upon the United States and the said State of Kansas."

"The bill read in place by the Senator from Georgia on the 25th of June, and referred to the Committee on Territories, contained the same section, word for word. Both these bills were under consideration at the conference referred to;—"

Two bills under consideration at this semi-official meeting!

—but, sir, when the Senator from Illinois reported the Toombs bill to the Senate, with amendments, the next morning it did not contain that portion of the third section which indicated to the convention that the constitution should be approved by the people."

The result of this semi-official meeting, called for the public good, was, that the bills came into the Senate the next morning minus the clause submitting the constitution to the people. It was stricken out; but the honorable Senator does not impugn anybody, nor his motives, because he says:

"Who struck the words out, or for what purpose they were omitted, is not for me to answer."

If it is not for him, it is not for me; but I thought he had given a clew to the reason why they were struck out when he said the meeting was called for the public good. Undoubtedly they were struck out for the public good. Who struck them out seems to be a mooted question as uncertain of an answer as that old question, "Who killed cock-robin?" [Laughter.] It has got out somehow or other. I did not see the Senator when he delivered the speech. If I had I should have watched him closely; and it is possible that by some gesture or some shake of the head he would have determined who that "who" was; but we are left in the dark—we do not know who it was.

You see, then, that this was not accidental. A semi-official set of patriots, friends of popular sovereignty, and disciples of perfect freedom, called for the public good in a private room, met together, and for peculiar reasons—that is what the Senator said—they determined to strike out of their bill the only redeeming feature in it, and that was the submission to the people of the question whether they would have slavery in the constitution or not. In that secret conclave, that semi-official meeting for the public good, these patriots put their heads together to strangle at the birth the only thing there was in their bill which ought to commend it to the real genuine friends of perfect freedom and popular sovereignty. Well, sir, I am learning something every day; but I did not know, till that speech was made, that when we met here in official meeting and matured bills and put them in shape, they were to be committed to the tender mercies of a semi-official meeting to strangle and choke out of them everything that was worth the keeping the breath of life in. They struck down, then, that great principle of popular sovereignty—a principle inestimable to free-men, formidable only to semi-official patriots. [Laughter.] So that this was not accidental; it was purposely done; and this, too, was done in the name of popular sovereignty!

Mr. President, I wish to say a word about that subject. Popular sovereignty, according to the idea of some gentlemen, if it ever existed in this country, had been in a state of catatony until the Nebraska bill brought it into life. I have seen some specimens which I thought were genuine popular sovereignty, and some that I thought were spurious. I will tell you one. In January, 1775, the people of that little State of which I have the honor to be one of the representatives on this floor, met together—not in a private parlor, but in a public hall—and they inaugurated liberty and law in the shape of a written constitution, in which they ignored the existence of the King of Great Britain and his Parliament, and formed a constitution for that State, in defiance of legal authority, eighteen months before the Declaration of American Independence, and before any other State on this continent had a constitution. I have heard that honor claimed for Virginia. I have heard it claimed for North Carolina. Anybody who will read the history of the times, will find that, in January, 1775, eighteen months before the Declaration of Independence, the people of the State of New Hampshire, in the exercise of a real, genuine, unadulterated popular sovereignty, came together, ignored both the King and the Parliament, and spoke out, in the form of a written constitution, the great doctrines of popular liberty regulated by a written constitution. That I call of the genuine kind.

Again, when the delegates of these thirteen old States met together in conclave, and on the 4th of July published their ever memorable and immortal Declaration, in which they avowed that they held the people of Great Britain, as they held the rest of mankind, "enemies in war, and in peace friends," there was popular sovereignty of the genuine and the real kind. It was a popular sovereignty to which those men pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their honor to sustain, and for the sincerity of their convictions and the intensity of their devotion they shed their blood like water, and never gave over until that great doctrine was embodied and made perpetual in the organized form of a written constitution.

There is another instance of popular sovereignty in the history of the country from which we come, that I have always looked upon with admiration the most profound. I refer to the revolution which brought Charles I. to the block. The Commons of England, by a resolution, blotting out the House of Lords, and resolved that the Commons of England had the right of sovereignty in them, Kings and Lords to the contrary notwithstanding; and they determined to bring Charles I. to trial. Passing by all the organized forms of law, ignoring the House of Lords, ignoring all the organized forms in which justice had been accustomed to speak in that tribunal, the old Commons of England came together and resolved that they, and they only, were the sovereigns of England; that the House of Lords was a useless appendage; that the machinery of their judicial tribunals was not made for such an occasion, nor fitted for such an emergency, and they resolved themselves into a great high court, and they determined in the exercise of that sovereignty thus organized to summon before their bar the King on his throne. Yes, sir, they said that the King on his throne should come down from his high estate, from his elevation of regal sovereignty, and face to face, before the assembled Commons of England, he should plead like a criminal to the popular sovereignty of England. I have here a sketch of the address that the old President read to the King when he came in. They were assembled in the great hall. Old President Bradshaw with his crimson robes sat on his high seat, and around him were the Commons. At last the great doors of the hall were thrown open, and in marched the King of England. No hat was taken from the head; no man rose to do him reverence. There was no indication that anything but a common criminal stood before a high court. The old President rose and said:

"Charles Stuart, King of England, the Commons of England, assembled in Parliament, being deeply sensible of the calamities that have been brought upon this nation, (which is fixed upon you as the principal author of it,) have resolved to make inquisition for blood; and, according to that debt and duty which they owe to justice, to God, the kingdom, and themselves, and according to the fundamental power that rests in themselves, they have resolved to bring you to trial and judgment; and for that purpose have constituted this high court of justice before which you are brought."

Oh, sir, that was judgment; there was nothing semi about that. [Laughter.] The King undertook to cavil with them, and ask them by what authority they tried him; and the president replied, "By the authority of the people of England." The King caviled for several days. He undertook to play the king; he undertook to set off regal sovereignty against popular sovereignty; and anybody that reads Hume's History of England, and takes it for the truth, will read that the King maintained that to the last. It was not so. When regal sovereignty and popular sovereignty thus came in conflict in England, the King endeavored to play the king for a little while, but at last he cowered and quailed, and became a poor suppliant criminal before the Commons of England. They tried him; and at last they came to a conclusion, and pronounced a sentence on him, which I will read, for it is very brief. After reciting the charges that the people of England had brought against him, the president said:

"For all which treasons and crimes this court doth adjudge that he, the said Charles Stuart, as a tyrant, traitor, and murderer, and a public enemy, shall be put to death, by the severing of his head from his body."

And they carried it out. They carried it out right speedily too; for I think in about three days the proud King of England, the successor of the imperious Elizabeth, of the bloody Mary, of the cruel and tyrannical Henry VIII., of the lion-hearted Richard, of the Norman conqueror William, the descendant of that long line of kings, bowed his head upon the scaffold; and it was severed from his body in vindication of the great doctrine of popular sovereignty in England. The shadow of that great event has rested upon the British throne ever since. God bless those old Commons for it. Liberty is safer to-day in the country from which we came, and the country in which we are, on account of the fidelity with which those old Commons maintained, carried out, vindicated, and executed the great doctrine of popular sovereignty. Sir, they wrote it in the blood of kings on the eternal page of history, where all nations may read it; and as long as English history lasts, all time will not efface it.

When I contemplate that sublime exhibition of popular sovereignty, and compare it with your poor, pitiful bantling of the Kansas-Nebraska act, the only object of which was to oppress the weak and hold the humble in subjection to their masters, I confess, sir, Young America notwithstanding, I prefer that old popular sovereignty of the Commons of England, two hundred years old, to the modern specimen which you are to-day illustrating in Kansas. Let me hear no more of this popular sovereignty until we get something of the genuine about it.

It was not my fortune to be in the Senate the other day, when the honorable Senator from California [Mr. BROWDER] spoke. I believe he joins with me in repudiating this attempt. I think that he is in error in one thing, and he will pardon me for telling him so. He lays it to Mr. Buchanan, and he says Mr. Buchanan is the guilty cause of it. Sir, I speak of Mr. Buchanan, as I am going to do, under a sense of duty. I have no unkind feelings towards him, certainly. In the course of my duty, as I performed it according to my convictions, I had occasion, in the last Congress, to say something of General Pierce, not unkindly, I hope. I told him, what he did not believe at the time, but has since found out to be true. I told him that you were using him, and that when you had used him, you would throw him away; that you had no more idea of again making a President of him, than you had of one of those pages. He did not believe me. I think he does now. [Laughter.] I thought you would be a little more generous to him than you were. I thought you would go to the convention, and resolve to have a majority of two thirds to nominate, and that you would pay him the poor compliment of running him up to a majority of one; but the fact was, you felt so awfully doubtful, whether, if you undertook to run him up to a majority, he might not get the requisite vote, and be nominated, that you said, it is a dangerous experiment, and we will not try it; and Pierce went without even that empty compliment. I told him this on the floor of the Senate; and he and his friends had no more sense than to get offended at it.

Now, what I am about to say of Mr. Buchanan, I hope he will not get offended at. I shall be sorry if he does; but I tell you, Mr. Buchanan is not to blame. Mr. Buchanan is not a man to shape events; he is not a man to control the current of public opinion—he nor Pierce either, nor both together. They are not the men to give direction to the current of human events. They are mere vanes placed on high places, showing the direction and the strength of that current which is bearing our national ship to her destiny—that is all. The policy which Mr. Van Buren is carrying out—there it is again, [laughter.] I mean Mr. Buchanan—was indicated in this country long ago. I have before me a document published in 1844, containing the correspondence in relation to the annexation of Texas. Our Secretary of State, Mr. Upshur, in a letter to Mr. Murphy, our Minister in Texas, said:

"The establishment, in the very midst of our slaveholding States, of an independent Government, forbidding the existence of slavery, and by a people born, for the most part, among us, reared up in our habits, and speaking our language, could not fail to produce the most unhappy effects upon both parties."

That is the policy; the establishment of a free State is a calamity; it produces unhappy effects! This was said in reference to Texas. In no sense can Texas be said to be in the midst of our slaveholding States, that will not apply with equal or greater force to Kansas. You have the doctrine, then, that the establishment of a free State, prohibiting the existence of slavery, produces unhappy effects, and to that policy, that the establishment of a free State is an evil, the Government has adhered with a tenacity like death, and with a directness of purpose that is not equalled by the mode in which the needle points to the pole. There is no variation of the needle there to be calculated. The means by which this policy was to be effected was indicated by an article in the Richmond Enquirer, which said that the deserting Democrat who opposed the Administration on this vital measure would have nothing to expect. There is a simple policy and a simple mode of carrying it out. A free State is an evil, and the public patronage is to be used to prevent it! That is it; it is very simple; and anybody who wants to get the true clew to this whole matter; anybody who wants to get hold of the thread to lead him out of the labyrinth in which we are now lost, will find it in this simple avowal of policy, that a free State produces unhappy effects, and that the Federal patronage must be used to prevent it. In other words, the representatives of the people are to be paid with the people's money to prevent the establishment of free States. That is a fair and honest translation of it.

This brings me to another part of my subject, in answer to a question which the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] propounded when he asked if he was to be read out of the party for a difference on this point. I have great regard for the sagacity of that honorable Senator, but I confess it was a little shaken when he asked that question: is a man to be read out of the party for departing from the President on this great cardinal point? Why, sir, he asks is a man who differs from the President on the Pacific railroad to go out of the party? Oh no, he may stay. If he differs on Central America, very good; take the first seat if you please. You may differ with the President on anything and everything but one, and that is this sentiment, which I shall read; Mr. Buchanan shall speak his own creed. On the 19th of August, 1842, in the Senate, Mr. Buchanan used this language:

"I might here repeat what I have said on a former occasion"— you see it was so important he must repeat it—"that all Christendom"—

—"is leagued against the South upon this question of domestic slavery."

All Christendom includes a great many people. If that be true, and if you have got any allies, it is manifest they must be outside of Christendom, [laughter,] because Mr. Buchanan says all Christendom is against you; but still he leaves you some allies, and you will see—it is as plain as demonstration can make it—that your allies are not included in Christendom. Where are the allies? I will read the next sentence:

"They have no other allies to sustain their constitutional rights except the Democracy of the North."

There is a fight for you: all Christendom on one side, and the Democracy of the North on the other. [Laughter.] That is not my version; it is Mr. Buchanan's. That is the way he backs his friends; for he went on, after having made this avowal, to claim peculiar consideration from southern gentlemen, and intimated that he might speak a little more freely, having previously indorsed them so highly as this. Well, sir, when all Christendom was on one side, and the Democracy of the North on the other, and the Democracy of the North growing less and less every day—a small minority in the New England States—how could the Senator from Illinois be so unkind, or how could he doubt, if, on this vital question he deserted the Democracy and went over to Christendom, [laughter,] as to how the question would be answered whether he was to be read out of the party? Read out, sir! That question was settled long ago. On this great vital question he is out of the party.

I would not say anything unkind to that Senator, nor would I say anything uncourteous in the world; but my experience in the country life of New England does present to my mind an illustration which I know he will excuse me if I give it. A neighbor of mine had a very valuable horse. The horse was taken sick, and he tried all the ways in the world to cure him, but it was of no avail. The horse grew worse daily. At last one of his neighbors said: "What are you going to do with the horse?" "I do not know," was the reply; "but I think I shall have to kill him." "Well," said the other, "he does not want much killing." [Laughter.] You see, in ordinary times, and on ordinary questions, a little wavering might be indulged; but when it is on one question, and a great vital question, and all Christendom is on one side, and the northern Democracy on the other, to go over from the ranks of the Democracy to swell the swollen ranks of Christendom, and then ask if he is to be read out! I leave that point. [Laughter.]

I have said nearly as much as I propose to say on this part of the subject, and I come now to another branch of it. The tribunal which holds its session under us, seeing the unequal nature of this contest—seeing all Christendom on one side, and the Democracy on the other, with a magnanimity and chivalry which is uncalculating and generous, have thrown themselves into the breach on the side of the Democracy. I mean the Supreme Court of the United States. I believe they have a rule in that court—and my honorable friend from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] will correct me if I am wrong in it—by which they will not allow anybody arguing a case before them to speak disrespectfully of any other branch of the Government. That is so. I believe we have not got any such rule here, and I am going to say of the Supreme Court that which truth and justice demand of me to say. I shall hold them as our fathers held the King of Great Britain—"enemies in war, and in peace friends." I was brought up with a hereditary respect for courts, but I have got rid of it. I began to get rid of it before I came here, but the process has been going on very fast ever since. The Supreme Court of the United States, in a decision which they have recently made, have come down from their place, and thrown themselves into the political arena, and have attempted to throw the sanction of their names in support of doctrines that can neither be sustained by authority nor by history; and I propose to show it. To prove that I do not speak altogether without the book on this subject, I wish to read to you from the opinions of Thomas Jefferson on this very Supreme Court, to show you that I am not the first man who has entertained doubts upon this point. Mr. Jefferson, in a letter to Judge Roane, dated Poplar Forest, September 6, 1819, says:

"In denying the right they usurp of exclusively explaining the Constitution, I go further than you do, if I understand rightly your quotation from the Federalist, of an opinion that 'the judiciary is the last resort in relation to the other departments of the Government, but not in relation to the rights of the parties to the compact under which the judiciary is derived.' If this opinion be sound, then, indeed, is our Constitution a complete felo de se. For, intending to establish three departments, coordinate and independent, that they might check and balance one another, it has given, according to this opinion, to one of them alone the right to prescribe rules for the government of the others, and to that one, too, which is unelected by and independent of the nation."

"The Constitution, on this hypothesis, is a mere thing of wax, in the hands of the judiciary, which they may twist and shape into any form they please. It should be remembered, as an axiom of eternal truth in politics, that whatever power in any Government is independent, is absolute also; in theory only at first, while the spirit of the people is up, but in practice as fast as that relaxes. Independence can be trusted nowhere but with the people in mass. They are inherently independent of all but moral law. My construction of the Constitution is very different from that you quote. It is, that each department is truly independent of the others, and has an equal right to decide for itself what is the meaning of the Constitution in the cases submitted to its action, and especially where it is to act ultimately and without appeal. I will explain myself by examples, which, having occurred while I was in office, are better known to me, and the principles which governed them."

Again, on the 28th September, 1820, in writing to Mr. Jarvis, from Monticello, he says:

"You seem, in pages 84 and 148, to consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions—a very dangerous doctrine indeed, and one which would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy. Our judges are as honest as other men, and not more so. They have, with others, the same passions for party, for power, and the privilege of their corps. Their maxim is—'boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem,' and their power the more dangerous as they are in office for life, and not responsible, as the other functionaries are, to the elective control. The Constitution has erected no such single tribunal, knowing that, to whatever hands confided, with the corruptions of time and party, its members would become despots."

Again, writing to Thomas Ritchie, on the 25th of December, 1820, he says:

"The judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working under ground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric. They are construing our Constitution from a coordination of a general and special Government to a general and supreme one alone."

Again, in a letter to Archibald Thweat, dated Monticello, January 19, 1821, he says:

"The legislative and executive branches may sometimes err, but elections and dependence will bring them to rights. The judiciary branch is the instrument which, working like gravity, without intermission, is to press us at last into one consolidated mass."

In a letter to Mr. Hammond, dated the 18th of August, 1821, Mr. Jefferson says:

"It has long, however, been my opinion, and I have never shrunk from its expression, (although I do not choose to put it into a newspaper, nor, like a Priam in armor, offer myself its champion,) that the germ of dissolution of our Federal Government is in the constitution of the Federal judiciary—an irresponsible body, (for impeachment is scarcely a scare-crow,) working like gravity by night and by day, gaining a little to day and a little to-morrow, and advancing its noiseless step like a thief, over the field of jurisdiction, until all shall be usurped from the States, and the Government of all be consolidated into one."

I might stand here and read to you for a long time extracts from Jefferson, of the same character. Indeed, I have marked some others, which I may possibly, if I have this speech printed, embody in it.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator tell us from what volume of Jefferson's works he is reading?

Mr. HALE. I cannot. I give the dates of the letters.

Mr. BROWN. What is the volume in your hand?

Mr. HALE. This is a little volume I got up for this occasion.

Mr. BROWN. That is an edition of HALE's works. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; this is an edition of HALE's works. I have another authority, which, I have no doubt, will sound with more force to some, as Mr. Jefferson does not belong to Young America. This is in the same book, and the extract is to be found in the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, vol. 29, page 347. Mr. TOOMBS said:

"The only difficulty on this point has arisen from some decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is true, they have talked vaguely about the doctrine of the general sovereignty of the Federal Government. I attach but little importance to the political views of that tribunal. It is a safe depository of personal rights; but I believe there has been no assumption of political power by this Government which it has not vindicated and found somewhere."

It was the opinion of that distinguished Senator that no assumption of political power by this Government had ever occurred which the Supreme Court had not vindicated and found somewhere. I think if that honorable Senator were to review this subject now, with the increasing light of history, he would find, at least, one exercise of power by this Government which the Supreme Court of the United States have not vindicated, and have not found somewhere, though I think almost anybody else can find it everywhere, and that is the power which was exercised prior to the Constitution, and under the Constitution down to the present time, and in force while I speak, on your statute-book to prohibit slavery in the Territories. That is an assumption of political power which the Supreme Court of the United States have not found anywhere. While, as the distinguished Senator from Georgia says, there is no assumption of political power by the Government which that court have not vindicated, I tell him whenever this Government has undertaken to act in the slightest degree in the exercise of its constitutional authority to limit or restrain slavery, the Supreme Court have not found a place anywhere where it could be vindicated or sustained.

Mr. TOOMBS. That was true when uttered, but it is not so now.

Mr. HALE. The honorable Senator says it was historically true when it was uttered, but it is not true now. Well, it was not uttered a great while ago. They must have had a very sudden conversion, for the speech is not three years old.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Dred Scott decision has been made since that.

Mr. HALE. The Senator admits everything I said. I have not put before the Senate the position of these two illustrious names, one dead and the other living—Jefferson and Toombs—because I want to invoke the sanction of their names to cover my opinion; but I want to throw them out, so that those who are not advised upon the matter may not think I am the first man who has ever attempted to lift that silver vail with which this "vailed prophet"—the Supreme Court—hides the hideousness of its features. Having said thus much, I come to the work. It is that very Dred Scott case that I am coming to.

There are two positions, and but two, in this decision which I am going to examine. The Supreme Court of the United States have declared that the right to hold slaves, and to trade in slaves, was universally recognized in England and in this country at the time of the American Revolution and the adoption of the Federal Constitution. That matter is so distinctly set forth that I will send to the Chair an extract, and ask the Secretary to read it.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

"In the opinion of the court, the legislation and histories of the times, and the language used in the Declaration of Independence, show that neither the class of persons who had been imported as slaves, nor their descendants, whether they had become free or not, were then acknowledged as a part of the people, nor intended to be included in the general words used in that memorable instrument."

"It is difficult at this day to realize the state of public opinion, in relation to that unfortunate race, which prevailed in the civilized and enlightened portions of the world at the time of the Declaration of Independence, and when the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted. But the public history of every European nation displays it in a manner too plain to be mistaken."

"They had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; and so far inferior, that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect; and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit. He was bought and sold, and treated as an ordinary article of merchandise and traffic, whenever a profit could be made by it. This opinion was at that time fixed and universal in the civilized portion of the white race. It was regarded as an axiom in morals, as well as in politics, which no one thought of disputing, or supposed to be open to dispute; and men in every grade and position in society daily and habitually acted upon it in their private pursuits, as well as in matters of public concern, without doubting for a moment the correctness of this opinion.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 21.

"And in no nation was this opinion more firmly fixed or more uniformly acted upon than by the English Government and English people. They not only seized them on the coast of Africa, and sold them or held them in slavery for their own use; but they took them as ordinary articles of merchandise to every country where they could make a profit on them, and were far more extensively engaged in this commerce than any other nation in the world.

"The opinion thus entertained and acted upon in England, was naturally impressed upon the colonies they founded on this side of the Atlantic. And, accordingly, a negro of the African race was regarded by them as an article of property, and held and bought and sold as such, in every one of the thirteen colonies which united in the Declaration of Independence, and afterwards formed the Constitution of the United States. The slaves were more or less numerous in the different colonies, as slave labor was found more or less profitable; but no one seems to have doubted the correctness of the prevailing opinion of the time."

Mr. SEWARD. With the leave of the honorable Senator, I perceive that he is not through with his argument, and not likely to be very soon, and yet I suppose he is on a point where it will be convenient to stop; and as the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has expressed a desire to have an executive session to-day, I will, if the honorable Senator from New Hampshire has no objection, or if it is perfectly convenient to him, move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, January 18, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. R. Eckard.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

CHARGES OF CORRUPTION.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed Messrs. STANTON, MOORE, KUNKEL of Pennsylvania, WRIGHT of Georgia, and RUSSELL, a special committee to investigate the matter of the alleged corruption of members or officers of the last Congress, in the disbursement of the item of $87,000, charged in the books of Lawrence, Stone & Co., of Boston, in connection with the passage of the tariff law of 1857.

COLUMBIA DEAF AND DUMB INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER announced the business first in order to be the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, to suspend the rules for the purpose of his introducing the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of the old Hall of the House of Representatives be allowed, on Friday evening next, to the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind, incorporated by Congress at its last session, for an exhibition of the progress made by the pupils of that institution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to modify the resolution by substituting Thursday instead of Friday; and I would say that the Hall has been heretofore granted for similar purposes.

Mr. GRANGER. I hope the House will allow me to present a petition of a very interesting character, and to have it referred. I hope it will be allowed to be read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let it go in under the rules.

Mr. GRANGER. It is very brief and very interesting. I presume nobody will object if they will hear it read.

Mr. LETCHER. I object. Let it go in under the rules.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. What has become of the resolution of the gentleman from Maine?

The SPEAKER. It is pending before the House.

The question was taken; and there were, on a division, ayes 106, noes 25.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; only sixteen members voting therefor.

So the rules were suspended; and the resolution was introduced.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call for the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was taken; and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

TEXAS BOUNDARY.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask leave of the House to introduce a bill for reference. I desire to state that it is a bill providing for the running and marking of the boundary line between the State of Texas and the territories of the United States. There is a boundary of some eight hundred miles in length between the territories of the United States and the territory of Texas, which is an open boundary. The people of Texas are locating their land certificates on the territory of Texas, and disputes have arisen among themselves as to whether they may not be encroaching on the territories of the United States. There are other points of view showing the necessity for the passage of this bill; but I think that this of itself is sufficient to show the great importance of having this boundary line run.

Mr. GROW. I do not wish to object to the bill of the gentleman from Texas; but, if we pursue the regular order of business, every gentleman who has bills to introduce can have them introduced. If we allow one or another gentleman to present bills in this way, we will never get to the regular order of business, and one half of the bills cannot be presented. I, therefore, object.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask a single question. I understand that this is a simple proposition to introduce a bill for reference to a committee?

Mr. REAGAN. It is for reference only.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill as follows:

A bill to authorize the President of the United States, in conjunction with the State of Texas, to run and mark the boundary lines between the territories of the United States and the State of Texas.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I do not know that there is any objection to this bill; but I suppose there is no reason why the rules should be suspended for the purpose of allowing it to be introduced. There are hundreds of other bills in the House, to be introduced, for which there is just as much necessity.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask leave to make one additional explanation.

Mr. HARLAN. I object.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 78, noes 71.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to call up a motion made by me on the 5th of January last, to reconsider the vote by which certain bills from the Court of Claims were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Court of Claims bill, No. 44, for the relief of Jane Smith, of the county of Clermont, Ohio, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I have but a word to say on the subject. I did not understand the matter at the time these bills were referred, on motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, or I should have objected. Under the rules of the House they ought to have been referred to the Committee of Claims. That committee is organized for the express purpose of examining into this class of business. It is composed of lawyers. They have no doubt adopted certain rules by which they will be enabled to give to the reports from the Court of Claims, the speedy, minute, and thorough consideration which they deserve. The rest of the bills from the Court of Claims have gone to that committee, and there is no reason why these bills should not take the usual course. I call for the previous question.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Will the gentleman withdraw the call for the previous question to allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will for that purpose.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman cannot withdraw the call for the previous question and still retain the floor. The gentleman had concluded his speech when he called the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not of the opinion that it is strictly in order, although it has been the practice of the House for gentlemen to withdraw the call for the previous question to answer a question which may be propounded.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Ohio had concluded his remarks before he called for the previous question; and now when he withdraws the call for the previous question, he loses the floor altogether.

Mr. GREENWOOD. In order to relieve the Chair from the difficulty created by the question of order, if the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw the call for the previous question, I will promise to renew it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I withdraw the call for the previous question on condition that the gentleman from Arkansas will renew it before he takes his seat.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do not desire to interfere with this motion in any shape or any form. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if there is not an express rule of the House requiring all bills from the Court of Claims to be referred to the Committee of Claims?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Such is the fact. The 154th rule requires that all these bills shall be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. GREENWOOD. That being the case, I think an improper direction has been given to these bills by the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] and that there can be no objection to the motion to reconsider, in order that they may have a proper reference. I call for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Is it in order to submit that motion pending a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is. A motion to suspend the rules would have the effect to suspend this rule of privilege, as well as the other rules of the House.

Mr. COMINS. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withhold his motion for a single moment. The bark Jehu, owned by Daniel Draper & Son, of Boston, is now lying in New York harbor, waiting only for the passage of a bill upon the Speaker's table authorizing the issue of a register. I hope that bill will be taken up at this time, and passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I insist on my motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Is it in order, pending one motion to suspend the rules, for another similar motion to take precedence?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio is to reconsider a vote of the House, and not to suspend the rules.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to go into committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 89, nays 98; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Bishop, Boeck, Branch, Burnett, Caskie, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochran, Cockrell, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Edie, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hickman, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, McClay, Samuel S. Marshall, Millson, Montgomery, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ruffin, Russell, Seales, Scott, Seating, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, Whiteley, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Barksdale, Bennett, Bingham, Bingham, Bliss, Boyce, Brayton, Rufinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochran, Coffax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hatch, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miller, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Sandidge, John Sherman, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwallader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Woodson—98.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Pending the call of the roll—

Mr. HICKMAN stated that his colleague, Mr. CHAPMAN, was confined to his room, and had been for a week, by indisposition.

The motion to lay upon the table was disagreed to; and the question recurred on the motion to reconsider, on which the previous question had been demanded.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the vote referring the bill to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions was reconsidered.

The question recurring upon the motion to refer to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions—

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I now call up the next motion to reconsider upon the Calendar, which is to reconsider a vote by which a bill (C. C. No. 45) for the relief of Lucinda Robinson, of the county of Orleans, State of Vermont, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. It is a case of exactly the same character as the previous one. I will merely remark that this is a matter in which I have no particular feeling. There are a great many cases of this kind—I forget how many, but I suppose a thousand or so, judging from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, at the present session—and the pensions for the time covered by the decision of the Court of Claims, involve some two million dollars. The question involved is purely a question of pensions, and that of a particular class—the widows of revolutionary soldiers. As it was a question of that character, and as all questions of that sort had heretofore gone to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and as that committee was organized with a view to the investigation of such questions, it did seem to me that it was the proper and the most appropriate committee to investigate the decision which the Court of Claims has made.

And, sir, when I made the proposition in the House to change the reference to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions from the Committee of Claims, it was unanimously agreed to. Though the rule required them to go to the Committee of Claims, I supposed that unanimous consent, or a suspension of the rules, would leave the House free to give them whatever direction they thought proper. But, if it is the opinion of the House that the Committee of Claims, already, perhaps, burdened with the amount of business referred to it, shall also be charged with the investigation of this subject, I, sir, having, as I said before, no particular feeling on the subject, shall not further resist the action of the House upon the question.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will not reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, but I ask that, by general consent, all the bills upon the Calendar, of the same character, and standing in the same position, may take the same reference.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let us have them one at a time.

The question was then taken upon the motion to reconsider; and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was next stated upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (C. C. No. 46) for the relief of Hannah Weaver, of Wayne county, Pennsylvania, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask for a division of the question.

Mr. WARREN. Has the previous question been ordered upon the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. WARREN. I simply desire to say that, feeling an interest, as I always do, in widows, I hope this motion will not prevail.

[A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, was here received, at the hands of JAMES BUCHANAN HENRY, the President's Private Secretary.]

Mr. WARREN. I was induced to make the remark I did by one which fell from the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] He said that these claims—I know nothing of their character—were in favor of a class of widows, and I am therefore induced to take the same "shute" that the gentleman does in their behalf, because I know he has a very high regard for widows, and I know there is reason why he should appreciate them, as also my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE.] I hope, therefore, this motion to reconsider will not prevail, but that they will be permitted to take the course indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] and the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] who have a special consideration for widows.

Mr. FLORENCE. Since the remarks made by the gentleman upon the other side, and since I made the demand for a division of the House, I have changed my opinion, and for the reason given by the gentleman from Arkansas. I am kindly disposed to widows, and especially to widows of revolutionary soldiers; and I am willing to assist them to the extent of my power and the influence of my vote in this House. I shall now vote to reconsider the vote by which this bill was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, with the view of referring it to the Committee of Claims, for the reason that I think this course will best attain the purpose in view. The Committee of Claims can report at any time, while the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions can report only when the committees are called. These widows will get the earliest hearing by referring the bills to the Committee of Claims, and therefore I am in favor of the motion to reconsider. I desire not to detain the House longer with giving reasons which influence my action, such as those of generosity, humanity, &c., because everybody understands that those are the considerations I have in view in everything I do in this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. Here is a committee that is specially charged with the consideration of revolutionary claims. It is their duty to be familiar with all bills passed in connection with that subject; and if these bills go to that committee, they go to a committee already enlightened, and already prepared to examine and report upon them at an early day. The proposition now is to take them away from that committee, and refer them to the Committee of Claims—a committee which has never had anything to do with revolutionary claims, and are not familiar with the law. You are undertaking to refer these bills to a committee ignorant upon the subject, and already burdened with business. If these bills go there, the committee will be required to inform themselves upon a branch of business which has never been referred to it.

Now, I have no feeling on the subject. I care nothing about it, further than that I desire to see all these references made to the appropriate committees; and it strikes me that the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions is the appropriate committee to which to refer all such bills as these. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] who seems very much interested by profession in widows, and certainly very little interested by practice, undertakes to tell you that he desires to have the bills referred to the Committee of Claims, because that committee can report at any time. Now, the necessity for the relief of these widows is so great, that I imagine, if the legislation is made upon the same principle on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania acts, there would be no difficulty in having a report submitted at any time. He says he legislates upon the principles of humanity, and not upon principles of law. Now, sir, I propose to conform to the law; and if there is a majority of humane men in the House, so far as widows are concerned, there can be no difficulty about it. I hope, therefore, that, as this bill is fully referred now, it will be let alone; and that the committee which already have charge of it will be allowed to continue in charge of it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I have but a word to say in reply to the gentleman from Virginia. I do not propose to prolong this discussion. The question involved in these claims is simply and purely a legal one—one of the construction of a statute. By the rules of the House, and by the law, the Committee of Claims is designated to examine all these claims which have been decided upon by the Court of Claims. The House has, on motion of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, transferred a particular class of claims, set up by widows, from the Committee of Claims to another committee, that scarcely ever meets, and probably will not consider them. You have transferred them from the committee that has been organized and designated by the House to examine cases coming from the Court of Claims.

Now, sir, I desire, if it be in order, to move to suspend the rules, so that the question may be taken at once upon reconsidering the reference of all these bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would hardly be in order. The bills must be disposed of separately, according to the usage of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Then I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions was reconsidered.

Mr. WARREN. Would it be in order now to move to refer the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, in order to give my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] who is a member of that committee, charge of the widows?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The rules require that these bills should be sent to the Committee of Claims; and they must take that reference, unless, by the unanimous consent of the House, they receive a different reference. It was in that way that this bill was originally sent to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. WARREN. Well, let it go.

The bill was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope that by unanimous consent all these bills will be disposed of at once.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] objected to that.

The votes referring the following bills to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions were then severally reconsidered, and the bills were referred to the Committee of Claims:

A bill (C. C. No. 48) for the relief of Mary Burt, Sciota county, Ohio;

A bill (C. C. No. 49) for the relief of Esther Stevens, of Van Buren county, Michigan;

A bill (C. C. No. 50) for the relief of Marcy Armstrong, of Gloucester county, Rhode Island;

A bill (C. C. No. 51) for the relief of Nancy Madison, of Fairfield county, Ohio;

A bill (C. C. No. 52) for the relief of Anna Parrott, of Clinton county, Ohio;

A bill (C. C. No. 53) for the relief of Margaret Taylor, of Putnam county, Tennessee;

A bill (C. C. No. 54) for the relief of Lavina Tepton, of White county, Tennessee;

A bill (C. C. No. 55) for the relief of Lucretia Wilcox, of Wayne county, Michigan;

A bill (C. C. No. 56) for the relief of Mary Robbins, of Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania; and

A bill (C. C. No. 57) for the relief of Tempy Connelly, of Johnson county, Kentucky.

The question was next stated on the motion to reconsider the vote by which a bill (C. C. No. 58) for the relief of Rosamond Robinson, of Belknap county, New Hampshire, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do not rise for the purpose of saying anything in particular in regard to the reference of this bill. I advocated the reconsideration of the reference of these bills this morning, for the reason that the rules require that the Committee of Claims shall consider all such bills. It might be concluded, from the course I pursued, that I was in favor of the construction which the Court of Claims have given to the pension laws. I differ with the court in that construction. I expect to vote against all these bills if the Committee of Claims should report them back; and I hope that before the session closes I shall be able to get a vote upon my bill abolishing the court, and appropriating the $35,000, now required to keep it in operation, to the payment of just claims against the Government.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope that the House will instruct the committee, or, if they do not do so, that the committee will, if they come to the conclusion to report favorably upon these cases, prepare and report a general bill covering them all, so as to save the necessity of passing a separate bill in each individual case. I hope, also, that if the committee come to the conclusion to report favorably on these cases and to sustain the construction of the Court of Claims, they will, in the general bill which they may report, make a provision requiring the different pension agents employed throughout the country to pay these pensions to the widows upon proof of identity, without their coming back here and making application for another certificate.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether the gentleman is in order in proposing to instruct a committee in general terms in this way, on a simple reference of a bill to such committee? The question is the reference of a particular bill to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion to refer opens the merits of the question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Yes; and if there was any doubt about that, I could move to print it, and that would open the whole question.

Now, sir, who was it that got up these claims? Who was it that brought them here to Congress after the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior had given a construction to this act, that the pension should commence from the day when the act was approved? It was, as I understand, the agents for the prosecution of claims in this city. They got up that scheme and applied to those who, they supposed, were applicants for payment under this law, to get them to induce their Representatives here, the members of Congress from their particular districts, to give to the act a retrospective operation. When the law of 3d of February, 1853, was passed, the pensions were allowed so quickly that there was not enough to pay the agents' fees for prosecuting the claims. These agents, sir, not only sent their circulars to those who are applicants, but they have sent them to those who have no pretense or claim under this act. I saw one just before I left home; it was shown to me by the son of a widow, whose husband had been pensioned under the act of 7th of June, 1832, and who was entitled to a full pension. The marriage took place before the last term of service, and she would have been entitled to a pension from the 4th of March, 1831, if her husband had died prior to that time, or, if not, she was entitled to it from the time he might die, subsequent to the 4th of March, 1831, as long as she lived. When he died in 1854, she, on her application, was placed on the pension roll, at the full rate of ninety-six dollars a year, which her husband had been receiving from the 4th of March, 1831. She is now receiving it, and is entitled to it for the balance of her life or widowhood. And yet, one of these circulars was sent to her, that the Representative of her district might be applied to and enlisted in this matter.

Now, what I want is a provision inserted in the bill that may be reported from the Committee of Claims, to the effect that the pension agents may pay these widows at their homes, on the production of their certificate and proof of identity, as they make each semi-annual payment now. My object is, that they may not have to be brought back to the Pension Office, to pass through one of the agencies of this city, or somewhere else. The five years' pay amounts, in some cases, to only $100—twenty dollars a year—the husband having served six months; or perhaps to $500; or, if the husband was an officer, $2,000 or more. These agents getting the certificates on their application, will obtain, without rendering any important service, one fifth, one half, or other large proportion of these five years' pension, or whatever pension they may claim.

My own opinion is, that the decision of the court is wrong. I think that they have confounded manner and time together. The act to which they have given this construction fixes two things certain and definite. The one is the time when the pension is to commence; the other is as to the time or date of marriage. The act does not require any particular time for the marriage to have taken place; but if the applicant be the widow of a revolutionary soldier, she is entitled to a pension under this law, without regard to the date of the marriage. All other pension laws, giving pensions to widows, specify in the body of the act when the pension provided for therein shall commence, except this one, on which these bills are founded; and, in my opinion, this one, specifying no time, should and can only take effect from the time it was approved and became a law.

But if it be the intention of Congress to recognize the opinion given by this board of claims, and to provide for the payment of these cases, let us pass a law covering all these cases, and incorporate in it a provision that the Commissioner of Pensions shall issue his instructions to the agents for paying pensions, that they shall pay the amount to the widow, on proof of identity.

Mr. FLORENCE. There is another question immediately connected with this subject, which I think it would be well enough for the Committee of Claims to consider. There are many of these widows of revolutionary soldiers who, to provide themselves with the means of livelihood, have intermarried with some other persons. If I understand the law, these women are deprived of the advantages of their pensions under it. I have received an argument bearing on the case, and as it is couched in better language perhaps than I could put it in, I will send it to the Clerk's desk, to be read as part of my speech.

It was read as follows:

If woman is the equal half, and better half of man, And even ever so to be, in Jehovah's righteous plan; Ever and forever more his comfort and delight, Then, O freemen of America, let her enjoy her right!

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your petitioners, respectfully ask leave to represent, that according to our best understanding of human rights, and more especially "woman's rights," the rights of widows whose husbands have died while in the service of the Government of these United States.

Wherefore, we, in human benevolence, as also in justice, ask your honorable bodies to repeal that unjust clause in the Navy pension act which prohibits the marriage of a widow, entitled by said act to a pension, except at the sacrifice and entire loss of her pension whenever she contracts another marriage. There are poor widows of this class who have souls and hearts to love and desire to be honorably united in the holy bonds of marriage with some congenial soul of the opposite sex; but this unjust clause debars such unions except at the sacrifice of their means of a physical maintenance!

Now, this free people—this free United States of America, the wealthiest nation on the face of the earth, ought not to allow, we opine, such an unjust clause, as the above named, to longer remain in said pension act.

And that your honorable bodies immediately cause the clause to be repealed and stricken out of said benevolent pension act, your aggrieved petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

MANY WIDOWS.

New York, December 25, 1857.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not desire to occupy the floor any longer. The petition speaks for itself.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, called for the previous question.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The bill was then, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, referred to the Committee of Claims.

CALL OF THE STATES.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the States and Territories be called, beginning at the State of New York, for the introduction of bills; and that each member be permitted to introduce, by motion for leave, without debate, as many bills as he desires, for reference only, and such resolutions as may not be objected to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object. These propositions only retard instead of helping along the business of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If a bill were received under that resolution, would it be in order to entertain a motion to reconsider, and thus bring that bill back and put it on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not like to anticipate the action of the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I should like to have the matter understood before I vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. If the answer of the Chair be material, he will state that he would be bound to entertain the motion to reconsider.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I am bound to object; for under the resolution, all the bills and resolutions introduced may be brought back by motions to reconsider, and thus take up the remainder of the session without any of them ever having been investigated by any committee, or reported back regularly for the action of the House. If it be understood that neither the bills nor the resolutions introduced under this resolution shall be brought back by reconsideration, I shall not object to it; otherwise I shall object.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I accept, as a modification of my resolution, that the bills and resolutions introduced under it shall not be brought back by motions to reconsider.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to say that I object to the motion of the gentleman, because his resolution takes from the House the privilege of doing what we have a right by the rules this day to do, and this day only.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. If I understand the language of the resolution it does not do so. It barely provides that the States and Territories shall be called in their order, beginning with New York, excluding the right to move to reconsider.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I rise to a question of order. I ask whether this resolution does not conflict with one of the rules of the House; and if so, whether it must not lay over for consideration?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to suspend that and all other rules.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I would appeal to the House to let us have an opportunity to introduce bills of interest to our constituents, of which previous notice has been given. I have some bills which I wish to get in.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not want the discussion to proceed when it is clearly out of order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The rules were suspended, two thirds having voted therefor.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER stated that under the order just made bills and resolutions were in order from the State of New York.

SODUS HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. MORGAN introduced the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill for the improvement of Sodus harbor, Wayne county, New York; and

A bill for the improvement of Sodus harbor, Cayuga county, New York.

PATENT LAW.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, introduced a bill to promote the progress of the useful arts, to regulate the granting of patents for inventions, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts heretofore made for that purpose; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be ordered to be printed under the order of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I should like, if it were within the province of the House, to have the bill printed; and for this reason—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I should like to give my reason for asking that this bill be printed. Mr. BURNETT. I object.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

POST OFFICE FOR BROOKLYN.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a post office in the city of Brooklyn, in New York; and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BURNETT. Is the resolution amendable? The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to say—

Mr. BURNETT. I have not yielded the floor. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I object.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I move to suspend the rules for the introduction of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion until the order of the House has been executed.

ST. CLAIR FLATS.

Mr. HATCH introduced a bill making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the channel of the St. Clair Flats, in the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT BUFFALO.

Mr. HATCH also introduced a bill to authorize the construction of a new custom-house at Buffalo, New York, and changing the uses of a portion of the building now constructing in that city; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

IMPROVEMENT OF BUFFALO HARBOR.

Mr. HATCH also introduced a bill for the improvement of the harbor of Buffalo, New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HOMESTEADS TO ACTUAL SETTLERS.

Mr. KELLY introduced a bill to secure homesteads to actual settlers upon the public domain; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. COBB. That subject has been referred to the Committee on Public Lands. We have it now before us, and that bill ought to go to our committee.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman from Alabama made his point rather too late.

Mr. COBB. I hallooed at the time with all my voice.

The SPEAKER. It is the gentleman's misfortune that the Chair did not hear him.

HARBOR OF CHARLOTTE.

Mr. ANDREWS introduced a bill for the improvement of the harbor of Charlotte, at the mouth of the Genesee river, New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MRS. POST.

Mr. ANDREWS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Mrs. Post, applicant for a pension at the last session of Congress, have leave to withdraw her petition and accompanying papers from the files of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. ANDREWS. I hope the gentleman will not object. This lady presented a petition to the last Congress for a pension, on which there was no action, and no report made. Among the papers there are some documents of great importance to her in legal or other proceedings, and of no value to anybody else.

Mr. FLORENCE. The practice has been to leave copies of papers on file; and if copies of those papers so valuable are left, so that no change can be made in the character of the claim, I have no objection.

Mr. LETCHER. I want the original saved. Copies can be taken.

Mr. ANDREWS. I beg to say to the gentleman from Virginia that this is a very important matter to this lady in some legal proceedings, and I hope the gentleman will not be so ungallant as to object. Copies can be left with the Clerk. One paper is a marriage certificate, a copy of which will not answer the purpose.

Mr. LETCHER. Then it must be a matter of record somewhere.

Mr. ANDREWS. Not in our State. A refusal may do great injustice to the applicant.

The resolution was then modified, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That Mrs. Post, an applicant for a pension at the last session of Congress, have leave to withdraw her petition and accompanying papers from the files of this House, provided copies are left on file.

The resolution, as thus modified, was adopted.

JAMES KIPP AND JOSHUA LELAND.

Mr. GOODWIN introduced the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions:

A bill for the relief of the children of James Kipp, a revolutionary soldier; and

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Joshua Leland, a revolutionary soldier.

RAILROAD AND TELEGRAPH TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. BENNETT introduced a bill to establish a communication by railroad and telegraph between the Atlantic States and California, for postal and military purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ENOCH B. TALLCOT.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE introduced a bill for the relief of Enoch B. Tallcot, late collector of customs at Oswego, New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

MEMORIAL OF THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I have a memorial and petition which I desire to refer, and I offer the following resolution in connection therewith:

Resolved, That the memorial and petition of the National Institute for the Promotion of Science, be printed, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, in connection with that resolution, that the memorial of the National Institute is one of great importance. That institute has a large collection of natural history and other curiosities; but they have no place whatever in which to keep it. I desire that the memorial shall be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings, in order that that committee may provide a suitable place for that collection.

AMENDMENT OF BOUNTY LAND LAW.

Mr. CLAWSON introduced a bill to amend an act in addition to certain acts granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States, approved March 3d, 1855; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

POST OFFICE AT JERSEY CITY.

Mr. WORTENDYKE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a post office at Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to that.

HALF PAY TO WIDOWS.

Mr. FLORENCE introduced a bill to continue five years half pay to certain widows and orphans; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. FLORENCE also introduced a bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st of July, 1801; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

WHITEMARSH B. SEABROOK AND OTHERS.

Mr. DEWART introduced a bill to amend an act for the relief of Whitemarsh B. Seabrook and others; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill to provide for an international copyright; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the joint Committee on the Library.

HARBORS IN THE DELAWARE.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the House of Representatives, estimates based upon such information as may be in the possession of, or can be obtained by the Department, of the amount necessary to complete the improvement of the harbors at Reedy Island, Chester, and New Castle, Delaware river.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. DICK introduced a bill to divide the State of Pennsylvania into three judicial districts; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HARBOR OF ERIE.

Mr. DICK also introduced a bill, making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the harbor of Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. COVODE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill for the protection of the revenues, to prevent frauds in their collection, by home valuation, cash duties, and that the same be specific on iron and such other articles as is practicable.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to that resolution.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. GROW introduced a bill to prevent the future sale of the public lands, under the proclamation of the President, until the same shall have been surveyed for at least fifteen years; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. GROW. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House copies of all instructions by himself or any head of Department to the Governor or other executive officer in the Territory of Kansas, and all correspondence with the same, together with a copy of the executive minutes of said Territory, not already communicated to the House. Also, a copy of the constitution formed at Le Compton, together with a copy of the census and return of the votes in the election of delegates to said convention, and the returns of the election held in said Territory on the 21st of December last, and 4th of January instant, with the number of votes then polled, respectively, in each election precinct in said Territory, and copies of any other official papers in possession of the Secretary of State relative to Kansas affairs, not already communicated to Congress.

Mr. QUITMAN objected to the resolution.

LOUISA BRINKER.

Mr. PURVIANCE introduced a bill for the relief of Mrs. Louisa Brinker; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

WITNESSES IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. FLORENCE asked and obtained leave to introduce the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be requested to inquire into the propriety of making provision for witnesses in the courts of the United States, so that they may not be compelled to suffer imprisonment when unable to give recognizance to appear.

DELAWARE BREAKWATER.

Mr. WHITELEY introduced a bill to provide for the continuance of the Delaware breakwater as a coast harbor of refuge; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORT ON AGRICULTURE.

Mr. WHITELEY asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of the House, one hundred thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Patents on agriculture, for the year 1856, together with the plates; of which number, six thousand copies shall be for the use of the Patent Office.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Robert C. Wright, the husband of the only surviving daughter and heir of the memorialist, have leave to withdraw the papers in the case of Samuel T. Anderson, in order that the application may be filed before the Court of Claims, copies of the same being retained in the Clerk's office.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to have that resolution amended so that the Clerk of the House may transfer the papers to the Secretary of the Court of Claims, instead of letting them be withdrawn by the memorialist.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. It is discretionary with the representatives of the memorialist whether they will make an application to the Court of Claims. This is a mere proposition to withdraw papers, and they can dispose of them afterward as they may deem proper. It is provided in the resolution that copies be retained. The representatives may not think proper to make the application.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well; but if they do think proper to make it, I want to have the papers regularly transferred, and copies left here.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I have no objection to the modification.

The resolution, as modified by Mr. LETCHER, was adopted.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Mr. CLEMENS offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas, great difficulty has been experienced in prosecutions for depredations on the mails and for other offenses against the laws of the United States, by reason of the short period now established by law within which they can be punished: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the third-second section of the act of April 30, 1790, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," so as to extend the period within which an indictment can be found for offenses not capital, from two to five years.

OMISSION IN AN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. FAULKNER asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of the bill to correct an omission in the enrollment of an act of the last session, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STANTON. I should like to know the occasion for that resolution. That bill has been considered in the Committee on Military Affairs, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I should like to know the reason for its transfer to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FAULKNER. The bill has been before the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee authorized me to report it to the House. It was so reported, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but it being a bill making an appropriation, I thought it advisable to have it taken from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not understand why the bill is to take that direction.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to it?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Yes, sir; I object to it.

BRANCH MINT AT NEW YORK.

Mr. LETCHER introduced a bill to establish a branch of the Mint of the United States at the city of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. GOODE offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared, for the use of this House, a tabular statement, exhibiting

1. The area of each State and Territory of the United States, expressed in square miles and acres, classifying the States so as to present the land States in a separate table.

2. The extent of the public domain remaining in each State, expressed in acres.

3. The extent of the public domain alienated by the Government of the United States in each State and Territory; distinguishing between that sold for valuable consideration, and that given, granted, ceded, or conveyed for the purposes of education, public buildings, internal improvements, and miscellaneous objects.

4. The aggregate sum received by the Government on account of the sale of the public lands.

5. The aggregate sum paid on account of the debt of the Revolution.

6. The sums paid to foreign Governments on account of the purchase of public lands, and to the several States as a consideration for the cession; and on account of the Yazoo claim, and in extinguishment of Indian titles; also, the aggregate expense of collecting the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; also, the aggregate cost of surveying the public lands.

7. The present annual expense of the Indian bureau; also, the Land bureau; comprehending the officers at the seat of Government and in the States and Territories.

8. The number of acres conveyed to the Territories, under the provisions of the laws organizing the territorial governments, and the number of acres conveyed to the States on account of the terms, and by the provisions of the acts of Congress admitting new States into the Confederacy.

9. The number of acres granted to the States and companies, in alternate sections, for the construction of railroads; and the sums of money received by the Government from the sales of the reserved alternate sections; also, the number of acres now held by the Government in the reserved alternate sections.

Mr. SEWARD. I should like to know how much it will cost to get that information ready, and how much it will cost to have it printed?

Several MEMBERS. It is very important that we should have it.

The resolution was adopted.

NAVAL BOARD, ETC.

Mr. BOCK submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That Senate resolution No. 3, and also Senate resolution No. 4, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table, read severally a first and second time by their titles, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

A resolution (S. No. 3) to extend and define the authority of the President, under the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy in respect to dropped and retired officers.'"

A resolution (S. No. 4) to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.'"

COLONIZATION MEETING.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, asked the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Colonization Society be allowed the use of the old Hall of the House of Representatives on the 19th instant.

Mr. KEITT objected.

POST ROUTE AGENTS.

Mr. HOPKINS submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to increase and equalize the compensation of route agents in the service of the Post Office Department.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee to investigate and report upon the cost of the public printing, &c., and the changes in the laws now regulating the same, be authorized to employ a clerk at a compensation not exceeding four dollars per day.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is that resolution debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to it, because I want the report of that committee. I supposed we would have had it before now.

CORRECTION OF AN OMISSION.

Mr. FAULKNER. I offer my resolution again. I understand that the gentleman who made objection will withdraw it.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of the bill to correct an omission in the enrollment of an act of the last session, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STANTON. I do not understand what is to be gained by the gentleman's proposition, and therefore object to it.

BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. WINSLOW submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the bounty land acts as to allow the widow or surviving children or heirs-at-law of applicants for bounty land who have died before receiving certificates entitling them to such bounty land, in all cases where the proof was made perfect before the applicants died, and the warrants not issued in consequence of delay in the Pension Office, to receive such warrants as if no delay had occurred; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

NATIONAL FOUNDRY.

Mr. BRANCH introduced a joint resolution to establish a national foundry in Deep river valley, North Carolina; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MAP OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. BRANCH submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the expediency of repealing the resolution passed on the 4th of May, 1848, directing the Clerk to procure a map of the public lands in each State, and directing that said maps be revised and extended after each session of Congress.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, objected.

ABOLITION OF PRIVATEERING, ETC.

Mr. KEITT offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the House with a copy of all correspondence not yet published, between the United States and the Government of France, including that of our Minister at the Court of France, upon the subject of the abolition of privateering, and the exemption of private property from capture upon the high seas.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. MILES asked the consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That nine thousand copies of the Coast Survey report be printed for the use of this House, and for distribution by the Coast Survey office.

Mr. BURROUGHS objected.

NAVAL DEPOT AT BLYTHE ISLAND, ETC.

Mr. SEWARD introduced a bill to amend an act authorizing the establishment of a navy depot on Blythe Island, at Brunswick, on the coast of Georgia, and for other purposes, approved January 28, 1857, and to make further appropriations to prosecute said object, and make such improvements as are necessary for the repair and construction of vessels of war; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a bill to provide for the erection and construction of suitable fortifications for the protection of the harbor of Brunswick, and to appropriate money therefor; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NEW POST ROUTES IN GEORGIA.

Mr. GARTRELL introduced a bill to establish certain post routes in the State of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

BOUNTY LAND TO OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS.

Mr. TRIPP introduced a bill to add a section to the act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved May 14, 1856; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MAPS OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CRAWFORD introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the expediency of repealing the resolution passed on the 4th of May, 1848, directing the Clerk to procure a map of the public lands in each State, and directing that said maps be revised and extended after each session of Congress.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman will modify that resolution by inserting after the word "repealing" the words "or modifying," I will not object to it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I accept the modification. The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

MONTGOMERY A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. DOWDELL introduced a bill to constitute Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BOUNTIES ON COD FISHERIES.

Mr. CURRY introduced a bill repealing all laws, or parts of laws, allowing bounties to vessels employed in the bank or other cod fisheries; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PACIFIC RAILROAD, ETC.

Mr. COBB asked the consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of the construction of a Pacific railroad, or roads, for military purposes, and report to the House by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, objected.

GRANT OF LAND TO THE STATES.

Mr. COBB introduced a bill to grant to the State of Alabama, and other States having public lands therein, the unsold and unappropriated public lands which have been in market for thirty years and upwards, for the purposes of education and internal improvements.

Mr. LETCHER. I would inquire of the gentleman whether there are any public lands in Alabama?

Mr. COBB. There are some vacant lands, and we want them.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ALABAMA LAND DISTRICTS.

Mr. MOORE introduced a bill to transfer the county of Perry, in the State of Alabama, to the Tuscaloosa land district; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PRICE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. SINGLETON offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law making the reserved sections of the public lands under railroad grants, subject to entry by actual settlers, upon the same conditions that other lands of the same quality; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

THE NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Mr. QUITMAN introduced a bill to repeal certain sections of the act passed April 20, 1818, commonly called the neutrality law, and to modify other sections thereof; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NAVAL DEPOT AT SHIP ISLAND.

Mr. QUITMAN offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a navy-yard and naval depot at or near Ship Island, in the State of Mississippi; and to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

CHILDREN OF JOHN NEAL.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, introduced a bill for the relief of the surviving children of John Neal, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

UNOCCUPIED LANDS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. DAVIDSON introduced a bill entitled "An act surrendering to the State of Louisiana the unoccupied public lands in said State, for the purpose of public education;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM CONWAY.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, introduced a bill to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of William Conway, deceased;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, also introduced a bill to amend an act for the better organization of the district court of the United States within the western district of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ATCHAFALAYA BAY.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, also introduced a bill providing for the survey of Atchafalaya bay and approaches; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGER BILL.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I do not know whether I can accomplish the object I have in view under the resolution under which we are now acting. A bill was reported, some days since, from the Committee on Commerce for the better providing for the security of the lives of passengers. The consideration of that bill has been postponed until the second Tuesday in February. I have prepared an amendment for the bill which I wish to have received and printed, in order that it may be before the House when the bill comes up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should prefer that the gentleman's bill should be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TAYLOR. That will be perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. LETCHER. The Committee on Commerce have not charge of the subject. They have reported upon it to the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the bill to which the gentleman desires to offer an amendment is not in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but has been postponed to a day certain. I suppose that, with the consent of the House, the gentleman's amendment can be printed and postponed to the same day to which the bill has been postponed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I prefer that the amendment should go to the Committee on Commerce, who have had the whole subject under consideration.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman will perceive that if the amendment be referred to the Committee on Commerce, that committee may not be able to report it back in time for it to be acted on when the bill comes up.

The bill introduced by Mr. TAYLOR was then read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

A bill further to amend an act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, the bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RAFT REGION OF RED RIVER.

Mr. SANDIDGE introduced a bill appropriating a sum of money for the continuation of improvements in the raft region of Red river; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

UNSOLD PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. SANDIDGE also introduced a bill providing for the gradual transfer to the States in which they are situated of the unsold public lands; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

JOHN R. TEMPLE.

Mr. SANDIDGE offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Senate bill (No. 38) for the relief of John R. Temple, of Louisiana, now on the Speaker's table, be taken up and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill was thereupon taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

SURVEY OF THE OHIO.

Mr. HORTON introduced a bill to provide for the survey of the Ohio river and its principal tributaries; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HORTON. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LETCHER. Ought not that bill to go to the Committee on Roads and Canals? I propose that reference.

The question was first taken on its reference to the Committee on Roads and Canals; and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on its reference to the Committee on Commerce; and it was so referred.

MARY THOMPSON.

Mr. LEITER introduced a bill for the relief of Mary Thompson, of Summit county, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HARBOR AT MOUTH OF GRAND RIVER.

Mr. WADE introduced a bill making an appropriation for continuing the improvements on the harbor at the mouth of Grand river, in the county of Lake, State of Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HARBOR AT MOUTH OF CUYAHOGA RIVER.

Mr. WADE also introduced a bill making an appropriation for continuing the improvement, and for the enlargement of the harbor at the mouth of the Cuyahoga river, in the State of Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HARBOR AT MOUTH OF SANDUSKY RIVER.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, introduced a bill to continue the improvements of the harbor at the mouth of the Sandusky river, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HARBOR OF VERMILLION.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, also introduced a bill to continue the improvements of the harbor of Vermillion, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HARBOR OF HURON.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, also introduced a bill to continue the improvement of the harbor of Huron, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WILLIAM D. MANN, SR.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, also introduced a bill for the relief of William D. Mann, sr.; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

AMENDMENT OF TWENTY-THIRD RULE.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That rule 23 be so modified as to insert, at the end thereof, the following proviso:

Provided, That whenever any committee of the House shall at two sessions of Congress adversely report upon a private claim, it shall not be in order again to refer such claim to any committee, except by leave of the House after the fact of such adverse reports be stated.

The 23d rule was read, as follows:

"Members having petitions and memorials to present may hand them to the Clerk, indorsing the same with their names, and the reference or disposition to be made thereof; and such petitions and memorials shall be entered on the Journal, subject to the control and direction of the Speaker; and if any petition or memorial be so handed in, which, in the judgment of the Speaker, is excluded by the rules, the same shall be returned to the member from whom it was received."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would not object to that resolution if it came up in the right way; but it would be a precedent for changing the rules, against the provision made by the rules for such changes. If this were allowed, propositions for changing the rules would come up every day; therefore, to prevent its being made a precedent here, I shall object.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I ask the unanimous consent of the House, to have the matter referred to a committee of say three or five members. It is a very important modification.

Mr. FLORENCE. I see great difficulties in the way of the amendment offered, and therefore I object.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask leave to introduce the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the United States be requested to negotiate (through the Department of State) with the respective Governments possessing or claiming the Canadas, Nova Scotia, and other portions of North America and Cuba, and other islands adjacent thereto, with a view of annexing the same to the United States, on terms compatible with the peace and honor of the nations negotiating. Provided, however, That in the event of any annexation, no portion of the territory shall be admitted into the Union until there shall be therein a sufficient population to entitle them to one member of the House of Representatives, nor until the bona fide residents of the same shall have had an opportunity of voting upon their constitution and of "regulating their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. FLORENCE. The price is not named.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The object is to negotiate the price.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

UNITED STATES COURT REGULATIONS.

Mr. STANTON asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the standing Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the law regulating the selection of jurors in the circuit and district courts of the United States, as to take the power of selecting regular jurors from the marshals and clerks of the several courts, and confer it upon suitable persons, to be distributed over the several circuits and districts.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, objected.

CINCINNATI A PORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. PENDLETON introduced a bill to establish a port of entry at Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

OHIO JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. PENDLETON also introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to divide the State of Ohio into two judicial districts, and providing for holding the courts of the United States therein;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE DRED SCOTT DECISION.

Mr. GIDDINGS asked the consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Whereas, the Supreme Court of the United States in deciding the recent case of Dred Scott against John F. A. Sandford, departed from the subject before them for the apparent purpose of denying the self-evident truths proclaimed in the Declaration of American Independence, and exerting an influence upon this body and the country in favor of slavery, it has become the imperative duty of the people to express, through their authorized representatives, their firm and unyielding adherence to the essential doctrines avowed by the illustrious founders of our Republic: Therefore Resolved, That the right to live, the liberty to cherish and protect life, to attain knowledge and happiness, are gifts of God, conferred equally on every member of the human family. That these rights attach to the human soul; lie behind and above all human enactments; coming from the Creator, they must ever be held sacred by all Christian Governments, and their enjoyment can only be invaded by incurring the Divine displeasure. That, as tyrants, despots, usurpers, pirates, and oppressors, have in all ages of the world, sought to deprive their fellow men of liberty, of intelligence, of happiness, and to hold the lives of other persons at their disposal, we fully and unequivocally agree with the eminent statesmen who formed our institutions, that the primeval object and ulterior design of human government is to secure every member of the human family in the enjoyment of those rights which God has conferred on him. That said court, in representing the signers of the Declaration of Independence to have asserted truths which they did not intend to avow, and to have entertained barbarous doctrines which they did not express, unjustly assailed the learning, the intelligence, the patriotism, the Christianity of those distinguished patriots. That, by disregarding the language of said Declaration, the debates at the time of its adoption, the current history of that period, the oft-repeated views of the signers of that great charter of human rights, and seeking for the intention of those sages in the colonial statutes of Maryland and Massachusetts, concerning marriage enacted by obscure men of a previous age, the court have brought discredit upon the judiciary of the United States.

Pending the reading of the resolution,

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, said: Mr. Speaker, can a speech be introduced here in the guise of a resolution?

Mr. BOCKOCK. Does the hour rule apply to the reading of resolutions? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. When the hour expires, the question will arise for the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. I have an amendment to offer to the resolution.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to the resolution.

NATIONAL ARMORY.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, introduced a bill to establish a national armory and arsenal at the falls of the Ohio river; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LETCHER. Let the resolution be read for information.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following amendment of the Constitution of the United States is hereby proposed, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States of the United States, shall be a part of the said Constitution of the United States, to wit: that the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States of America be, and it is, amended by adding to the same the following words:

Provided, That only the natural born citizen of the United States of America, or the citizen naturalized according to an act of the Congress of the United States, shall be deemed a qualified elector under this Constitution, to exercise the right to vote for a member of the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The resolution does not fall by a single objection.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman has given previous notice it does not.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have not given previous notice. I intend the resolution for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order that they may consider it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky not having previously given one day's notice required by the rules to introduce a bill or joint resolution, asks the unanimous consent to waive that requirement.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I presume that a majority of the House can give me leave to introduce the resolution.

The SPEAKER. A majority could give leave if previous notice had been given.

POST ROUTES IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. BURNETT. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the propriety of establishing a post route between Murray and Hickman, Kentucky, via Boydsville, Duهدorn, and Feliciana; also, from Providence to Vandeburgh, via Clyde; also, from Paducah to Hickman, Kentucky, via Mayfield and Feliciana; also, from Mayfield to Paris, in Tennessee, via Boydsville.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I offer the following amendment:

And that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a post office in the city of Brooklyn, New York, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Can a member, when his State is not called, tack an amendment to another proposition? Is it not in violation of the order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the resolution would be amendable, but that the amendment must be germane to the original proposition; but the Chair is of opinion that the proposition of the gentleman from New York is not germane to the original proposition submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The resolution was then adopted.

COLONEL CRABB, ETC.

Mr. UNDERWOOD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to communicate, in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, all official information and correspondence in possession of any of the Executive Departments of the Government in relation to the execution or massacre of Colonel Crabb and his associates, within or near the limits of the Republic of Mexico, giving the names of the persons whose lives were taken; whether certain citizens of the United States were not so executed or massacred by the Mexican authority within the limit of the United States, upon the pretext that they were connected with said Crabb's expedition; and what steps, if any, have been taken by the Government in reference thereto.

The resolution was adopted.

POST ROUTE IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. STEVENSON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Ghent, in Carroll county, to New Liberty, in Owen county, in the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

Mr. COX moved to amend by adding thereto the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post

Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Lancaster, Ohio, by way of Roy-alton, South Bloomfield, Genoa, Harrisburg, and California, to London, Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order, and therefore rules it out.

The resolution was then agreed to.

NAVIGATION OF CUMBERLAND RIVER.

Mr. TALBOT introduced a bill for the improvement of the navigation of Cumberland river; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PENSIONS TO OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS.

Mr. MASON introduced a bill granting pensions to the officers and soldiers of the war with Great Britain, and those engaged in Indian wars during that period; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

POST OFFICE BUILDING AT PADUCAH.

Mr. BURNETT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the propriety of constructing a suitable building for a post office at Paducah, in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

POST ROUTE IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing and creating Barren river, from Bowling Green to its mouth, and Green river, from the mouth of Barren river to its mouth in the Ohio river, and the Ohio river from the mouth of Green river to Evansville, a post route, and to provide that the mails thereon be conveyed by boats propelled by steam.

AUDITING OF CERTAIN ACCOUNTS.

Mr. MASON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be authorized to settle, on just and equitable principles, certain accounts now on file in the Clerk's office, for services rendered this House during the last session, and since the adjournment of the last Congress; and that the said committee be further authorized to allow the Clerk of this House to employ such temporary or permanent force, as, on investigation by said committee, may be deemed necessary for extra labor growing out of the removal from the main building of the Capitol to the south wing; and to organize properly the clerks, doorkeepers, and post office of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MASON. I merely wish to say that it is doubtful whether, under the rules of the House, the Committee on Accounts have the power asked for in that resolution. There are a good many obligations growing out of the removal of the House into this building. A select committee was appointed some time ago to take into consideration matters connected with this new Hall. That committee made one report, but have not been discharged. The duties of the two committees may conflict somewhat, and I desire that one committee shall have charge of this whole matter. The Committee on Accounts are industriously inquiring into this business.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire if those accounts filed in the Clerk's office are the ones for extra pay and increased pay and back pay for the last ten years, voted by the last Congress?

Mr. MASON. They are not. The House acted upon those upon their own responsibility. But there are a great many employees about the Capitol, some of whom were authorized by the old Committee on Accounts to go home and stay during the recess last summer, and at the same time draw their pay. There are others here who did work. We want to do justice between the parties; to pay those who did work, and to strike off those who have been illegally authorized to draw pay for work which has not been performed. The committee has been investigating all these matters, and would have reported on them before now, but the House has appointed two investigating committees to look into the same business, thus implying that the House has not confidence in the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels it to be its duty to arrest this debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to say a word only.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not desire to object to the resolution, but I wish to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I object to the resolution.

Mr. RUFFIN. I move to suspend the rules, so that the resolution may be introduced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that motion until the order of the House shall have been executed in the call of the States and Territories.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. The only objection I have is to the latter part of the resolution. I have nothing to say against the first part.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I do.

Mr. MASON. Would it be in order to offer a resolution to dissolve the Committee on Accounts, and leave the House to settle this business? We need the authority asked, such is the pressure of claimants upon us. I would rather resign my seat in the House than continue to serve on a committee which is treated as we have been heretofore.

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER introduced a bill to regulate and make uniform the right of suffrage in the Territories of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

TARRENCE KIRBY.

Mr. READY introduced a bill for the relief of Tarrence Kirby, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. ATKINS introduced a joint resolution directory to the Secretary of War; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CLERKS OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. MAYNARD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of increasing the compensation now allowed to the clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States; and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STANTON objected.

IMMIGRATION OF FOREIGN PAUPERS.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to regulate and restrain the immigration or importation into the United States of foreign paupers and criminals.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 136, nays 37; as follows:

YEA—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Bingham, Biscoe, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Caskey, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Clingman, Colfax, Conins, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Edmundson, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hickman, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Huyler, Jackson, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leifer, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Milson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Pike, Pottic, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, William Smith, Stanton, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippe, Underwood, Watke, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, Wilson, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Zolllicoffer—133.

NAYS—Messrs. Barksdale, Blair, Bowie, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Cox, Davidson, Dowdell, Florence, Giddings, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hughes, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kelly, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Lovjoy, Maclay, Mason, Montgomery, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Pendleton, Phelps, Porter, Russell, Stephens, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—37.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Pending the vote,

Mr. WARREN said: regarding this as simply a resolution of inquiry, I vote "ay," reserving to myself the right to act on the report of the committee as my judgment may dictate.

Mr. PHELPS said: Congress has no power to prohibit the introduction of immigrants, and I therefore vote "No."

Mr. DEWART stated that if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he would have voted "No."

Mr. WHITELEY stated that if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he would have voted "No."

SALES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of repealing all laws requiring the public lands to be offered at public sale; and also all laws subjecting the public lands to sale by general private entry, after having been offered at public sale; and of providing by law for the sale of public lands to actual settlers and cultivators in only limited parcels, and at a price not exceeding the actual cost of the same.

Mr. WINSLOW, (at ten minutes to four, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. ENGLISH asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for a reduction of the tolls upon the Louisville and Portland Canal; and also to inquire what further legislation, if any, is necessary to secure the interest of the United States in said canal.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, objected.

POST OFFICE, ETC., AT NEW ALBANY.

Mr. ENGLISH asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the erection of a building for a post office and custom-house at the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, objected.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SYSTEM.

Mr. PETTIT introduced a bill to repeal the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular system of the United States," which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT MICHIGAN CITY.

Mr. COLFAX introduced a bill making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of a harbor of refuge and commerce, at Michigan City, on Lake Michigan, and for the construction of a breakwater thereat; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CONDUCT OF LATE DOORKEEPER.

Mr. HUGHES offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker, to inquire into the acts and official conduct of the late Doorkeeper of the House, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time.

CITIZENSHIP OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire if any, and what, further legislation, by Congress, may be proper to define what acts shall or shall not be considered expatriation or severance of allegiance on the part of citizens of the United States; and also what provision of law ought to be made for reinvesting with citizenship such persons born in the United States as may have assumed allegiance or citizenship to any foreign Government.

LUCIAN R. ADAMS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, introduced a bill for the relief of Lucian R. Adams, surviving executor of Jane Adams, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CENSUS OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House whether the census of the Territory of Minnesota has been taken, in accordance with a provision of the fourth section of the act of Congress providing for the admission of Minnesota as a State, approved February 26, 1857; and if said census has been taken and returned to him or any department of the Government, to communicate the same to this House; and if the said census has not been so taken and returned, to state the reasons, if any exist, to his knowledge, why it has not been done.

HARBOR OF WAUKEGAN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, introduced a bill for continuing the improvement of the harbor of Waukegan, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ROCK ISLAND RAPIDS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, also introduced a bill for continuing the improvements in the Rock Island rapids, in the Mississippi river; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, ETC., AT ALTON.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois, introduced a bill to provide for erecting a building in the city of Alton, State of Illinois, for a custom-house and post office; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

APPORTIONMENT OF CLERICAL OFFICERS.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois, introduced a bill to apportion the clerks and messengers of the several Departments of the United States Government in the city of Washington among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I would move, as all the committees are loaded with business, to refer this bill to a select committee of five.

Mr. HOUSTON. Are there members enough now to make up any more special committees?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. We will find enough, I think.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would like to amend the resolution so as to include all the executive offices in the States and Territories.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House for amendment—only for reference.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I would inform my friend from Virginia that the bill provides for apportioning the clerks among all the States and Territories of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. Is a motion to lay on the table in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. STANTON. Then I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Then I call for the yeas and nays. I would say to the gentleman from Ohio, that I have no preference for a select committee. If there is any committee of the House that will take the bill in charge, and investigate it and report, my object will be accomplished.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask that the bill be read for information.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. This is an important bill, and as it is late and the House thin, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not desire to interrupt the business, and if no other member wishes the bill read, I withdraw my request.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I should like to have the bill read.

The bill was read in extenso. It provides that the clerks and messengers in the public Departments in the city of Washington shall be apportioned amongst the several States and Territories, the District of Columbia taken as one congressional district for that purpose, in proportion to the representation in the House of Representatives.

Mr. SEWARD. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the bill be laid upon the table, and on that motion call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I am willing that the bill shall go to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order to see whether it conflicts with the Constitution or not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CRAIG of North Carolina, and BUFFINTON were appointed.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a question of order. Was the bill which was just now read for information, read a second time?

The SPEAKER. It was, and afterwards read for information.

Mr. MILLSON. I was going to say that if it had not been read a second time it could be objected to.

The SPEAKER. One objection, under the rule adopted this morning, would not have prevented it from coming in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois proposes to modify his motion.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I do. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The tellers reported—ayes 33, noes 100.

So (more than one fifth of the members voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The House, on motion of Mr. BISHOP, (at five minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 19, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. C. GRANBERY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the President of the United States, transmitting to the Senate a copy of a convention between the United States and his Majesty the King of Denmark, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues, the ratifications of which were exchanged in this city on the 12th instant, and recommending that an appropriation be made to enable the Executive seasonably to carry into effect the stipulations in regard to the sums payable to his Danish Majesty's Government. The letter was, on motion of Mr. SEWARD, referred to the Committee on Finance; and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Senate, showing, in obedience to law, the payments from the contingent fund of the Senate during the year ending the 6th of December, 1857; which was, on motion of Mr. BIGGS, ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of Moses Olmstead, an invalid pensioner, praying to be allowed arrears and increase of pension; which, with his petition and papers on file, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PUGH presented a memorial of certain permanent residents of Kansas, praying that the Indian title to certain lands said to belong to the Musnee Indians may be extinguished, and that Congress will grant them such further relief as in justice and equity they are entitled to as bona fide settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of the register and receiver of the land office at Huntsville, Alabama, praying that the compensation of registers and receivers may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of John Caris and others, members of Captain Campbell's company of volunteers in the war of 1812, praying to be allowed pay and rations to the time of their discharge; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOUSTON presented the petition of Maurice K. Simons, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred, with his papers on file, to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON presented four petitions of citizens of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the location of the post office in the building lately occupied by the Bank of Pennsylvania; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JONES presented a petition of citizens of Taylor county, Iowa, praying that certain settlers on lands in that county may be allowed the right of preemption to those lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. IVERSON presented the memorial of the heirs of John Forsyth, praying that certain charges, erroneously made against him, in the settlement of his accounts as United States Minister at Madrid, may be adjusted, and the amount refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POLK presented a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, praying that William Doty may be remunerated for losses sustained and services rendered in effecting the arrest of certain mail robbers; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri against the extension of Woodworth's patent for a planing machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent office.

Mr. BRODERICK presented a petition of citizens of California, praying for the payment of the expenses incurred by that State in suppressing Indian hostilities; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also presented the petition of Anastacio Caxxillo, praying for remuneration for losses and inconvenience suffered in consequence of the erection of a light-house on a rancho owned by him, and compensation for the ground upon which it was built; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Thomas Jenkins, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Sarah A. Watson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. DURKEE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Elsie Van Ness, widow of Gant Van Ness, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. BIGGS, it was Ordered, That John H. Wheeler have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. COLLAMER, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Vreeland, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. SEWARD. Yesterday, before the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] had concluded his speech, I moved that the Senate go into executive session, not having first provided for a disposition of the subject on which he was speaking. There is another special order for to-morrow, and I learn that it will be quite agreeable to the Senators interested in that question, as well as to the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, to have the subject which was under discussion yesterday continued. I move, therefore, to take up that subject, for the purpose of making it the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the motion to refer to the Committee on Territories so much of the President's message as relates to Kansas, was postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, and made the special order for that hour.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FITZPATRICK, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of State, showing the names of the clerks and other persons employed in that Department during the year 1857, submitted an adverse report; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of War, showing the expenditures for contingent expenses of that Department during the year ending June 30, 1857, reported that the usual number be printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia; also resolutions of the Academy of Science of St. Louis, in favor of printing Dr. John Evans's geological survey of Oregon Territory, submitted an adverse report; which was agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Jonas P.

Keller, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 67) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Elias Hall, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 68) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Charles D. Maxwell, reported a bill (S. No. 69) for the relief of Dr. Charles D. Maxwell, surgeon in the United States Navy; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. GWIN, from the select committee on the Pacific railroad, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 65) to authorize the President of the United States to contract for the transportation of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, Army and Navy supplies, and all other Government service, by railroad, from the Missouri river to San Francisco, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GWIN. As this bill is one of some importance, I move that it be made the special order for the first Monday in February, at one o'clock.

Several SENATORS. And printed.

Mr. GWIN. It will be printed, as a matter of course.

The motion was agreed to.

COD FISHERIES.

Mr. CLAY. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 10) repealing all laws, or parts of laws, allowing bounties to vessels employed in the bank or other cod fisheries, and a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Maine, relative to the bounty on cod fisheries, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report the bill back, and recommend its passage. I move that the bill and report be printed; and I should like to have it made the special order of the day for Thursday, of next week, at one o'clock.

Mr. HALE. I desire to submit an amendment to that bill, and if it is agreeable to the Senate I shall submit it now, and ask to have it printed with the bill. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill abolishing the law establishing a naval school at Annapolis, and a military school at West Point. I think the amendment is analogous and proper. Looking on the fisheries as a school for seamen, and these other institutions as schools for officers, if the Government patronage is to be withdrawn from the education of the men, I wish it to be withdrawn from the officers; and I will offer that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator reduce his amendment to writing?

Mr. HALE. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not know that I shall interpose an objection to the consideration of the bill on Thursday of next week, if the Senator from Alabama desires to speak to it on that day. I have not seen the report of the committee, but I suppose I can infer its general scope. I do not know, however, precisely the form in which it is presented. It has not been submitted, I believe, to the committee. I will therefore suggest to the Senator to indicate a later day.

Mr. CLAY. It is a subject with which I had supposed the Senator from Maine was much more familiar than myself. I want the speedy action of the Senate on it. I am willing to put it off until next Monday week, if that would suit the Senator.

Mr. HAMLIN. That would suit me still better.

Mr. CLAY. The report is brief. There are some accompanying documents which I wish to have printed, in elucidation of the subject-matter of the report.

Mr. HAMLIN. We will hear the Senator on that day; and then, I apprehend, the Senate will give me time to investigate the subject as fully as the report may require.

Mr. CLAY. I will inquire whether there be any special order for next Monday week?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I suggest to my friend from Alabama that next Monday week is the first Monday of February, already assigned to the Senator from California.

Mr. CLAY. Then I would say this day two weeks.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Pacific railroad bill be taken up on the first Monday of February, a special order for the next succeeding day will be of very little value. The Pacific railroad bill will certainly consume more than a single day.

Mr. CLAY. It is suggested that it had better remain in that position, and be the next special order according to the rules.

The VICEPRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves that the report be printed, and that the bill be made the special order for this day two weeks, at one o'clock. The Senator from New Hampshire, by unanimous consent, offers an amendment, and moves that it be printed with the bill. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That all laws establishing a Naval School at Annapolis, and a Military School at West Point, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The VICEPRESIDENT. The question is on printing the report and amendment, and making the bill the special order for this day two weeks, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 66) to amend an act, entitled "An act to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans," approved February 3, 1853; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOOT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 10) directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay certain pension claims therein specified; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; Mr. Foot stating that it involved some legal question on which a diversity of opinion had been expressed.

Mr. CAMERON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 11) relating to public printing; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession derived from the officers connected with the American squadron on the coast of Africa, or from the British Government, or the French Government, or other official sources, concerning the condition of the African slave trade, and concerning the movements of the French Government to establish a colonization in the possessions of that Government from the coast of Africa.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SYSTEMS.

Mr. IVERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making such changes and modifications of the act entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems," approved August 18, 1856, as may be necessary for the better protection and regulation of our growing and expanding commerce and intercourse with foreign nations.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish to make an inquiry of the Secretary. In March last, I had the honor of offering a resolution, which was adopted by the Senate, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to send to this body a statement of the cost of the congressional and departmental printing for the preceding ten years. Nearly a year has elapsed since that resolution was offered, and I am anxious to know whether it was ever sent to the Treasury Department. If it has not been sent, I hope it will be.

The VICEPRESIDENT. The Chair will cause the inquiry to be made.

NAVAL RETIRING BOARD.

The VICEPRESIDENT. The next business in order is the joint resolution (S. No. 6) to extend to the naval retiring board an opportunity of enjoying the same advantages of officers who have been dropped, furloughed, and retired by said board.

The joint resolution was read a second time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that it lie on the table until called up.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES BEATTY.

The bill (S. No. 57) for the relief of James Beatty's personal representative, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James Beatty's personal representative $1,087 41, in full for duties illegally exacted of him in his lifetime, on crude saltpeter (under the name of partially refined saltpeter) imported by him into the port of Baltimore, in January, 1845.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Claims as to the character of this bill. Is this one of the bills for refunding duties which were paid without protest?

Mr. IVERSON. It is not one of that class of claims. The liquor cases, to which I presume the Senator alludes, are a different class altogether. If the Senator will read the decision of the Court of Claims he will be informed of the merits of the case.

Mr. PUGH. I was under the impression that this bill was before the Senate at the last session, and was one of a large class of cases decided by the Court of Claims, where I thought the decisions palpably erroneous. If so, I could not permit the bill to pass without objection; but if it be not one of that class I have nothing to say.

Mr. IVERSON. There was no protest actually filed in the case; but the Court of Claims, as well as the Committee on Claims, considered the circumstances as exempting the party from making protest.

Mr. STUART. I should like to hear the decision of the Court of Claims in this case, in order to know the grounds on which the bill is based.

The Secretary read as follows:

James Beatty's Executor vs. the United States.

SCARBOROUGH J., delivered the opinion of the court. It is conceded by the solicitor, and the court find, that the allegations of the petition filed in this case are established by the evidence. It is also conceded by the solicitor that the money now sought to be reclaimed having been paid under a mistake of fact, the importer being under the mistaken impression, at the time of the payment, that the saltpeter on which the duty was paid was "partially refined saltpeter," when in fact it was "crude saltpeter," there being no such thing known in commerce as "partially refined saltpeter," the petitioner is entitled to relief. In the opinion heretofore delivered by this court, we came to the conclusion that, if the allegations of the petition should be sustained by the evidence, the petitioner's right to relief would be unquestionable. They are fully sustained; and we shall report to Congress a bill in favor of the petitioner for $1,087 41.

The reasons for this opinion will be found in the opinion heretofore delivered by this court in this case, in the opinion of this court in the case of Henry and Frederick W. Meyer vs. the United States, and in the opinions thereto appended.

Beatty's Executor vs. the United States.

Judge BLACKFORD's dissenting opinion.

Suit for over paid duties.

I dissent from the final judgment rendered in this case by a majority of the court in favor of the claimant.

The ground of my dissent is, that the duties sued for were paid without any objection, either written or verbal. The payment was therefore voluntary, and cannot be recovered back. That doctrine is settled by the common law, and by the act of Congress of 1845. Indeed, the act of Congress requires a written protest, stating distinctly and specifically the grounds of objection to the payment. (5 Statutes at Large, 727; see Marriott vs. Brune, 9 Howard, 619, 636; Lawrence vs. Caswell, 13 Howard, 488, 496.)

The reasons of my dissent are given at length in the opinion heretofore delivered by me in this case, on the question as to the validity of the petition; which opinion is hereto appended, and made part of this opinion.

The dissenting opinions heretofore delivered by me in the cases of Sturges, Bennett & Co. vs. the United States, Spence and Reid vs. the United States, and Wood vs. the United States, are also hereto appended, as a part of this opinion.

Mr. PUGH. I do not think it is necessary to read the opinions referred to in the decision. I am satisfied.

Mr. IVERSON. I can state very briefly the character of this case and the distinction between it and the claims to which the Senator from Ohio has alluded. The Committee on Claims have had under consideration bills from the Court of Claims granting relief to Meyer and other claimants, who paid excessive duties, as they allege, on certain importations of spirituous liquors into this country, having filed no protest at the time. They were adjudged by the court to be entitled to relief. The committee, however, have decided against them, and a report is now in the course of preparation adverse to the decision of the Court of Claims. This case is different from those. Here excessive duty was not charged at the time upon the article, but the collector of the customs charged duties erroneously, improperly, on an article which did not in fact exist. The importer paid the duty, of course ignorant but that such was the law, ignorant but that such an article was known in commercial language as "partially refined saltpeter," when in truth and fact, according to commercial language and law, there was nothing but "crude saltpeter." If the duty had been imposed on crude saltpeter, and he had paid more than the law required him to pay without entering a protest, he would not be entitled to relief; but in this case, the collector imposed a duty on an article which really did not exist. He imposed a duty upon partially refined saltpeter, and there was no such thing as partially refined saltpeter. The law did not provide for a duty on such an article, but the importer was ignorant of the fact, as the committee believed from the circumstances stated in his memorial and the testimony, and therefore, we think it just and proper, as the Court of Claims did, to refund this money thus improperly collected; that is to say, to refund the difference between the amount which would have been due on crude saltpeter and the duty which the collector imposed on partially refined saltpeter. That is the whole case.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I make no objection to this bill; but I desire to enter just here a protest against one suggestion that fell from the Senator from Georgia. I am very sorry to hear from that Senator that the Committee on Claims have it in contemplation to report against the refunding of duties overpaid by merchants, because of the absence of a technical protest. I hope that that subject, before the close of the week, will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. IVERSON. That is not the decision of the Committee on Claims. I said they determined to report against the claims of Meyer, and others, importers of liquors, not particularly on the ground of no protest having been filed, but on other grounds, stated in the report. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Simmons] has it under consideration, and will report the facts.

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee do not report against the allowance, for want of a protest, but right the other way. If the claim was just, they would make the allowance notwithstanding the lack of a protest. I merely wish to correct one unintentional error into which the Senator from Georgia fell, if I read the facts aright. This was a duty levied upon partially refined saltpeter, and there is no such thing known in commerce as partially refined saltpeter. It is either crude or refined. The duty was paid by mistake both on the part of the collector and the merchant. When it was found out, the petitioner was too late to protest. He thought the duty was payable on it; but he afterwards ascertained that there was no such thing as partially refined saltpeter, and that the imposition of the duty was a sheer mistake.

Mr. PUGH. I shall not object to the passage of this bill on the special grounds stated by the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Rhode Island; but the court has evidently not decided it on those principles. The court has taken the broad ground that wherever an importer afterwards discovers a mistake of law or of fact, he can come, at any indefinite future period, and recall the money, which is contrary to the law, as I understand it, on the subject of voluntary payments. If this bill stands on the special grounds which have been stated, I make no further objection; but I do object to the cases of Meyer and other parties, which I had occasion to examine at the last session.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not desire to pursue this discussion now; this is not the proper occasion; but I will say that I believe the whole of the public law on that ground stands on an improper footing. I think it is beneath the dignity of the Government, as it is beneath the character of an honest man, to retain a person's money overpaid, because his protest against the payment does not happen to be made in due form, or because, at the time of the payment, he was ignorant of the fact that he was overpaying a claim made against him. However, this is not the proper occasion to enter into the discussion; but I desire, to save my right on that point, to enter a dissent to the view of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FOSTER. You make your protest now. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes, sir.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time, and passed.

NOTARIES PUBLIC.

The bill (S. No. 3) to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments in certain cases, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that in all cases in which, under the laws of the United States, oaths, affirmations, or acknowledgments may now be taken or made before any justice or justices of the peace of any State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, they may be hereafter taken or made by or before any notary public duly appointed in any State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, and, when certified under the hand and official seal of a notary, shall have the same force and effect as if taken or made by or before a justice or justices of the peace. All laws, or parts of laws, for punishing perjury, or subornation of perjury, committed in oaths or affirmations when taken before any justice of the peace, are to apply to any such offense committed in any oaths or affirmations which may be taken under the act before a notary public or commissioner; but on any trial for either of these offenses, the seal and signature of the notary are not to be deemed sufficient in themselves to establish his official character, which must be shown by other proper evidence.

The same powers are proposed to be vested in any commissioner appointed, or hereafter to be appointed, by any circuit court of the United States, under any act of Congress authorizing the appointment of commissioners to take bail, affidavits, or depositions, in causes pending in the courts of the United States. Notaries public are further authorized to take depositions and do such other acts in relation to evidence to be used in the courts of the United States, in the same manner and with the same effect, as commissioners to take acknowledgments of bail and affidavits may now lawfully take or do.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time, and passed.

BENTON, BABBITT, AND LONGSTREET.

The bill (S. No. 59) for the relief of James G. Benton, E. B. Babbitt, and James Longstreet, of the United States Army, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper accounting officers, in settling the accounts of Lieutenant James G. Benton, of the Ordnance Department, of Brevet Major E. B. Babbitt, Chief Assistant Quartermaster, and of Brevet Major James Longstreet, Acting Commissary of Subsistence, to allow them as credits the respective amounts of which they were defrauded by Parker H. French, in San Antonio, Texas, in July, 1850, viz: to James G. Benton, $1,021 04; to E. B. Babbitt, $519 93½; and to James Longstreet, $448 98.

It appears that while these officers were stationed at San Antonio, Texas, in July, 1850, application was made to them, respectively, for ordnance stores, quartermaster's stores, and subsistence stores, by Parker H. French, the chief of a body of emigrants, on their journey to California. He bore and exhibited to the petitioners what purported to be a letter of credit from Howland & Aspinwall, of New York, and he possessed the confidence of numerous citizens and merchants of Texas, to some of whom he was personally known. He was the acknowledged chief of an emigrating party, and was, to all appearances, a reliable and responsible man. By authority of the joint resolution of Congress, approved March 2, 1849, officers in these departments are allowed to sell to persons emigrating to California such stores as the state of the public supplies will permit, and, with the concurrence of Brevet Major General Brooke, they sold to French ordnance stores to the value of $1,021 04; quartermaster's stores, $519 93½; subsistence stores, $448 98; for which he gave them separate drafts upon Howland & Aspinwall, of New York, which drafts, having been forwarded for collection, were protested for non-acceptance. It was then discovered that the letter of credit exhibited by French was a forgery, and all his representations were false. Several of the best merchants of San Antonio were at the same time and in the same manner imposed upon for large amounts of money, and the impostor has fled beyond the reach of law. It is apparent that these officers, in all these transactions, exercised due diligence, acted under the instruction of their commanding general, and that the money was lost without any fault of theirs.

The bill was reported to the Senate; ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

DEATH OF GENERAL RUSK.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, it has become my painful and melancholy duty to announce to the Senate the death of my recent colleague, General THOMAS J. RUSK. In making this announcement, sir, it is proper for me to remark that its postponement to the present period of the session has been owing to a hope that his successor would arrive. Having ascertained that his indisposition is such that he will be prevented from attending the Senate perhaps during the session, I have thought proper to select this occasion for the announcement.

In speaking of the deceased, I am speaking to his friends. He was known to most of those around me familiarly, and to you, sir, intimately. The tribute that is offered to departed greatness is generally measured by the amount of reputation of the individual who is the subject of it. It is the duty of the historian, not of the eulogist, to go into the details of private life and character, and the minutia which would otherwise be appropriate on this occasion.

The subject of this notice was born in Pendleton district, South Carolina. He did not inherit the advantages of fortune, of family, or of patronage. He was descended from an Irish patriot, who was cast upon our shores in consequence of the troubles of 1791 in Ireland. He inherited a holy love of liberty from his ancestors, and it was matured into patriotism for the benefit of his country. After struggling through the difficulties incident to limited means in youth, he acquired a profession—the law. He removed to the State of Georgia, and there rose rapidly to distinction in his profession. After years of exertion in that State, and after having connected himself with an estimable lady, he removed with his family to Texas in 1834. At that time, sir, the first emotions of revolution began to agitate that distant region. He was loyal to the institutions of the country to which he had migrated, until oppression became intolerable. When the Texans rose as one man in resistance to a despot and usurper, he stepped forward, united with his fellow-citizens, and engaged in the perilous conflict of the revolution. He was not urgent for that event; but like others, he prepared himself to meet the occasion when it was unavoidable. In 1835, when the enemy invaded Texas, and took possession of San Antonio, he immediately marched with a force from eastern Texas, and rendered signal assistance to General Austin, then in command of the Texan forces. Whilst at San Antonio, he was engaged in various conflicts and encounters with the enemy, in which he demeaned himself with that chivalry and valor which characterized him in all his martial scenes. After that he returned to his family, but was soon elected to the convention which, in 1836, asserted the independence of Texas, at Washington on the Brazos. In the organization of a government ad interim, he was selected by that body as Secretary of War. He continued in the Cabinet until the enemy were advancing, and the Texan army falling back from the frontiers, and then, unlike others who were fugitives from the limits of the United States, he turned his face to difficulty, and to the army—he identified himself with it, its privations, its sufferings, its difficulties. He continued with it in the confidence of the commander-in-chief, rendering all the aid in his power to the cause of Texas and its independence. He remained with the army until after the capture of General Santa Anna, the imperial ruler of Mexico, when, owing to events which transpired on that day, he was appointed to the command of the army of Texas. It is but just to his memory to say that, on that occasion, he commanded the left wing of the Texan army, and surrounded the right wing of the enemy, rendering the rout and victory more complete than they would otherwise have been.

He continued in command of the army from April until October of that year, when the first constitutional Government was organized at Columbia, on the Brazos. He was then called from the head of the army to the post of Secretary of War. He remained in that position until the circumstances of his family required his attention, when he resigned his place. He was subsequently called to the office of Secretary of State, which he declined, owing to the same causes. He remained in private life until the close of 1837, when he was elected to the Legislature, and during that session he was advanced to the chief justiceship of the Republic. He adorned that position until 1840, when he again resigned office, and retired to the walks of private life and to the pursuit of his profession. Difficulties, however, soon arose in relation to Indian troubles, in which he was always conspicuous, the most efficient in conflict, the foremost in council, a leader in danger, an adviser with wisdom at all times. In 1843, a provisional force was raised by action of the Legislature, when he was again elected major general. His action under this appointment, however, was rendered unnecessary on account of the proclaiming of an armistice and suspension of hostilities, which continued, though partially interrupted, to be sure, until the time of annexation.

On the consummation of that event, sir, he was unanimously elected by the Legislature of Texas a member of this body; he was thrice elected, I believe, ere his death. Senators, you all know the position he occupied here. You know the relations in which you stood to him. You know his high conservative principles. You know his manly and staunch advocacy of the compromises of 1850. You know how faithfully he adhered to every principle that was conservative. You will recollect that he was elected at the close of the last session temporarily to the Chair by a vote of the body—the very height of distinction in a Senator. In the full enjoyment of these high honors and privileges, he was taken from us. His fame is national, not sectional. His name belongs to history; it is hardly a theme for the eulogist. He stood conspicuous in everything that was good and great. He was a man whose influence was felt throughout the nation; nor was the wound unfelt that inflicted his death.

Sir, we may say of him, and it is but a just tribute to worth, that as a soldier he was gallant, his chivalry spotless, his honor clear; as a statesman, he was wise, considerate, and patriotic; as a friend, he had all the high qualities that ennoble the heart; as a father, affectionate almost to infirmity; as a husband, manly, noble, and erect; as a man, he had all the qualities that adorn human nature; and if he had infirmities, they were few in proportion to those which fall to the lot of man. He will be remembered here; he will be remembered throughout the nation; he will be unforgotten in Texas whilst either history or tradition lives. Texas has lost one of the bright and staunch pillars of her edifice; and she has no material to replace him in this body. Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. THOMAS J. RUSK, deceased, late a Senator from the State of Texas, will go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm, for thirty days.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Hon. THOMAS J. RUSK, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. COLLAMER. The expression of eulogy is generally expected from the intimate friends, or political associates of the deceased, and my apology, if any might seem necessary, for my few remarks on this occasion, will, I think, be found in the facts I am about to state.

It was my fortune to be in charge of the Post Office Department in an unusual condition of political affairs. A majority of Congress, in both branches, differed in political sentiment with the President and Cabinet. The chairmen of the different committees, the ordinary organs of intercommunication between the Departments and Congress, were not entertaining congenial political views with the heads of the Departments, and it was not to be expected they would yield any very cheerful assistance to promote their views, and advance their popularity; but would confine themselves strictly to matters of duty to the public service.

In this condition of affairs I found General Rusk, chairman of the Post Office Committee of the Senate, technically called "the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads." It was the first of my personal acquaintance with him. In our official intercourse I presented to him, frankly and fully, all my objects, purposes, and designs for the improvement and efficiency of the Department, and took consultation with him as to all legislative action to effect it. This was by him as frankly reciprocated, and all necessary aid and service in this body, to effect these purposes, was, by him, at all times, most cheerfully, and generally successfully, accorded. No hesitation or neglect, for sinister or party effect, was by him ever manifested. By this he became entitled not only to my confidence and respect, but to my admiration, and even my personal gratitude, which I regard it as my high privilege here to acknowledge, as due to his memory.

During the two sessions of the last Congress I served with and under him on that same committee, and witnessed his services there and in this body, presenting at all times the same traits in his character. As seen by me, he was a man of great clearness of apprehension, soundness of practical judgment, and inflexible integrity of purpose. Untrained and unspoiled in scholastic refinements, he was never the dupe of the sophistry of himself or others. Unskilled in devices and expedients, he presented his objects and his propositions here with the frankness and clearness with which he entertained them, in honest Saxon words, despising all attempts at display and all meretricious ornament. His arguments, like his propositions, the result of an unsophisticated perception, were direct and undisguised, avoiding alike all insinuation and all the crooked paths of oblique approach and disguised indirection. By this he secured not only the confidence he desired, but the admiration which he never sought. It was voluntarily accorded as due to an able and an honest man.

He was the true type of the American statesman, as contradistinguished from the public man of Europe; less remarkable for extensive learning and clerical accomplishments, but more for the utilitarian powers of practical judgment and inflexible integrity and resolution.

Less I could not say, in justice to my own feelings of obligation, though much more I might say in justice to his worth, as a tribute to the memory of General Rusk.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, it is twenty-three years since I first met General Rusk, on the borders of Texas. He was full of hope, and of enterprise, and in the vigor of manhood. I shall never forget the impression he then made upon my mind. He seemed to me like one who was starting upon some great career, and destined to win the highest honors. I was struck with the simplicity and sincerity of his manners, the kindness of his social spirit, and that general tone of character which exhibited virtue, wisdom, and courage, in their mildest, most natural, and least repellant forms. To me, sir, that period is full of interesting reminiscences, which awaken my heart, as well as my memory; and I cannot permit this melancholy occasion to pass without expressing my deep regret for the loss of a friend so true, and a statesman so eminently wise and just.

Our intimacy began with our first interview, and lasted until the close of his life. I feel his death more than I can express in words, and I am sure that the nation feels it profoundly. It is deeply impressed upon the hearts and memories of all who knew him—of all who had reason to seek his counsel—of the injured who had need to apply for redress, to the unerring precision of his justice, and, upon none more sincerely than the members of this body who have long borne with him the cares of State. Sir, it may be said of him that his good deeds, his noble virtues, his unsurpassed judgment, and far-seeing sagacity in public affairs, were indelibly impressed in illuminated characters throughout the political pathway of his life. To speak of him as he truly was, is almost to excite suspicion in the stranger that this portrait is sketched by too partial a hand; but, sir, it is not so; whether we speak of him as a public man or a private citizen, the least we can say is, that it will be long before we look upon his like again. He was a very rare character, and possessed in an eminent degree exceedingly rare qualities. It was not merely that he was wise in counsel and great in action; but political difficulties ever animated him, and public calamities did not unnerve him; and he stood ever ready to act, never being in the way where he ought not to be, nor out of the way when needed, at all times and in all things. It was the combination of those distinguished qualities that attracted towards him men of merit and high excellence, of whatever political cast or opinion, and which no less equally inclined him to esteem and respect many of his opponents. Not to speak of the living, it will be remembered by some—and it must be a pleasant reminiscence to every liberal-minded statesman—that the most friendly relations, and the kindest intercourse, existed, for many years prior to his death, between him and the great Webster. It was rarely they ever opposed each other, except in measures of the strictest party character, where they separated upon a difference of opinion as to great principles. That, sir, was as it should be between enlightened statesmen. They were men eminently fitted to keep this great Union together, and to stand forth, in this respect, as an example to the living and to posterity.

General Rusk was truly a statesman in the highest sense of the term. He had neither a single sectional line in his heart, nor one solitary, sinister, nor cross purpose in his mind; and I deeply deplore that he is not this day in our midst; in the full fruition of all his experience and all his powers, for he was truly a man not only to be admired and beloved, but to be followed in council. He was never disturbed by the lust of power. Its grandeur had no seductive charms for him. He more nearly resembled the great patriot, John Hampden, of England, than any public man who has lived since that time. He had all his virtues and all his talents. They were alike in their habits of mind, of action, and of debate. They were cautious, but energetic; moderate, but decisive; and never lost an inch of ground once gained. Their power was always progressive. They never surrendered, and in a final struggle were sure to be irresistible. Neither of them was given to long, set speeches. They listened patiently to others, and watched with careful precision the direction and force of the discussion. Both were equally ready, and when they did speak, they saw intuitively the pivot upon which the question turned, and dealt with that, and nothing else. They never started except from a vantage ground, because they made it a point to understand the whole subject under consideration, and that which is of equal importance, the true temper of the Houses they addressed. The manners of both were kind and courteous. They were neither of them abject to the highest man who held position above them, nor did they manifest the slightest arrogance towards those beneath them. The personal influence of each was great, and their moral power still greater. Their common sense and indomitable perseverance were unsurpassed, and they were equally fitted for the Senate, or the Cabinet; for war, or peace; for revolution, or the happier destinies of a quiet, safe, and orderly Government. They were both heroes and wise statesmen; alike consummate actors, and skillful and practical reasoners. Hampden excelled in a classical education, and passed at the full meridian of age into the first British conflict with the house of Stuart. Our lamented Senator was taught earlier in life, in the more vivid school of a fiercer revolution, which created a nation and constructed a new Government, where the mind being tasked to greater invention for practical experiments to be adapted to a mixed and untried people, might learn more and treasure more. The one studied Homer with superior advantages, and was for the last years of his life a great actor himself; but the other, from the first, even in his political rudiments, was like one of Homer's heroes in the full tide of successful advancement. He who reads the classical historian may doubtless learn much, and would have before him the faint pictorial of the deeds of others, traced by the pen of a lucid writer, but, if an actor himself in like great events, he would be part of them and see the living picture itself, and become more profoundly instructed in the actions and the characters of men. With that difference in the means for the early mental development of these two distinguished statesmen, it is probable that the schooling of our great American Senator was the more profound, instructive, and practical, and that this far more than counterbalanced the earlier advantages of his remarkable and patriotic prototype.

At any rate, in distant countries, and at remote periods in history, these two statesmen have presented a similitude of character equally curious, striking, and attractive. They both passed from life at an early period. The revolutionary services of the patriotic Briton were the last of his history; but the wars of the American Senator began with his entrance into public life, and it was amidst such trying scenes that he first received in his early manhood the lessons of State. He was already a hero and a statesman before he was introduced to the acquaintance of his countrymen in this Chamber. He had passed through the revolution of Texas with distinguished and unblemished honor. Indeed, throughout all his campaigns, triumphs attended him wherever the Lone Star of his country guided. When in the Cabinet his wisdom was her shield and her strength. To crown the full measure of his glory in that infant Republic, his skillful and equal hand, as the chief justice of her highest court, fashioned and gave practical direction to her new jurisprudence.

Thus, sir, he came before us, although a young man, a practical statesman, full of all the honors which men delight to win and wear, and which history records in her brightest pages as the chief distinction and glory of our race.

How he grew in his proportions here we have all witnessed. What he would have been had he lived no man can tell; but the hearts of his countrymen will attest, that they have lost one of their greatest and most valued statesmen; one whom they had hoped to place in a higher and more responsible position.

What Junius has said of Lord Chatham will apply to him:

"Recorded honors shall gather around his monument and thicken over him. It is a solid fabric, and will support the laurels that adorn it."

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, in funeral ceremonies it is not any of those who were the companions at the hearthstone of the dead, but some one who sustained only public relations to him that is expected to pronounce the customary panegyric. On this ground, I should claim the privilege of being silent on this occasion if I thought that my connection with the late Mr. Rusk was rightly understood. It is true that I was not his kinsman, nor his neighbor, nor even his political associate. I was, nevertheless, attached to him by bonds strong as the charity that consecrates even those relations. But they were peculiar bonds. I was his captive, an adversary overpowered, overcome, and conquered by his generosity in my first encounter with him here in this field of sectional strife, released on parole, a prisoner at large, but devoted to him by gratitude for the period of my whole life. In that character I follow the hearse which is bearing him away from our sight. Since I must speak, nature shall have its way, and my utterances, proceeding not from study but from feeling, shall tell less of his great worth than of my own great loss.

All the world knows that THOMAS J. RUSK was brave and heroic, and yet prudent and patient in the camp and in the field. These were the virtues which distinguished him here, and they were chiefly the means of his success in the Senate. He knew no fear of opposition, raised by either prejudice or passion. He undertook nothing without first balancing all the chances of success, and gathering in and combining all the available agencies necessary to secure it; and he maintained perfect equanimity until all resistance was overcome. As he was without fear, so he was also free from jealousy and from envy. Thus happily constituted, he tolerated in all others the same fidelity to their own characters and the same loyalty to the interests they represented which he bore to his own instincts and to the interests confided to his care. He despised art, trick, and cunning, and advanced always directly towards his appointed end. If he was sometimes irritated at seeming injustice, or misapprehension, he corrected his error without even waiting for complaint or explanation. I doubt whether any setting sun, during his whole life, ever witnessed his anger.

As he was manifestly unassuming and unaffected, so, for aught that I could ever see or hear, he was altogether unambitious. He practiced no flattery. I am sure that no sensible man ever offered him adulation. He was not, in any degree, sectional in his policy; but he aimed always at the advancement and aggrandizement of his whole country. Hence, fortifications, improvement of roads, rivers, and lake navigation, everywhere within our national jurisdiction, and explorations and extended navigation, and telegraph communication with all accessible regions without it, in every part of the globe—these were the achievements he made, these are the monuments of wisdom and patriotism which he has left among us. It was in the studies connected with these measures that my acquaintance with him ripened into an ardent friendship. Each of us deplored his ignorance of the regions concerning which we were legislating, and as they seemed to us to be growing world-wide, we spoke, half seriously and half imaginatively, of going together to enlarge our knowledge, in a voyage around the world. But it was a thing easier to conceive than to execute; and though it might never be executed, it was still pleasant to contemplate.

I saw him last at the late special session of the Senate, called to inaugurate a new Administration. I demanded of him that he should cause one personal and political friend of mine, but who was inoffensive, and a competent and faithful officer, to be retained in a subordinate post under the new Administration. He promptly responded, pleasantly adding, that he would make the granting of my request a condition of his own loyalty to the new powers. We separated. He went to his own sunny land, and I to my home under the genial north star.

On the last day of August, I was reëntering the port of Quebec, after a voyage of thirty days, in search of health along the inhospitable coasts of Labrador. The sympathies of home and country, so long suppressed, were revived within me, and I was even meditating new labors and studies here, when the pilot, who came on board, handed me a newspaper which announced the death of the Senator from Texas. My first emotions were those of sadness and sorrow over this bereavement of a personal friend. When these had had their time, I tried to divine why it was, that he, among all the associates whom I honored, esteemed, and loved here, was thus suddenly and prematurely withdrawn from the scene of our common labors; he, for whom I thought higher honors were preparing, and a fuller wreath was being woven; he, who seemed to me to stand a monument against which the waves of faction must break, if ever they should be stirred up from their lowest depths; he, in short, with whom I thought I might do so much, and without whom I could do almost nothing, to magnify and honor the Republic. That question I could not solve. I cannot solve it now. It is only another occasion in which I am required to trust, where I am not permitted to know, the ways of the Great Disposer.

Mr. President, the teeming thoughts of this solemn hour bring up once more before me the manly form and beaming countenance of my friend, though it is but for that formal parting which has, until now, been denied me. Farewell noble patriot; heroic soldier, faithful statesman, generous friend; loved by no means the least, although among the last of friends secured. I little thought that our whisperings about travels over earth's fairest lands and broadest seas, were only the suggestions of our inward natures to prepare for the sad journey that leads through the gates of death. I do not doubt that for yourself, death is gain, since the event was appointed by Him who doeth all things well. It is best for me also, for it loosens another one of the bonds that bind me to the earth, divests the common fate of one more of its terrors, and creates, through the hope of reunion, another aspiration for a better life beyond the grave.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 19, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. L. ELLIOTT.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced, as the committee to investigate the conduct and accounts of the late Doorkeeper, Messrs. HUGHES, JENKINS, PURVANCE, BRYAN, and THOMPSON.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to state that I voted against the resolution moved by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ZOLICOFFER] to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to regulate and restrain the immigration or importation into the United States of foreign paupers and criminals, under a misapprehension. I supposed the vote was upon a motion to lay the resolution upon the table. I should have voted for the resolution if I had understood the question.

APPORTIONMENT OF CLERICAL OFFICES.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the completion of the order of yesterday, directing the call of the States and Territories for bills and resolutions; the pending question being upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to lay upon the table the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SMITH], to apportion the clerks and messengers of the several Departments of the United States Government, in the city of Washington, among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to report two bills, in order that they may be referred and printed.

Mr. HARLAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, which is the pending question, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 142; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boccock, Bowie, Boyce, Burnett, Caskie, Clay, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Dowdell, Faulkner, Florence, Goode, Groesbeck, Hawkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Letcher, Macley, McQueen, Miles, Millson, Mott, Nichols, Pendleton, Phillips, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Trippe, Whiteley, and Zollicoffer—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Branch, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockrell, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edmundson, English, Farnsworth, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Garrett, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lawrence, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Purvance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reaud, Robbins, Roberts, Ruffin, Russell, Sandage, Seales, Searing, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Robert Smith, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—142.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

The question recurred upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to propose an amendment to the bill, if it is in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Would it be in order to strike out "States," and insert "congressional districts?"

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House for amendment. The motion is to refer.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman will modify his motion, so as to send the bill to a select committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I have had some conversation with the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and with other members of the House, since this bill has been introduced, and I wish to say that I withdraw my motion for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, and move to refer it to a select committee. I would name "seven" as the number of that committee, but would accept the modification of any gentleman in the House proposing to make it a larger number; and I would say, that if a select committee is ordered, and I should be upon the committee, the views and wishes of the gentlemen of the House would be consulted in reference to—

Mr. BURNETT. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BURNETT. Then I object.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I do not want to debate it.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish to move to add instructions to this motion of reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not competent to do so, under the order of the House. The order contemplates nothing but the reading of bills and their reference. The order is, that each member may introduce, by leave, without debate, as many bills as he may desire, for reference only.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Is it not in order to instruct the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not in order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. As the Chair decides that instructions cannot be given, I would inquire if an objection would defeat its introduction?

The SPEAKER. Objection will not defeat the bill. Bills introduced under the order of the House yesterday are under the control of a majority of the House, as far as the first and second reading and the referring of the bills are concerned. A single objection does not defeat it.

Mr. WARREN. I ask to have the bill reported, in order to see whether it includes the chief clerks and heads of bureaus. I would like to have this bill complete.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order.

Mr. WARREN. If the bill is reported, and I find that those officers are not included, I want to appeal to the gentleman to modify it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot modify it. It has been read twice.

Mr. WARREN. Then I hope the committee will modify it.

Mr. BRANCH. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is it in order to say anything in favor of that reference?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I would suggest the propriety of so amending the bill as to make the apportionment according to the free population. I think under that the Democrats of the gentleman's district would fare better.

The question was then put upon the motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 114.

The bill was then ordered to be referred to a select committee of seven.

The SPEAKER announced that the presentation of bills and resolutions was still in order, and called for bills and resolutions from the State of Illinois.

DEPOSITS IN UNITED STATES TREASURIES.

Mr. KELLOGG introduced a bill to authorize the deposit of gold and silver coin, bullion, and gold dust, in the treasuries therein named, and the issuance of certificates therefor, convenient for use and circulation; which was read a first and second time; and he asked that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think that that bill should go to the Committee of Ways and Means, which committee has charge of such matters of legislation.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to its taking that direction.

It was so referred.

PURCHASE AND ENTRY OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. KELLOGG submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of preventing, by law, the entry or purchase, at public sale, of more than three hundred and twenty acres of public lands by any one person, within any single period of five years, and that no patent issue for such lands, until some portion thereof, to be determined by law, shall be in actual cultivation by the person purchasing or entering the same, or his heirs.

BAYLISS'S BATTALION OF ILLINOIS MILITIA.

Mr. FARNSWORTH introduced a bill for the relief of the officers and soldiers of Major Bayliss's battalion of the Illinois militia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IMPROVEMENT OF CHICAGO HARBOR.

Mr. FARNSWORTH also introduced a bill to continue the improvement of the harbor at Chicago, on Lake Michigan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. FARNSWORTH submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of fifteen members be appointed by the Speaker of this House, whose duty it shall be to take into consideration, and report to this House by bill or otherwise, the propriety and expediency of constructing a railroad from the Atlantic States to the Pacific, and that so much of the President's message as refers to a Pacific railroad be referred to such committee.

Several members objected.

POST ROUTES IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from the town of Matoon, in Coles county, Illinois, by way of the towns of Paradise and Greenland, to Vandalia, in Fayette county, in said State.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois, also introduced a bill to establish a mail route from Olney, Illinois, by way of St. Marie and Newton, in Jasper county, to a point on the eastern branch of the central railroad of that State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

AUDITING OF CERTAIN ACCOUNTS.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I objected yesterday to a resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MASON.] Since that time I have made myself more familiar with its merits, and am satisfied of the propriety of its passing. I am willing to intrust the gentleman from Kentucky with any interest of this Government without bond or security. I therefore now offer it. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be authorized to settle, on just and equitable principles, certain accounts now on file in the Clerk's office, for services rendered this House during the last session, and since the adjournment of the last Congress; and that the said committee be further authorized to allow the Clerk of this House to employ such temporary or permanent force, as, on investigation by said committee, may be deemed necessary for extra labor growing out of the removal from the main building of the Capitol to the south wing; and to organize properly the clerks, doorkeepers, and post office of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORGAN. What is that about increase of force?

Mr. MASON. I will explain. This Hall is larger than the old one, and more permanent force will consequently be required of some kinds, while we may be able to do with less of other kinds.

Mr. MORGAN. Let me ask if it is designed by this resolution to employ any additional permanent force?

Mr. MASON. If gentlemen do not choose to trust the committee, let them move to amend the resolution so as to require the committee to report to the House. But there are a great many small matters which hardly need to be brought before the House.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the committee report to the House, so that we may have something to say about the matter.

Mr. MASON. The committee have no objection to any kind of scrutiny which the House may deem necessary.

Mr. MORGAN. The resolution is altogether too broad. I object to it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask for a division of the question. It is only to the latter portion of the resolution that the gentleman from New York objects. It is very important that the first part of the resolution, which relates to the settlement of accounts now on file, should pass. The other is a distinct proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that, under the order of the House, it would be better for the resolution to be modified, so as to strike out the last clause.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Let us have a vote on the first part.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I will modify the resolution as suggested, and offer the latter portion of it afterwards as a separate proposition.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is this the resolution which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MASON] offered yesterday from the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. MASON. It is.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope it will not be divided. If it is objected to now, the gentleman can present it whenever his committee is called for reports. I think the latter part of it is more important, perhaps, than the first part of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that objection is made to the latter part.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; but I should be very glad to see the first part of the resolution adopted.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I modify the resolution so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be authorized to settle, on just and equitable principles, certain accounts now on file in the Clerk's office, for services rendered this House during the last session, and since the adjournment of the last Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be authorized to allow the Clerk of this House to employ such temporary or permanent force, as, on investigation by said committee, may be deemed necessary for extra labor growing out of the removal from the main building of the Capitol to the south wing; and to organize properly the clerks, doorkeepers, and post office of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to that.

Mr. MASON. If the House will allow me, I will make one statement. The committee have been investigating, very laboriously, what it is necessary to do with regard to these officers, and have pretty much come to a conclusion on the subject. The House need not fear that the committee will countenance any extravagance. They only desire to provide the necessary accommodation for members. There has been a great deal of disorganization about this House. It would save us a great deal of labor, and would save the House a great deal of trouble, if these departments were organized for the future. I do not care a great deal about the past. Gentlemen may investigate as much as they choose about corruptions in the past. It is a business which I do not care to go into. But we want to put them now on what we consider a permanent and fair basis for the future. That is all.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is objected to. Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I would further modify the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts inquire and report to the House as to the expediency of allowing the Clerk of this House to employ such temporary or permanent force, as, on investigation by said committee, may be deemed necessary for extra labor growing out of the removal from the main building of the Capitol to the south wing, and to organize properly the clerks, doorkeepers, and post office of the House of Representatives, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. MORGAN. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If there be no objection, I would propose, as an amendment, to discharge the other select committee on the subject.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I accept that as an amendment.

The resolution as thus modified was adopted.

LOWER RAPIDS OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, asked leave to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to furnish to this House, at the earliest practicable moment, the following information:

1. The gross amount expended on the improvement of the lower rapids of the Mississippi river.
2. The amount of appropriations for the improvement of said rapids still unexpended.
3. The amount expended upon them in each year.
4. The amount, nature, and kind of work done, and the estimate thereof.
5. What amount of the appropriations for the improvement of said rapids has been expended for machinery, boats, &c., and what has been done with the same.
6. The name or names of the person or persons to whom the contract or contracts for improving said rapids were let.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to report to this House, in writing, whether, in their opinion, the bridge constructed across the Mississippi river, at Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, is a serious obstruction to the free and successful navigation of said river, and that, if they deem it necessary, they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. KELSEY. I believe that something like the second resolution has been offered before.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

EXECUTIVE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to examine into and report to this House, whether, in their opinion, any change is required in the existing laws providing for and governing the public printing connected with any of the Executive Departments or bureaus.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to this resolution, unless it goes to one of the regular committees. Everything is being sent to special committees, and nothing to the regular committees of the House.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I am well aware that it is not in order to discuss the resolution at this time; but I ask permission of the House to say a word or two in regard to it.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I object.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I will modify the resolution so as to refer it to the select committee already raised.

Mr. LETCHER. Here we have a select committee organized for a particular purpose; and now it is proposed to refer other matter to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sees no difficulty in referring this resolution to the select committee on printing already raised. It is perfectly competent for the House to so refer it.

The resolution was referred to the select committee on printing.

ADDITIONAL POST ROUTES IN MISSOURI.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Canton, in Lewis county, Missouri, by the way of Monticello, Newark, Edina, Kirksville, Milan, and Trenton, to Gallatin, in Davis county; also from Booneville, in Cooper county, by the way of Boonsboro and Glasgow, in Howard county, Missouri; also from Huntsville, by the way of Fort Clay, Breckinridge, and McGee College, and Bloomington, in Macon county, Missouri; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

MILITARY POSTS.

Mr. PHELPS introduced a bill to establish certain military posts on or near to the road made by Lieutenant Colonel J. E. Johnston, leading from Missouri to the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ADDITIONAL POST ROUTES.

Mr. PHELPS submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road from Marshfield to St. Luke, in the State of Missouri.

BOUNTY LAND TO TEAMSTERS.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. I submit the following resolution:

Whereas, many applications for bounty land, made by teamsters, who served during the war with Mexico, in the Indian country, with troops who were mustered into the service for and during said war, have been rejected upon the technical ground that the applicant had "not been marched to the seat of war;" Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the justice and expediency of so amending the existing law as to provide for such teamsters and wagon-masters as may have served a sufficient length of time, whether they were marched to Mexico or not.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object.

ADDITIONAL POST ROUTES.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the necessity of establishing a post road from Fort Des Moines, Iowa, via St. Joseph and Weston, Missouri, to Topeka, in Kansas Territory; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT ST. JOSEPH.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the necessity and expediency of erecting a marine hospital at the city of St. Joseph, in the State of Missouri; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CLEMENS objected.

CARONDELET.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill for the relief of the city of Carondelet; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

COURT-HOUSE, ETC., AT JEFFERSON CITY.

Mr. WOODSON presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, instructing her Senators and requesting her Representatives to ask for an appropriation to build a court-house and post office in Jefferson city, Missouri; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PORT OF ENTRY AT KANSAS CITY.

Mr. WOODSON submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry at Kansas City, in the State of Missouri, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. GREENWOOD introduced the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill granting to the States of Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana, public lands in alternate sections to aid in the construction of a railroad from Springfield, Missouri, via Bentonville, Fayetteville, Van Buren, Fort Smith, and Fulton, in the State of Arkansas, to Shreveport, Louisiana.

A bill granting lands in alternate sections to the States of Arkansas and Missouri to aid in the construction of a railroad from the city of Batesville, Independence county, via Springfield to Independence, in the State of Missouri, with a branch from Batesville to the crossing of the Cairo and Fulton railroad, on White river.

STEALING NEGROES.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be requested to inquire into the propriety of providing, by law, for the punishment of the crime of negro stealing in the Indian country.

Mr. BLISS. I object.

AMOS AND J. E. KENDALL.

Mr. GREENWOOD submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the papers in the case of Amos and J. E. Kendall be withdrawn from the files of the House, and be referred to the Court of Claims, the Senate having given their claims that direction.

J. ROSS BROWNE'S REPORT.

Mr. GREENWOOD submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to communicate to the House the report of J. Ross Browne, special agent of the Indian department, on the Indian affairs of Oregon and Washington Territories.

GRADUATION ACT.

Mr. GREENWOOD submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill applying the provisions of the act known as the graduation act, to such lands as lie within the six miles on either side of railroads, to which grants of public lands have been made, to aid in their construction.

KANSAS HALF-BREED INDIANS.

Mr. GREENWOOD submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to report to this House, at as early a day as practicable, any information that may be in his possession, as to the condition of the reserves secured to the Kansas half-breed Indians, under treaty of 1825; and whether said Indians, or their heirs, or any part of them, are in possession of said reservations, together with his opinion as to the policy and propriety of taking the necessary steps to extinguish the Indian title to the reserves, under any treaty with said Indians, in said Territory of Kansas, protecting the rights of the Indians, and giving to the said Indians the fee in said reserves.

HOT SPRINGS OF THE OUACHITA, ARKANSAS.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill to authorize the investigation and determination of asserted titles to the hot springs of the Ouachita, in the State of Arkansas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HARBOR OF MONROE, MICHIGAN.

Mr. WALDRON introduced a bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Monroe, Michigan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HENRY TRIPP.

Mr. WALDRON also introduced a bill authorizing the grant of bounty land to Henry Tripp; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

STACY LAMPHERE.

Mr. WALDRON also introduced a bill for the relief of Stacy Lamphere; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MALACHI F. RANDOLPH.

Mr. WALDRON also introduced a bill for the relief of the widow of Malachi F. Randolph; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HARBORS OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. WALBRIDGE introduced the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, viz:

A bill making an appropriation for the construction of a harbor at the mouth of the Muskegon river, in the State of Michigan;

A bill making an appropriation for the construction of a harbor at Black Lake, in the State of Michigan;

A bill making an appropriation for completing the harbor at St. Joseph, in the State of Michigan;

A bill making an appropriation for the construction of a harbor at New Buffalo, in the State of Michigan;

A bill making an appropriation for the construction of a harbor at the mouth of the Kalamazoo river, in the State of Michigan; and

A bill making an appropriation for the construction of a harbor at South Black river, in the State of Michigan.

NUMBER OF TROOPS IN KANSAS.

Mr. WALBRIDGE also asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with a statement showing the number of United States troops now stationed in the Territory of Kansas, together with the number of such troops stationed and being in said Territory on the first day of each month since the 1st day of January, 1855.

Mr. CLEMENS objected.

REPORT OF COLONEL J. D. GRAHAM.

Mr. LEACH asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House the last annual report of Lieutenant Colonel J. D. Graham, touching the commerce and harbors in his district, not included in the report heretofore made to this House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. LEACH. If the House will indulge me in one word of explanation, I think the gentleman will withdraw the objection. A few days since the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BILLINGHURST] introduced a resolution, calling for similar information in regard to the harbors and commerce of Lake Michigan. That resolution was adopted by the House, and the Secretary of War has responded to it. It is equally important that we should have information with reference to Lakes Erie, St. Clair, and Superior, and particularly in reference to Lake Superior, where the copper and iron business is of importance to the whole nation, and is a growing one upon the shores of that lake. It is important that this House should understand the condition of the commerce and of the harbors on that lake.

I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

The objection was not withdrawn.

HARBORS ON LAKE MICHIGAN.

Mr. LEACH introduced the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the Saginaw river, in the State of Michigan;

A bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Marquette, in the State of Michigan;

A bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Ontonagon, in the State of Michigan; and

A bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of the Manistee, in the State of Michigan.

DEATH OF HON. THOMAS J. RUSK.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, communicating the proceedings of the Senate upon the death of the Hon. THOMAS J. RUSK, late Senator from Texas.

The resolutions of the Senate were read, and are as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 19, 1858.

Resolved unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. THOMAS J. RUSK, deceased, late a Senator from the State of Texas, will go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved unanimously, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Hon. THOMAS J. RUSK, the Senate do now adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the announcement just made of the death of General THOMAS J. RUSK, late a Senator from the State of Texas, calls for another pause in the ordinary business of this House, and for the performance of our last solemn duty, as a body, to the memory of a great and good man.

General Rusk was a native of the State of South Carolina, where he studied law, and commenced, in comparative obscurity, the great business of life. He subsequently removed to the State of Georgia, and, in 1835, to Texas. The struggle for the independence and separate national existence of Texas, had then begun, and that love of justice and of right—that manly courage and lofty patriotism which so distinguished his after years, induced him at once to identify his fortunes with those of the brave spirits there, who had learned the value of freedom and equality, and had determined to meet the perils of war rather than submit to the loss of their civil and religious liberty.

It is not my purpose now to notice in detail the many historic events in the life of General Rusk. This will be the pleasing duty of the historian. Nor is it my object to pronounce a formal eulogy upon his life and services. But I come to offer the grateful tribute of the brave and generous people he has so often commanded in battle, and so long, so ably, so faithfully served in the councils of the State and nation.

As commander of a volunteer company; as aid to General Stephen A. Austin; as the first Secretary of War of the Republic of Texas; as the first chief justice of the Republic of Texas; as major general of the militia of the Republic of Texas, charged with important duties, and clothed with large powers; as a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the Republic of Texas; as a member of the Congress of the Republic of Texas; as president of the convention which formed the constitution of the State of Texas; as a Senator in the Congress of the United States; as an eminent and successful lawyer; as an unostentatious and loyal citizen, ever respecting the laws, the religion, the institutions, and the Government of his country; as a devoted husband and affectionate father—though he has fallen in the meridian of his manhood—he has filled the full measure of a citizen, a soldier, a patriot, a statesman and hero, to whom the citizens of Texas will continue to point with pleasure and with pride as long as their hearts shall continue to beat with the pride of chivalry, and the love of pure and unspotted integrity, and exalted and unselfish patriotism.

General Rusk possessed a mind of uncommon clearness and strength; and a constitution and physical vigor capable of great labor and endurance; a commanding and noble person; a pleasant and vivacious temperament; was fond of anecdote, and full of kindness and sympathy for the unfortunate of all grades and conditions. Indeed his love of justice, and candor, and truth, and his sympathy for, and readiness to espouse the cause of the unfortunate, or weak, or oppressed, might be said to have been his most prominent characteristics. Always courteous and respectful to his equals; he was kind and condescending to his inferiors; often recognizing them, and hearing their suit, and contributing to their wants, under circumstances which showed that he regarded the true dignity of man as consisting rather in acts of justice and mercy than in holding himself bound by the chains of ceremonial coldness which too often separate man from his fellow.

He fought gallantly the battles of his adopted country, and, while Secretary of War, beyond the ordinary duties of that station, he bore a most distinguished part on the glorious field of San Jacinto, and aided to add another to the roll of nations of free republican States, and to gild the southern horizon with the star of liberty, which once floated in lone and solitary grandeur over the broad and beautiful plains of Texas; but which now, invreathed with the oak and the olive, beams with undiminished luster amid the grand armorial constellation in the dome above us, representing at once the separate sovereignty and the national unity of the American States.

Though he occupied many important stations, and though much of his life was spent in the discharge of official duty, he was fond of the retirement and quietude of private life, and generally shunned rather than sought office. This was illustrated on several occasions in his life. He was urged on more than one occasion to accept the presidency of the Republic of Texas, but uniformly declined. And at the time of the last presidential election there, I was informed that both of the distinguished men who were candidates for that office, before their announcement, urged General Rusk to accept the position; and neither of them would have opposed him. But, when the presidency was thus at his command, without opposition, he declined to accept it. He refused the use of his name for the Vice Presidency of the United States, and has repeatedly discouraged the mention of his name for the Presidency.

As a soldier, he was brave and self-reliant; as an officer, he was cautious and calculating; always ready to expose his own person to danger, but never rashly exposing his men.

As a statesman, he looked to a strict construction of the Federal Constitution and the preservation of the rights of the States, as the surest, yea, the only means of maintaining the permanency of the Union, the equality of the States, and the liberties of the people, in the spirit in which these blessings were secured to us by our revolutionary fathers. And while he looked proudly on our past history, and on the extraordinary growth and progress of our common country, in physical science, the arts, agriculture, and commerce; our advancement in moral science, in religion, in laws, in good government, and in all that tends to the civilization and improvement of his country and his race; yet, as I learned from him but a few weeks before his death, he looked with fearful apprehension to the continued and alarming agitation of the question of slavery, as tending to weaken his high hopes of the future destiny of the Republic.

At the time of which I speak, he was considering with great anxiety whether any means could be adopted which would avert these dangers, and secure, if possible, on a permanent basis, that fraternal good feeling, and mutual respect for the rights of each other, which should ever characterize the people of a nation so blessed with all the elements of happiness and prosperity as our own. He also condemned, with much earnestness, the new social theories and religious fanaticisms which have obtained a limited foothold in parts of our country, as being full of delusion and of danger; and, as an evidence that he had rightly estimated their importance, some of their bitter fruits are now upon the country.

But, alas! with all his wisdom, with all his usefulness, with all his goodness, with all his honors, with all the devotion of a confiding constituency, he is gone—gone from the family hearth-stone, from the domestic and social circles; no more to wave his proud plume in advance of his comrades in arms; no more to draw his keen sword in defense of liberty; no more to offer his wise counsels for the good of the nation; no more to offer the willing hand of charity to the needy; no more to offer consolation to the distressed; no more to offer kind and encouraging counsel to the young and deserving. The scenes of earth have closed upon him. And while we mourn his death, we doubly mourn its manner. It is true, he fell by his own hand; but that hand was not moved by the natural impulses of his upright, generous heart, or guided by that reason and consciousness which had so long distinguished him for his prudence and moderation.

A severe domestic bereavement—the loss of the wife who was the cherished idol of his early manhood, and the guiding star of his after life; who, in prosperity and in adversity, in sickness and in health, under all the varied fortunes of his life, had clung to him with a constant and unvarying devotion, had, by the inscrutable hand of Providence, been taken from him. To this was added the many cares and perplexities his position had drawn upon him. And to these were added a disease which, it was thought, may have affected his spine and brain. And these combined causes, operating upon his keenly sensitive mental organization, it is believed, caused his reason to give way, and his struggling soul, unguided by consciousness, sought peace in death.

As the purity of his heart, the prudence and moderation of his life, the extraordinary inducements he had to desire a continuance of life, and the absence of any known inducement to desire his own destruction, exclude the idea that he could have been conscious of the manner of his death, so they leave us room to hope and believe he will not be held accountable for it before the Eternal Judge.

I will conclude what I have to say, by adding that the Legislature of Texas, responding to the general sentiment of sincere admiration, entertained by the people of that State, for the worth and services of General Rusk, has already made provision for the erection of his statue, at the capital of the State. And a nation's sorrow bears testimony that his fame and his usefulness were the property of the whole country.

I speak here, not only as the representative of the district in which General Rusk has lived, ever since his immigration to Texas; but, as one who has seen him at his home, with his family, around his own fireside, amongst his neighbors, in the court-house, on the tented field, and in the blazing front of battle; the same pure, and just, and generous, and noble man, at all times and everywhere, more worthy of imitation, in his leading characteristics, than any other it has been my fortune to know.

I move the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's table.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep sorrow the announcement of the death of General THOMAS J. RUSK, late a Senator from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That as a testimonial of respect for the deceased, the members and officers of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this House in relation to the death of General THOMAS J. RUSK, be communicated to the family of the deceased by the Clerk.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. KEITT. Mr. Chairman, the resolutions before us communicate only official intelligence of the death of the distinguished Senator from Texas. The public voice has already been broken into sobs over his bier; and it is fitting that we now, in our high estate, should celebrate a funeral tribute to his memory. On behalf, then, of the Commonwealth of South Carolina, on whose soil he was born, I lay a glove upon his freshly-closed grave.

Sir, the symbols of mourning are thickening around us. At the very threshold of our legislative career we have been summoned away from the passions and strifes of political warfare, and carried to those last scenes of life, in which ambitions are hushed and rivalries forever stilled. In the brief tract of time lying between the close of the last and the beginning of the present Congress, around how many of the trusted of the land have the curtains of time been closely drawn? Men fresh from the Cabinet, and with the prestige of renown upon their brows; Senators covered with august and revered trophies; Representatives upholding the fasces of popular authority; all of these, coming from every portion of the Union, and drawing nearer and nearer, as they advanced, have mingled in that "dark and narrow house where all human glories enter" and disappear forever.

Over the loss of no one of these rose there a deeper cry of grief than over that of the lamented Rusk. With that intuitive sagacity which detects genuine merit, and that prescient forecast which goes forth fearlessly to meet the future, and anticipates events ere yet they are formed, the big heart of the people felt that a great man had fallen; one whose step was upon the "round and top" of the republican ladder. General Rusk gravitated to superiority by the laws of his mental and moral nature. These carried him to distinction, as the instincts of the eagle carry him above the mountains, up to the very sun. Certainly it is a noble thing to bear, like a banner, a historical name for a thousand years; and in turning to the past to see, looming through the night of ages, a series of figures, barded with iron, draped with ermine, who resemble you, and bear the same name that you do; but it is a shallow philosophy that undervalues the efforts of him who starts a noble line.

Born of humble parentage and to a narrow fortune, young Rusk went forth to begin the warfare of life. Reared upon soil still wet with the blood of patriots; educated by stirring themes of heroic daring; and with a heart chastened by the sacrifices and dowered with the wealth of our historic struggle, he followed in the trackway of those great men who had hung our political heavens in light and glory. The splendid courage and magnanimous sacrifices through which our independence had been won and established, he displayed on behalf of that people whose cause he had espoused, and on whose soil he lived. In the very front of the foremost men of Texas, he kept "watch and ward," while the "lone star" was blending its scattered rays into unity ere it wheeled upward to mingle its brightness with the blaze of the Federal constellation.

As Secretary of War, he organized the resources of Texas; as military leader, he conducted her armies to victory; as legislator, he aided to establish her civil polity; and as chief justice, he systematized her jurisprudence.

In walking back softly over the path he trod, we may well ask what high qualities of head and heart he had to win such signal success. As an orator it was not given him to utter those burning words which sometimes electrify a whole people; those words which strike like a flash of lightning; which penetrate; which do not stay to be scanned, "probed, vexed, and criticised;" which illuminate and are gone; but with intuitive sagacity he cut to the heart of every measure, and realizing it and stripping it of extrinsic appliances, he presented it in a few short, sharp, abrupt sentences. As a statesman, it was not his excellence to elaborate theories of civic economy, or expound the rudiments of government; but with a ready insight into the needs of society, he appreciated and administered the living principles upon which each phase of it rests and is founded. The eminent feature in General Rusk's statesmanship was its practicality. The power of his mind lay in the perfect equilibrium of all its forces. With equal facility he unwound the threads of delusion with which an opponent had encoiled his subject, and presented the construction and accumulation of proofs necessary to its elucidation.

Truth is a ray shot from Divinity itself. He who seeks it, must seek it reverent and afraid; must seek it in the attitude ascribed by the great epic poet of England, to the "brightest cherubim at the footstool of the Omnipotent throne," who "Approach not, but with both wings vail their eyes." Yet, when possessed, when realized, he who would apply it to human affairs without reference to the atmosphere of modifying circumstances, only mars and betrays it. Wise statesmanship consists in the judicious application of abstract truth to the imperfect and progressive conditions of humanity. It was this statesmanship that made General Rusk a representative man.

But his claim to our homage lies not alone in the pure and magnanimous victories of mind. His was a genial and gentle spirit. One of his last acts was to secure a few homely comforts to his aged mother, who yet lives upon her native soil in the Palmetto State. Of this, however, I need not speak; for how many homes in the land of his adoption have been relieved of want by the hand of him now pillowed and covered up in his bed of imperturbable slumber? Taken all in all, General Rusk was one of the men who may be ever regretted but never supplied. Ardent minds like his keep their first enthusiasm, but pent up like the central fires of the earth. Generous hearts like his give up the affections of life, but worship their memories in the inner recesses of the shrine. How sad, too, the bereavement! For if ever any man had a right, he certainly had, not to consent to death. It was a hard thing for him to fall in the midst of the torch race of fame, with the light still brightly burning; to fall when he had shaken off the dust raised by his lagging competitor; to fall when he had shaken off the very weariness of the course, and his hand was just outstretched for the golden reward of his many strivings and toils.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

But he is gone. Gone are the aspirations of a generous and noble intellect; gone, too, are the precious hopes of admiring friends; but radiant and flashing through night and darkness, still lives the example of a life well and virtuously spent. The captain who has carried his country's flag around the world, may drawn away out of sight; but the monuments he has reared will speak for themselves, and the surviving crew will tell what storms he rode out. High deeds and noble names go not down to silence, for history embalms them with Pantheonic honors, and bard and minstrel catch up the glorious theme and send it echoing along the archways of time. The children of genius are bound together by household ties, and the great of earth make but a single family. From earliest to latest of those who wear the glories of mind there rolls a river of ancestral blood; it rolls through priest and warrior; through bard and king; through generations and empires, and history with all her wealth. There are kings of action, as well as kings of thought; and both are blazoned in the heraldry of this immortal descent. Among the first of these General Rusk has his appointed place.

At how critical a period, too, in our history, did he pass from the stage of being? There are in the life of every people, certain hours which tell in an appointed day, and then depart, never to return—decisive hours, in which a people hold in their hand the secrets of their future; in which, masters of their coming destinies, they pronounce upon themselves a judgment without appeal. Human freedom never manifests itself with more evident tokens than in such crises. It would seem as if God stands aside; holds off his divine hand from the circles of the earth, and waits for the action of the creature of his breath. Man stands alone with his good and his evil instincts, with his conscience, and his reason: a noble impulse may save, an unmanly wavering may lose everything. Sometimes, from the bosom of this people, thus hesitating and doubting, and looking for the pathway in the darkness, there comes an inspired man—a man of action. He speaks, and all acknowledge the power of his voice; he moves, and few but follow in the measure of his steps.

These hours, in such an appointed day, may now be coming swiftly upon us. A grand cloud of witnesses testify that great events are happening around us. Government is to society what the ship is to the ocean; it heaves and tosses with every surge of the mighty billows. Abroad, revolution mutters, and it may yet engulf both ducal crown and royal throne in its fiery sweep. At home, the public heart is stirred; and it will not much longer be awed by the frowns of authority, or bound by the threads of a parasite legislation. Our mission will be fulfilled. The progress of society is southward, and thither our Anglo-Norman population is moving with the firm tread of a Roman legion. It will yet carry its banner and spread its laws over all this continent; celebrate, in fit time, the union of the two oceans that wash its boundaries; and, under the ministries of Providence, work out the final development of the human intellect in its most gorgeous and farthest-reaching forms.

The wheel of events usually rolls with something of leisure and measure; but roll it slowly, or roll it swiftly, this end will yet be accomplished. It was this mission that fired the imagination and nerved the heart of the patriot Senator from Texas. Along this track he moved with feet of fire; and no perils of the march, and no weariness of the road, deterred him; for upon him, as upon the patriarch, burst visions of glory; and in them he saw his country leading the Panathenian procession of the nations, while the ascending races of her children crowded up the mystic ladder, the topmost rounds of which are lost in the enduring splendors of eternal mind.

Mr. JACKSON. If it be true that the dead can experience the emotion of gratification at what transpires in honor of their memory here, the immortal spirit of the late Senator from Texas must be gratified to-day. Texas weeps here over his remains, because he was eminent among those heroes who achieved her sovereignty by the sword, and because after her incorporation into our Union he ably and fitly represented that sovereignty in the council chamber of sovereigns—the Senate of the United States.

South Carolina bows sorrowing by the side of her younger sister, because he was born beneath her hot sun; and that sun fired his heart with much of that impetuous chivalry which characterizes all her excellent children.

Georgia also approaches his bier as a mourner, because General Rusk lived for a brief period among those beautiful mountains that skirt her northern frontier, and imbibed, perhaps, from their wholesome atmosphere, something of that hardihood of character which characterized the soldier, and that robust judgment and sound practical sense which marked the Senator.

The entire South follows this procession to the grave with melancholy, yet proud, step, because he was her son—true and loyal to that institution which was fastened upon her unwilling infancy, which has grown with her growth, which has now become interwoven with every fiber of her being, and by which, under Providence, she this day clothes the nakedness of mankind.

The North, too, and the mighty and still growing Northwest, all pay a willing tribute of unfeigned sorrow to the memory of this great man; because, whilst his heart was thus true to the instincts of his birth and the fealty of his boyhood, it was big enough to embrace in its patriotic love all the States of the Union, and his eye keen enough to see that the true interests of each is really the interest of all. Well may we all mourn. A hero has left the battle-field forever; a Roman has departed from the Senate Chamber never more to return.

I repeat, if it be possible that the dead can experience joy over what transpires here, the spirit of the departed Senator must be gratified to-day. But, sir, this cannot be; "for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave whither thou goest," and these sad ceremonies are only useful to the living. Their office is twofold; first, that of the good Samaritan, to pour oil into the bleeding hearts of the surviving relatives and friends; and secondly, to draw from the character of the deceased some moral by which we may all profit.

In that district of Georgia which I have the honor to represent here, and among those mountains of which I have spoken, there live to-day an aged couple. Almost fourscore winters have furrowed their faces with wrinkles, and covered their heads with frost. They are, sir, the father and mother of the deceased wife of the late Senator from Texas; and however heavily the blow of his death may have fallen in other places, nowhere has it descended with more crushing severity than upon the already aching bosoms of my venerable constituents. Indeed, sir, the young heart, like the flesh of youth, recovers rapidly from wounds inflicted upon it; but the affections of old people become, like their physical organization, rigid and fixed; and time, the great restorer, rarely and slowly, if at all, heals up wounds inflicted upon them. The young sapling will bend instantly to the sweep of the tempest as it passes, but so soon as it is gone, erects itself again. The old tree, with trunk almost decayed, and sap flowing but feebly beneath its all but withered bark, relies alone upon the vine which has grown around it for years as its only prop against the storm.

The relation borne by the late Senator from Texas to my old constituents was not unlike that of this vine to that tree. The last prop that held them up has been sundered; and soon they, too, must totter and fall. And, sir, it is simply because I thought it might be grateful to their feelings that their immediate representative here should bear some open part in this solemn drama, that I yielded to the suggestion of my most distinguished colleague, [Mr. STEPHENS,] and agreed to speak for Georgia to the resolutions upon your table.

Sir, I well remember the conversation I had with my old friend but a few weeks before I left home; the subject of which was the death of his own family, and among them, the death of his daughter—I believe, the last surviving child—the wife of the distinguished Senator, and the death of his distinguished son-in-law, of whom he was justly so proud. And I see before me now, Mr. Speaker, the convulsed face and trembling lips of the old man as he expressed to me the conviction that the death of his daughter, the wife of the Senator, might possibly have precipitated his own.

Sir, I will not speak of the manner of his death. Let that charity which hopeth all things cast her mantle of love over his dead body, and, pointing to the noble and beautiful and self-sacrificing virtue which led him to follow the departed spirit of her he loved, hide forever the vice to which unhappily that love may have led.

But we should be unjust to ourselves, Mr. Speaker, if we allowed this occasion to pass without drawing from it some moral by which we may all profit. The late Senator from Texas was possessed of wisdom in a high degree—wisdom as distinguished from genius; that wisdom which is made up of sound judgment, accurate and extensive observation of men and of things, and an enlarged experience. He possessed courage in the true sense of that word—physical and moral courage, displayed upon the battle-field, and exemplified in the Senate Chamber. More than these, Mr. Speaker, and better than these, his heart was a well-spring of deep and pure affection, whose current ran unceasingly towards the object of his early attachment, her who had been the companion of his manhood, and whom he hoped to keep by his side as the solace of his declining years.

Sir, an instinct of our nature, Heaven-born, a faint trace of that image of purity which God stamped upon the heart of Adam, leads us all irresistibly to love those noble qualities wherever we find them. They are golden qualities; but alas! sir, like everything else of earth, even gold is ever found mixed with baser metal. It requires, Mr. Speaker, the fire of the Great Refiner, the power of the Almighty Alchemist to remove all the dross and leave the precious metal perfectly pure. Sir, without such purification from on high, wisdom, however exalted; courage, however true; even love itself, however pure and constant, will lead us often into error, and sometimes into vice. Let us deduce from this a great moral, and let us all try, under Providence, to practice it. To know the will of God, in Christ, concerning us, is the most exalted wisdom; to do that will in the face of every obstacle, the loftiest heroism; to suffer that will under its most afflicting dispensations in unobtrusive privacy, the noblest martyrdom.

Mr. QUITMAN. For more than twenty years I had been upon terms of personal friendship, and, at times, of intimate intercourse, with the late General THOMAS J. RUSK. I first met him in the spring of 1836, fresh from the victorious field of San Jacinto, when the war-cry of "Remember the Alamo" had scarcely ceased to reverberate from the hills of Texas. The distinguished leader in that important and decisive battle, now a member of the Senate, having been severely wounded, relinquished the command of the army, and General Rusk, then Secretary of War, was appointed to that high and responsible station. About the middle of May he set out, with the army under his command, to follow up the retreating columns of the Mexican general, Filisola, and to see that the latter faithfully performed the stipulations entered into with the Government of Texas, of thoroughly evacuating the country. On a portion of that march, I had the honor of sharing the hospitable tent of my distinguished friend. Subsequently, in 1840, when Texas, with no resources but the patriotism and indomitable spirit of her inhabitants, was threatened with another formidable invasion from Mexico, I had free correspondence with the lamented deceased. From our first acquaintance to the melancholy termination of his earthly career, every day but added to my respect for his public character, and my warm regard for his private virtues.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to attempt even a sketch of the public services, or private life and character of the deceased. That has already been ably done, as far as the limits of a eulogy on this floor will admit, by the gentlemen who have preceded me. I desire only to add a leaf to the garland which we are about to deposit on the cold tomb of the hero, statesman, and friend. His name will ever occupy a prominent place in the brief, but eventful history of the Republic of the Lone Star. He was one of those noble spirits who, looking forward into the future destiny of America with a soul conscious of right, and disregarding the denunciations of the selfish and narrow-minded, dared to join the people of Texas in their infant struggles for political independence. He stood by her in the hour of her trials. He watched over her when her borders were threatened Indian hordes, by and Mexican squadrons. From first to last, he was the efficient friend of the annexation of that splendid country to the United States; and when, in spite of all the efforts of foreign nations, and of short-sighted politicians in our own country, the Lone Star was added to the bright American constellation, the grateful State of Texas sent him as one of her representatives to the Senate of the United States. From that time the name of THOMAS J. RUSK has become a part of our own history.

Among the "conscript fathers" of the land, his strong intellect, his clear judgment, his manifest integrity of purpose, and his devotion to the duties of his station, soon secured for him not only the respect of his associates, but an elevated standing in that august body. Before the close of his second term, he was elected their temporary presiding officer.

His private character was without a stain. To stern integrity, fearless candor, and a high sense of honor, he united the positive virtues of benevolence, charity, and hospitality. The poor, the unprotected, and the distressed, never appealed to him without receiving succor and consolation. But I will say no more. The name and fame of THOMAS J. RUSK belong to history, and to it his friends consign them.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. It is my privilege, Mr. Speaker, upon this occasion of national sorrow, to add a few words expressive of the sentiments of that portion of the people of the Union I have the honor in part to represent.

You have heard from one of the Representatives of that State whose early liberties he aided in achieving; from a Representative of that other State which added to her ancient renown by giving him birth; and from the friends of his youth and his manhood, the tribute of praise, clad in the language of eloquence and affection.

But, sir, there are scenes when the geographical lines which permit us at times to address each other as northern men and southern men vanish from view; and it is one of them when, discarding the prejudices of birth and education and unmindful of the particular place in this now silent Hall where party lines may locate us, we gather as common mourners around the grave of an American statesman. We forget, in the sadness of the hour, the especial measures of public policy which, in his lifetime, he advocated, or the particular section of the country with which his personal sympathies were allied, and mourn together because of the public loss inflicted, and the national glory eclipsed.

Mr. Speaker, when the intelligence first came upon the North that General Rusk was no longer in existence, but had passed from earth mid the gloom which occasionally settled upon his life, a thrill of sorrow ran through the heart of every man you met. We bethought ourselves of his place in the councils of the nation, and of the long years of honorable service by which that place had been won. We remembered how that eventful period in American history, which witnessed the early struggles of the people of Texas for constitutional freedom, found him dwelling among them. We reflected how natural it was that his young affections should have allied themselves with those of a people many of whom had, like himself, wandered from the land of Washington; and how impossible it was that chains of governmental tyranny, such as those their fathers had broken, should be forged anew upon men who had breathed the air of America, and had listened in their cradles to the wonderful story of her Revolution.

We fancied, Mr. Speaker, that we saw again the future Senator of Texas standing strong and undismayed before the walls of San Antonio, with the freshness of youth upon his brow, and the fire of a truer courage than the days of ancient chivalry had witnessed gleaming in his eye.

We also remembered the Alamo; and, as it were, heard again the shouts which heralded the birth of an empire. We followed the little band of brave men from the field in which their victory had been won, and saw them gather the charred remains of the heroes of Goliad; and, with pious sympathy and tears, deposit them beneath the stained earth, whose humblest sod, with nothing but the dew-drops of the morning to gild it, is a grander monument than that which to-day tells the story of Austerlitz; and we listened again to the strains of eloquence which flowed from the lips of the weeping soldier.

While, Mr. Speaker, the scenes of that extraordinary conflict were, one by one, again flashing back upon our vision, we remembered how, when the last victory had been secured, and Texas had earned her place among the nations of the earth, one of the noble men who had founded her empire was willing to bestow that empire upon the nation of his birth.

We were reminded of that immortal man in whose gentle footsteps he had chosen to tread; and lamented almost that the opportunity had been denied us to bestow equal honors upon one of the heroes of a revolution second only to that from which our liberties sprung.

Such, Mr. Speaker, were some of the reflections of the people among whom I live, when we were told of the death of the man whose loss to his family and to his country the Representatives of the nation deplore. He was a southern man; but, as other northern and southern men have done, he employed the labors of his life to give strength and honor to the American Union.

Like other statesmen of America, while representing in our Senate the special interests of a southern State, his comprehension was large enough, and his patriotism was warm enough, to enable him to uphold and strengthen the pillars of the Republic.

The measure of his fame was full; for he was fortunate enough to have been enabled, by the aid of that Providence which superintends the affairs of men, to write his name imperishably upon the history of his country. He was fortunate, sir, to have been, during the bright years of his manhood, the compeer, in the Senate, of those remarkable men whose names, as I speak, crowd upon your memory, while the sounds of their voices seem still to linger in the arches of yonder Hall. With them, he will live in the grateful remembrance of our people till the language which they spoke shall be lost to mankind, or the Republic whose genius they illustrated shall have perished from oblivion of the lessons they taught.

Mr. Speaker, I had not an intimate personal acquaintance with General Rusk, but he was known to me as he is known to thousands of my fellow-citizens of the North, by the record of his life, and by his able and honest performance of the public trusts he bore.

But I may be permitted to say here, in the presence of witnesses of his daily life, that in the discharge of those trusts he acquired a fame for integrity of purpose and conduct and character, unsurpassed in a body of men by no means undistinguished in the estimation of the country for their unyielding resistance to those temptations which beset our public men in the Halls of Congress.

I may be further permitted to say—and I can utter no higher praise—that no man who knew him even for a moment doubted that every promise which he made would be implicitly and specifically performed, and that every word which he spoke was true.

His great marked characteristics were courage, honesty, and truth; and without intending to diminish the honors of the dead, or to detract from the just fame of living men, I may say that no man has appeared in public life during the past half century (teeming as it does with remembrances of truly great and good men) in whom those particular features of individual character which the general sentiment of mankind pronounces essential to the fame that can live, were more strongly and strikingly exhibited.

We cannot forget, Mr. Speaker, that simplicity of demeanor which marked his intercourse with his fellow-men, and which developed the highest degree of personal dignity.

When he addressed his fellow-men, he practiced that directness of statement which rises superior to the learning of the schools, and convinces by the force of an infallible geometry—and that unswerving truth, which in a public or private man, accomplishes more than the combined fascinations of genius and of art. He was eloquent because he was true.

His mind was cast in that fortunate mold which exhibits the harmonious blending of quickness of perception with a slow and careful judgment. His will was so strong and firm, that he could adhere fixedly to the purpose to which that judgment impelled him.

His temper was replete with a spirit of kindness which shed a sweet fragrance over his path in life.

I must be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to advert to him as a husband and father; for great as he was in those traits of character which distinguish the soldier and the statesman, he was almost without a peer in those kindlier elements and forms which make a man the idol of his home. The indulgences of personal ambition, the unbroken labors of long personal service, and all the varied and engrossing cases of a life of unusual action and unusual honor, were unable to render him for a single hour cold or indifferent to those who now cluster around his desolate hearth, and upon whose sorrow I will not intrude.

The language of eulogy has no grateful sounds for them. All that remains is to associate with us in the adoration with sympathy and affection of the public and private virtues of their father. He has already been welcomed to the phalanx of the great and good men of America, where, in a clearer and purer light than was vouchsafed to them on earth, they read the future destiny of the country.

The resolutions were then unanimously adopted; and the House (at fifteen minutes after three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. P. D. GURLEY, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanied by seventy-five copies of the official Army Register, for the year 1858; which was read.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report from the Commissioner of Patents, showing the operations of the Patent Office during the year ending the 31st of December, 1857; and a motion of Mr. STUART to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented resolutions passed at the annual meeting of the Oneida County Agricultural Society, of New York, in favor of the endowment and maintenance of a college in each State and Territory of the United States, for instruction in agriculture and the mechanic arts; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Walter Nexsan, praying that the accounting officers may be directed to allow the pay received by him as an assistant to the purser at the navy-yard at New York; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Seneca, New York, praying the adoption of measures for the gradual and peaceful extinction of slavery; which was ordered to lie on the table.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. IVERSON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to change and regulate the mode of appointing cadets to the Military Academy at West Point, and to modify the laws in relation to said Academy.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. IVERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 75) to increase the efficiency of the Army and marine corps, by retiring disabled officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BIGGS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Jane Smith, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 73) authorizing Mrs. Jane Smith to enter certain lands in the State of Alabama. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of John Dick, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 70) for the relief of John Dick, of Florida. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph Menard, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 71) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize a relocation of land warrants Nos. 3, 4, and 5, granted by Congress to General La Fayette," approved February 26, 1845. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Daniel Whitney, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of J. Wilcox Jenkins, reported a bill (S. No. 74) for the relief of J. Wilcox Jenkins; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 9) for the compensation of R. R. Richards, late Chaplain to the United States penitentiary, for his salary up to 30th of June, 1857, reported it without amendment.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the usual number of copies of the Treasurer's annual accounts, sent to the Senate December 15, 1857, and the letter from the Second Auditor, sent to the Senate January 11, 1858, be printed for the use of this body.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES IN OREGON.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to communicate to the Senate the report of J. Ross Browne, special agent of the Indian department, on the late Indian war in Oregon and Washington Territories.

MEDAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. KENNEDY submitted the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee on the Library:

Resolved, That Congress shall authorize the establishment of a medal department in the United States Mint, at Philadelphia, which shall be directed to make copies, in appropriate metals, from the medal dies preserved in the Mint, as well as from those which may hereafter be recovered or ordered by the Government.

Resolved, That Congress shall supply, through the Director of the Mint, the cabinets of each State, of each historical society, and of such other permanent associations as it may name, with complete series of all the United States medals, as gifts, perpetuating the memory of the individuals or of the actions they were intended to celebrate; and further, that the Director of the Mint be authorized to dispose of copies of said medals in gold, silver, or bronze, to individuals or societies, under such regulations and at such rates as he, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (S. No. 50) to authorize the issuing of a register to the bark Jehu.

HENRY VOLCKER.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of Mr. STUART to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 39) to confirm the title of Henry Volcker to a certain tract of land in New Mexico, was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. STUART. After the adjournment of the Senate yesterday, I took occasion to examine the papers in his case, and I shall submit to the Senate, in a very few words, the result of that examination, from which I think it will appear that the applicant has no right whatever to the relief which he asks. The substance of the case is this: a man by the name of Simon Prado claimed a head-right under a law of Texas, passed in 1836, for a residence in the Territory of three years, he being a single man. The law provided that a man residing there three years with a family, and performing certain citizen's services, should have twelve hundred and eighty acres of land, and that a single man residing there the same length of time, should have six hundred and forty acres. This Simon Prado went before the proper authorities there, as the papers show, and proved his residence under that law, and received a certificate for six hundred and forty acres of land. That certificate was issued to him in 1846. The same day, or the next day, he sold it to George Voss; on the following day George Voss sold it to another, and some time after, that other person sold it to Henckel, and Henckel to Schumann, and Schumann to the present applicant.

It seems that the certificate could be located on any public land belonging to the Republic of Texas within her territory. There was no attempt to make any location of the certificate until 1850. The papers show that in July, 1850, a survey was made for a man by the name of Paschal. There is set up here what seems to be a chain of title, but it nowhere appears that Paschal had any right or interest whatever in the certificate. The papers show a transcript from the records of Texas. They show a chain of title from Prado to this man Volcker, but nowhere in that chain of title does Paschal ever appear to have been an owner. This is fatal. No man who ever held any interest in the certificate has had any survey made, or has located it. The object of this bill seems to give to the present holder of the certificate, as he claims, a patent for the land thus surveyed.

There are other difficulties, and they will be deemed fatal, I think, by the mind of any gentleman who will examine these papers. The papers certified here are peculiar. The officer certifying them says, that he certifies the transcript from the record with the erasures and interlineations. I beg the attention of the Senate to that point, because it appears that this man Paschal, and a person by the name of Pruder, owned the survey; that it was made for them jointly; but Pruder's name is stricken out, erased, and the plural which was in the original is changed to the singular, to correspond with Paschal.

Again, there was never any attempt made to place these papers on record, according to the laws of Texas, until 1851. This certificate was given in 1846, but never until 1851 was there any attempt to place the papers on the record. Then it appears that Volcker writes a note to the register of the proper county, notifying him that he holds a certificate, and not to have a patent issued to anybody else. Upon that the register certifies that up to that time there has been no record whatever of that certificate, or any proceedings under it made. Up to 1851, there was no attempt to put it on record agreeably to the laws of Texas; but in that year, after Texas had become a State in this Confederacy, after the boundary had been adjusted by which this land belonged to the United States, and fell within the Territory of New Mexico, then this present holder seeks to patch up a title.

It is somewhat curious to look at this title. One of the deeds is signed by a man making his mark, and it has two witnesses. This was done in 1846; and in 1851 there is an attempt to prove the execution of that deed. A witness is called before the chief justice, who undertakes to swear to the execution. He is not of the same name as the witness who signed the deed. The witness who signed the deed is named Blumberg, or some such name, and the witness that is sworn is named Blumenberg. What does he swear to? Not that he saw the man execute the deed; he does not swear that he saw him sign the papers, but he swears that he heard the man expressing himself that he had signed that paper; and what is a little more remarkable, he swears twice. There is nothing appearing in the record to show why it was done; but this same witness is examined twice, and he swears upon two different occasions, and upon two different occasions it is certified, for the purpose of having that paper recorded.

The consideration stated to have been given for the land is a little peculiar. One, or perhaps two, of these conveyances is stated to be upon the consideration of fifty dollars. I think the first two conveyances were for fifty dollars. The next one was for fifty-five dollars, and another one is for the past consideration of two mules. Those are the considerations specified in the deeds.

I must say that I presume my honorable friend from Louisiana, in the great press of business he has here, being upon three or four committees, has not had time to give this case that attention which otherwise he would have given to it; but I submit that a careful inspection of these papers will show most clearly that the present claimant, as late as 1851, long after Texas had ceased to make any pretension of claim to this land, has sought to patch up a case—and badly done, too—for the purpose of getting six hundred and forty acres of saline land. That is the character of the land. If it were necessary, I think it could be shown very clearly that the object of the law of Texas was to give agricultural land to agriculturists who came and lived there three years and performed certain citizen duties. But it is not necessary in this case. I consider the very first statement I made as perfectly fatal; that no man connected with the title to this certificate has ever had any survey made under it. There is nothing to identify this certificate except the name of Prado and the number of the certificate, 169. It is conveyed all the while from one to another by a description of the certificate, No. 169.

Now, sir, when you see such evident forgeries as these are, clear forgeries in the papers, and all that done at one time, in 1851, and see that to make out this survey to be a survey by Mr. Paschal, the name of Mr. Pruder is stricken out; and when it will also be seen by examination that he claims to have a title to this same certificate under a man by the name of Houston, who does not appear at all in these papers—Houston's name is stricken out—it must be obvious that it is a clear case of undertaking to patch up a claim that has no foundation in fact or equity. This case appeals to the Government of the United States on the principles of equity. It is not a case of fee-simple title, which under the law of nations is not affected by a transfer of the jurisdiction; but it is a case of equitable claim to some land somewhere addressed to the United States as being the successors of Texas in the jurisdiction over what is now New Mexico.

I could, if it were not for detaining the Senate, refer to these papers seriatim, and show conclusively all the facts I have stated. They are palpable on the face of the papers. But as I have said, I think it is perfectly sufficient to show, as a reason why the United States should not order a patent for this land, that no man has had a survey made of the land and a location of the land, who is shown to have any connection with the title whatever.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, I have listened to my friend from Michigan with very great surprise, indeed. One would suppose that the question now before the Senate was a question involving the rights of individuals, each claiming this tract of land; and the Senator has made an argument as though he were before a court or jury, establishing the title of his client to the tract.

The proposition before the Senate is not the establishment of the title of A or B to a particular tract of land, but it is the relinquishment of any apparent Government title to the land. I am surprised at some of the assertions made by the honorable Senator. The papers which he has before him, and which he says he himself has examined, show conclusively these facts, at all events, and they are not contested by the honorable Senator, that a head-right was issued by the Republic of Texas, granting to the party under whom the present claimant derives his title, six hundred and forty acres of land. The Senator comments on the fact of this title passing from hand to hand, as if it were not a matter of daily occurrence with us, that the land warrants which we have issued for bounty to the soldiers, in the different wars of the Republic, also pass from hand to hand, as merchandise, day by day. These head-rights gave power to the different parties who might establish their claim to them, either to sell the certificates themselves, or to make locations of the land and sell the land. The different persons settled in Texas at that time, for the greater part, took possession of the head-rights, and sold them out. The gentleman is astonished at six hundred and forty acres being first sold for fifty, and afterwards for fifty-five dollars, and then for two mules. I can assure the honorable Senator that he can get many and many a similar tract now, on the western frontier, for just such considerations; that with fifty dollars, or fifty-five dollars, or two mules, it will be in his power to purchase head-rights on the western frontier; but that does not at all touch the right in the party.

There is nothing suspicious, nothing unusual in this. The whole case before the Senate is simply this, and I cannot divine whence arises the opposition. Texas issued a head-right in favor of an individual. That head-right is not contested at all by the honorable Senator; that it is genuine is not disputed. This head-right was located before that former portion of Texas, which is now a part of New Mexico, was transferred to the United States. At the time of the transfer to the United States, nothing was wanting but the simple issue of a patent. The land had been located; it had been surveyed; the survey had been approved and recorded. But the gentleman says that, in 1851, after the transfer to the United States, an attempt is made to fabricate some title to this particular tract. If there is any party claiming that his rights, by papers subsequent to the date of this survey, have been imperiled or invaded, the gentleman's argument would be perfectly unanswerable; but there is nobody claiming this tract except the present petitioner. If there be any other private claimant, his rights are reserved by the very terms of the bill itself. The bill does not purport to convey the land to this individual irrespective of the rights of any other private claimant. It is a relinquishment of the title of the Government of the United States.

The Senator says that we appeal to the equity of Congress in asking the passage of this bill. Now, sir, I undertake to say that, according to the adjudications of the Supreme Court of the United States, this patent would issue in a suit at law—not simply in a case in chancery, but in a suit at law. The Supreme Court of the United States have held, over and over again, in decisions which have been referred to by the committee in this report, that the private title to property in individuals is not divested by the change of allegiance to sovereigns. In this case, the Republic of Texas had parted with this land. It belonged to a private individual before the transfer of allegiance of that part of Texas to the Government of the United States. It now happens to be included within the limit of New Mexico, and by chance became so included before the issue of the paper title from Texas. Nothing was wanting before we acquired that part of Texas, to the perfection of the title, but the issuing of the paper patent, the mere evidence of title; and this individual comes forward and asks Congress to issue the paper, his title being complete before, but requiring something which will operate as evidence of title. All that created the title occurred prior to the cession of this portion of the Republic of Texas to the United States. There is nothing for Congress to do in the matter, but simply to authorize the Land Office to issue the paper title. If this Mr. Volcker, who now claims the land, shall turn out not to be in possession by a legal chain of title, then the patent which will issue to him will inure to the benefit of the true proprietor, according to well established rules of law. If he be not the true proprietor; if any of these conveyances of the original certificate to him should turn out to be fraudulent, and to be insufficient in law to divest the parties who, upon the face of the papers, appear to have sold it, the patent will then inure to their benefit. All that is now desired from the Government is, that it abandon its apparent legal title to the land, which in point of law does not exist. This is a claim for six hundred and forty acres of land. There is no doubt at all that, if you refuse to confirm this location, the party will have a right to locate elsewhere. I cannot conceive any interest in this Government to dispute a matter like this with one of its citizens.

The gentleman says there are salines on the land. It may be so. It may be for that very reason that the party, instead of applying for a different location in Texas, asks us to confirm his right. I know nothing of that fact. This man's title was placed in my hands by a Representative of the State of Texas in the other House; and on examination it appeared to me perfectly clear on the face of the papers that the Government of the United States had no right to refuse a relinquishment of its legal title, the equitable title certainly, at all events being out of the Government of the United States, and the bill upon its face not pretending to determine the rights of the proprietors, but merely purporting to be a relinquishment of the title of the Government. I take no interest in the bill, but it appears to me to be eminently just and proper; and having been reported by my committee, I have made these few observations to the Senate, and shall leave it without further remark.

Mr. PEARCE. My attention was called to this bill the other day, and I gave it some little examination. It struck me that the difficulty in the case of the applicant was this: there was undoubtedly a head-right issued to this Simon Prado, as mentioned by the Senator from Michigan, and there are successive alienations of his certificate; but there is a want of proof that this head-right was located on the lands which he claims to be his under an alleged location. There is no proof that these lands were ever located within that part of the territory claimed by Texas, which, under the compromise acts of 1850, belonged to the United States, under the boundary arrangement with Texas. There is no proof that this head-right was ever located on that spot for the benefit of Simon Prado or any of his assignees. The location is very poorly proved by anybody, or for anybody. There is a certificate by two gentlemen who appear to be chain-carriers; not the proper parties, I should think, to prove the location of a tract of land. Then there is a certificate from a deputy surveyor; but it does not appear that he was the one who made the survey and location, but he says it was made according to law. There is the certificate of another, who says he has examined the plat and field-notes, and finds them correct; but when we come to look at other papers, which are not included in the printed report, we find that the location was made for certain other parties, having no manner of connection with Simon Prado, or any of his assignees.

If Simon Prado or his assignees did not locate this particular tract by virtue of the head-right, which had been passed from him to them, neither he nor they have any claim to this land. The head-right may be very good, but the claim to the land must depend on the location of that head-right on the particular land claimed by them; and that location must either have been by them or for them, by some person authorized to locate for them. That is not the case here. It seems to me that is a fatal defect.

Other questions might arise if this had been located by Simon Prado, or by any of his assignees; but I will not go into them. I understand there are a great many other claims of the same sort that may come before the Senate, and I think it is very well to ascertain what is the validity of this, which is the first one, so far as I know, that has been presented for our consideration. I cannot, for my life, see how it is possible that any claim can be set up by Simon Prado or his assignees, unless it be proved that he or they, or some one of them, have caused this location to be made for them. That is not shown by the papers; and therefore I think the case utterly fails.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will simply read the certificate to the Senate. It appears to me that if we are going into these technicalities in the proceedings of the location of land on the western frontier, we might as well pass a general law confiscating the homesteads and titles to property of all our frontier citizens. It amounts simply to that—nothing more nor less. Here we have—

"Field-notes of a survey of six hundred and forty acres of land made for George H. Paschal, it being the land to which he is entitled by virtue of land certificate No. 169, second class, issued by the board of land commissioners for Bexar county, to Simon Prado, on the 5th day of January, anno Domini 1846."

"Said survey is No. 38, in section No. 15, situated on the table-lands or plain between the Rio Grande and the Pecos river. Beginning at a mound of earth raised for the north-west corner of this survey, twenty-five miles and nine hundred varas east, and two hundred and nine miles and sixteen hundred and twenty-five varas north, from the southwest corner of survey No. 1, made by Robert B. Hays, at the crossing of the Rio Grande at El Paso, from which another mound of earth bears east ten varas; thence east twelve hundred and fifty-five varas, entered the valley of the Salt Lake, known as 'La Salina,' nineteen hundred varas to a mound of earth on the bank of said lake, raised for the northeast corner of this survey, from which another mound of earth bears south ten varas; thence south nineteen hundred varas, crossing the eastern projection of said valley to a mound of earth raised for the southeast corner of this survey, from which another mound of earth bears north ten varas; thence west nineteen hundred varas, to a mound of earth raised for the southwest corner of this survey; thence north nineteen hundred varas, to the place of beginning; so as to cover and include said Salt Lake. Surveyed July 22, 1850.

"Bearings marked. No timber near.

BERNARDO MCGUIRE,
TENAS NASH,

Chain-Carriers.

"I, Joel L. Ankrim, deputy surveyor for Bexar district, do hereby certify that the survey designated by the foregoing plat and field-notes was made according to law, and that the limits, boundaries, and corners of the same, together with the marks, natural and artificial, are truly described therein.

"JOEL L. ANKRIM,
"Deputy Surveyor, Bexar District."

Then comes the surveyor himself:

"I, J. S. McDonald, district surveyor for Bexar district, do hereby certify that I have examined the foregoing plat and field-notes, and find them correct, and that they are recorded in my office in book A, No. 5, page 367.

"J. S. McDONALD,
"District Surveyor, Bexar District."

"SAN ANTONIO, November 16, 1850."

Now, sir, the objection made is, that amongst the title papers filed by this party who claims the confirmation, the Senators who have examined these papers have not found by what authority George H. Paschal had this location made. To that I answer that if there be an absence in the papers of proof of such authority, the question is not one between George H. Paschal and Volcker, because the rights of all private individuals are saved by the bill, and it would be a violent presumption for us to say that George H. Paschal, without any interest whatever in this certificate, took the trouble to go upon the land and have it surveyed. He must have had an interest in the title at the time. After all, it was not so very valuable a matter, according to the statement of the Senator from Michigan. A tract of land which was sold twice for fifty dollars, and the third time for fifty-five dollars, and the fourth time for a pair of mules, probably would not justify them in incurring any very extraordinary expense in proving up their chain of title here, it not being dreamed by anybody that, after the title had reached this point, when, under the authority of the Republic of Texas itself, nothing more was required than to apply to the State office to get a patent, that objection would be made here.

It may be that other claims of this kind are pending; but I have not heard of them. This is the only one I have come across in my service on the Committee on Private Land Claims. It really appears to me that the objections are such as would be fatal in point of law, if this man were proving up a title against adverse claimants; but they have nothing whatever to do with the question whether the Government of the United States ought justly to relinquish its legal title in the land.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Louisiana expresses a great deal of surprise at the views I have submitted here; but I am inclined to believe that if his surprise is well-founded, I have been so unfortunate as not to make myself at all understood; because, if I have, I should be no less surprised at the reply of the Senator from Louisiana. You may illustrate this case by one of our own land warrants. Suppose a man comes to Congress, and asks for a patent to be granted to him in virtue of a land warrant located upon one hundred and sixty acres of land: must he not show that either he, or some other former holder of the land warrant, has located it upon the particular quarter section he claims? That is the point in this case.

The Senator says this is a simple question of whether the United States will relinquish its title to six hundred and forty acres of land. Relinquish it to whom? To some man who has a right to claim it? I should find no difficulty at all in this case, if it clearly appeared that this man had a right, under his certificate from the Republic of Texas, to this land; but the point is, that he never located it on this land at all. It appears that a survey was made of this land for Mr. Paschal and Mr. Pruder, and that Mr. Paschal and Mr. Pruder received their right from A. W. Houston; but neither A. W. Houston, nor Paschal, nor Pruder, appears to have ever had any interest in this head-right whatever. I have here the law of the Republic of Texas, which requires these things to be recorded. The very law under which this head-right was issued requires that it shall be recorded. The papers in this case sent up to the Senate contain a full and complete transcript of the record, and that transcript shows conclusively that no holder of this certificate ever located it at all.

I am not denying, for the purpose of presenting this case, that this is a good certificate, but I am denying that the certificate was ever located on this land. That is the difficulty. I come back to the case I took for illustration.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I understand he does not deny that Paschal located it on the land.

Mr. STUART. I do not deny that these papers show that Paschal had this land surveyed. I deny that he ever located the certificate on it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Surveyed under this certificate, under the head-right?

Mr. STUART. Precisely.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Does the Senator pretend that there is any other location required than to call on the surveyor to survey the land under the particular head-right?

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, I take this ground: as I have just said, the laws of Texas required a record of all these proceedings, of the transfer of ownership; a transcript of that record is here, and that transcript does not show that Paschal ever had any interest in the certificate. On the contrary, it shows a chain of title down to this claimant, Volcker, from other persons.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I want to get at the point at which we differ. I asked him if he denied that Paschal located? Does he admit that Paschal located? If he does, then the only point in the whole argument is that there has not yet been sufficient evidence that Paschal was once an owner. That is the whole point.

Mr. STUART. I was about to state it, if the Senator had not interrupted me. This claim must be founded on one line of argument or another. The Senator cannot found this claim upon a chain of title to the certificate which he says passed from hand to hand; but that is not so. By the laws of Texas, the transfers of that certificate were to become a part of the records of the proper county in the Republic of Texas. This man, Paschal, never having appeared as owner, of course we must conclude he never was an owner. Now, suppose any stranger had gone and had a survey made of that land, and said he made it under this certificate: what would that show? Nothing. He must show that he had a right to do it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I dislike very much to interrupt the Senator. If he will permit me, however, I will make one further suggestion, and say nothing more in the matter. These certificates are, to be sure, transferable by indorsement, which ought to be recorded; but the fact is well known, that in order to avoid the necessity of constant indorsements upon the certificate, the holder at any particular time was in the habit of making an assignment on the back of the certificate, leaving the name of the assignee in blank, which any holder might fill up at his pleasure; and, consequently, Paschal might very well have been the owner of this certificate at a particular time, without having filled in his name, and, after the location, passed it to Volcker or any other person, and then the name would be filled in; so that the location would be made by the party actually in possession of the certificate, although the fact of that possession might not appear upon the record.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. DOUGLAS, to refer so much of the annual message of the President of the United States as relates to the affairs of Kansas, to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in the remaining remarks which I propose to submit to the Senate, I shall confine myself to two points or positions assumed in a paper which I hold in my hand, called "A report of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the opinions of the Judges thereof, in the case of Dred Scott versus John F. A. Sandford," protesting, however, that I refrain from an examination of any more at this period, solely for the want of time. The first of these points is the affirmation by the Supreme Court of the United States that property in slaves is of the same right as all other property. The other is, that the right to hold and to traffic in this property, at the time of the American Revolution, and at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, was so universally acknowledged and recognized in the country from which we came, and in this country, that no man thought of disputing it. An extract to that effect, from the opinion of the court, has already been read from the desk by the clerk. To these two points I shall confine my remarks, contending, in the first place, that the legal proposition asserted by the court is unsound and untrue, and not supported by principle or authority, and that what purports to be a statement of facts is not supported by the truth of history.

The first proposition to which I have alluded is more distinctly and more fully expressed in the constitution which has been framed by the Lecompton convention, and I will read the statement as it is there expressed:

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase, is the same and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

I think the Lecompton convention have the advantage of the Supreme Court in one respect: they are a little more explicit. I have a higher respect for the Lecompton convention than I have for the Supreme Court; because the Lecompton convention have placed this principle distinctly on paper, and there is no mistaking what they mean, while the Supreme Court have decided the same thing, but have not quite so explicitly expressed it to the apprehension of the common ear. Now, sir, I undertake to maintain that the principle thus asserted is not true; and on this point I shall ask the attention of the Senate to some authorities; but before coming to the authorities, let me state what I believe on this subject.

I do not stand here to deny that legally there is such a thing as property in slaves. I am not discussing the moral question, but the legal one; and I do not stand here to deny that there is, in the States tolerating slavery, legal property in slaves; for, in the free States, we have a qualified property in the labor of human beings. In the State in which I live, criminals, if tried and found guilty, are sent to the penitentiary for the public good, and any individual may contract with the warden having the custody of the prisoners for their labor; and, if the Legislature see fit, he may take the prisoners anywhere within the jurisdiction of the State, and his right in the labor of those convicts is recognized, and will be protected by the State and by its authorities. But, if the man thus using the labor of convicts in the State of New Hampshire, should cross over the Connecticut river and undertake to quarry marble in the Green Mountains of Vermont, he would find that his property ceased the moment he got over the river, and that the right which he had acquired in New Hampshire, would not extend beyond the territorial limits of the State imposing the servitude. Just exactly and precisely that is the right which the owner of a slave has to his property. He has a right to the property within the jurisdiction which imposes the servitude; but the moment the slave goes beyond that, he is free. I do not rest this on my own assertion.

There is another right of property—a general property—and that is a property in inanimate things, and in the brute creation. A man has a property in a horse—a horse in Maryland, for instance—he goes with that horse from Maryland to Virginia, to Delaware, to any and to every State in the Union, traversing the Confederacy from one end to the other, and wherever and whenever he arrives in any one of the States his right to property in the horse is recognized universally. More than that, sir, he may go outside the limits of the Union, he may go into the British, the Mexican, or the Spanish possessions on this continent; he may go into the possessions of the savage tribes; and wherever he finds a community of men, civilized or savage, there his right of property in the horse will be recognized. Nay, sir, he may take that horse across the Atlantic, he may traverse all the kingdoms of Europe, civilized and savage and semi-savage, and every where he will find his right of property recognized. He may go, if he pleases, to the frozen regions of the north pole, and may come down from there till he pants beneath the vertical rays of the tropical sun, and the horse is his; and the tribunals of the countries where he goes will vindicate his right. Why? Is it because each and every of these States has a statute declaring that a man shall have property in a horse? No, sir. I apprehend there is no such statute in any one of them. The reason is because, by the universal consent of mankind, a horse is the subject of property; and when the horse was made, he was made to be property, and man was made to own him. It rests upon no statute and upon no speculation of philosophy. It goes back to the earliest period of recorded time. When the Almighty created this broad earth and gave it to man for a home, He gave it to him to cultivate; He filled the land with cattle and the sea with fish and the air with fowls; then He made man and He gave him this commission: "have thou dominion over the fish of the sea and the fowls of the air and the cattle and over every creeping thing that creeps on the earth." But man, sir, immortal man—made in the image of God—He never said, "have thou dominion over him." No; He reserved that last great work, man, for His own peculiar worship.

That is the distinction. It is a distinction that has been recognized by every writer who has ever written upon the subject. It has been acknowledged by every court where civilization has instituted courts. It has been acknowledged by no States more freely, more readily, more decisively, than by the slaveholding States of this Union, as I shall show by a reference to decisions in Virginia, Maryland, and Louisiana. More, sir; the doctrines of the locality of slavery, and the distinction between slave property and other property, has been recognized, without a dissenting voice, by the unanimous, uncontradicted concurrence of every member of that court called the Supreme Court of the United States.

The first authority to which I ask the attention of the Senate on this point, is the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the somewhat famous case of Prigg vs. the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to be found in 16 Peters, 594; 14 Curtis, 421. The court say:

"By the general law of nations, no nation is bound to recognize the state of slavery as found within its territorial dominions, where it is in opposition to its own policy and institutions, in favor of the subjects of other nations where slavery is organized. If it does it, it is as a matter of comity, and not as a matter of international right. The state of slavery is deemed to be a mere municipal regulation, founded upon and limited to the range of the territorial laws."

The court then proceed to quote several cases recognizing this principle. Judge McLean, in his opinion in the Dred Scott case, 19 Howard, 140, after quoting that authority, proceeds to say:

"There was some contrariety of opinion among the judges on certain points ruled in Prigg's case, but there was none in regard to the great principle, that slavery is limited to the range of the laws under which it is sanctioned."

That, then, was the deliberate, solemn opinion of the court, collectively and individually. The same doctrine is recognized in Jones vs. Vanzandt, 2 McLean, circuit court reports, page 596, where the learned judge says:

"Slavery is local in its character. It depends upon the municipal law of the States where it is established; and if a person held to slavery go beyond the jurisdiction where he is so held, and into another sovereignty where slavery is not tolerated, he becomes free; and this would be the law of these States, had the Constitution of the United States adopted no regulation upon the subject."

This would have been the law of the States, had there been no regulation in the Constitution of the United States to the contrary; and more than that, the framers of the Constitution, each and every one of them, so understood the law. They understood the law to be, at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, that a person held to service or labor by virtue of the local law of the State in which he was held, and going into another State, became free; and to prevent the operation of that general principle, they inserted this provision:

"That no person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor is due."

Why this negative introduced into the Constitution, declaring that a man should not be free by going from one State to another, if the men who framed that instrument had not understood that the law was so? Then, here is the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the decision of the circuit court over which Judge McLean presides. I will now read a decision from Martin's Louisiana Reports. In Lunsford vs. Coquillon, 2 Martin, new series, 401, the supreme court of Louisiana decided, according to the head note:

"If the owner of a slave remove her from Kentucky to Ohio, animo morandi, she becomes free, ipso facto."

In the course of the opinion, the court say:

"We conclude that the constitution of the State of Ohio emancipates, ipso facto, such slaves whose owners remove them into that State with the intention of residing there; that the plaintiff having been voluntarily removed into that State by her then owner, the latter submitted himself, with every member of his family, white and black, and every part of the property brought with him, to the operations of the constitution and laws of the State; and that, as according to them, slavery could not exist in his house—slavery did not exist there, and the plaintiff was accordingly as effectually emancipated, by the operation of the constitution, as if by the act and deed of her former owner."

The same doctrine is also found in another opinion of that same court—the supreme court of the State of Louisiana—only that this case is a great deal stronger. I read the case of Marie Louise vs. William C. Marot et al. The abstract of the case is:

"The fact of a slave being taken to the kingdom of France, or other country, by the owner, where slavery or involuntary servitude is not tolerated, operates on the condition of the slave, and produces immediate emancipation."

The court held in that decision, that, by taking a slave from Louisiana to France, where slavery was prohibited by law, the slave, ipso facto, became free; and when he came back into Louisiana, the master could not reduce the slave again to slavery. In another part of a recent decision, the Supreme Court of the United States have undertaken to say that the condition of slavery was only in a state of catalepsy while the slave was in a state of liberty; and that when he came back to a slave State, he could be again reduced to slavery; but such is not the doctrine of the court of Louisiana, and such has not been the doctrine of other courts.

I have also a case from the court of appeals of the State of Maryland, (4 Harris & McHenry, 418) where it appears that the petitioner stated his claim to freedom to arise under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania for the abolition of slavery; and in that case the court of Maryland held, that by taking a slave out of Maryland, and carrying him into Pennsylvania, he became free. He came back and resided in Maryland, but the court gave validity to the abolition of slavery by the fact of his master carrying him into Pennsylvania, and he became free. All these decisions proceed on the assumption that slavery is local in its character.

Now, sir, I have a case from the State of Virginia, which I think is stronger than any of those which I have read. In Hunter vs. Fulcher, 1 Leigh, 172, I find this decision:

"By statute of Maryland of 1796, all slaves brought into that State to reside are declared free. A Virginia-born slave is carried by his master to Maryland; the master settles there, and keeps the slave there in bondage for twelve months, the statute in force all the time; then he brings him as a slave to Virginia, and sells him there. Adjudged in an action brought by the man against the purchaser, that he is free."

So that you will see it is not the free States who alone have offended in this matter by abolishing your title to slaves when they come into their territory; but as long ago as 1796, the State of Maryland manumitted the slave of every man who came to reside there with his master. A planter went from Virginia into Maryland, and resided there with his slave until the slave became free; and then went back into Virginia, and undertook to reduce the slave to his possession again; but the highest court in Virginia held that by going into Maryland, the slave became free, and by going back to Virginia he did not again return to a state of servitude. That is the doctrine of Virginia.

Let me state one other authority. I have a still stronger case. It is Fulton vs. Lewis, 3 Harris & Johnson, a case in the court of appeals in Maryland:

"At the trial the following facts were admitted in evidence: John Levant, a married man, being a native and resident of the Island of Saint Domingo, removed from that place in July, 1793, flying from disturbances which then existed there, endangering the lives and property of the inhabitants, and brought with him into this State three negroes, of whom the petitioner (now appellee) is one, whom he then and before owned as a slave. That in May, 1794, he sold the petitioner, as a slave, to William Clemm, who sold him as such to the defendant, (the appellant.) That said Levant arrived at Baltimore in August, 1793, and continued to reside there until sometime in 1796, when he returned to the West Indies. The defendant thereupon prayed the direction of the court to the jury, that, if they believed the facts, the petitioner was not entitled to his freedom. This opinion the court, [Scott, Chief Justice,] refused to give, but directed the jury that upon these facts the petitioner was free. The defendant excepted; and the verdict and judgment being against him, he appealed to this court, where the case was argued before Chase, Chief Justice, and Buchanan, Nicholson, Earle, Johnson, and Martin, Justices.

Glenn, for the appellant, contended that the act of 1783, chapter 23, under which the petitioner claimed his freedom, meant only a voluntary importation of slaves, and not an importation arising from absolute necessity, produced by causes over which the owner, as in this case, had and could have no control."

But the judgment was affirmed, and the slave went free. Notwithstanding he came into Maryland by a tempest, by the act of Providence, and not by the voluntary act of his master, so stringently did the State of Maryland construe this right of property in slaves as a local right, that they determined that even when the act of God, contrary to the consent of his master, brought the slave there, he became free; and so they gave him his freedom.

In the opinion delivered by Judge Curtis, in the Dred Scott case, he read a dissenting opinion from the late ruling in the State of Missouri. That dissenting opinion was pronounced by Judge Gamble, who said:

"In this State [Missouri] it has been recognized, from the beginning of the Government, as a correct position in law, that the master who takes his slave to reside in a State or Territory where slavery is prohibited, thereby emancipates his slave."

Judge Curtis goes on to say:

"Chief Justice Gamble has also examined the decisions of the courts of other States in which slavery is established, and finds them in accordance with these preceding decisions of the supreme court of Missouri to which he refers."

"It would be a useless parade of learning for me to go over the ground which he has so fully and ably occupied."

In the opinion delivered by Judge McLean, in the Dred Scott case, he declares:

"There is no nation in Europe which considers itself bound to return to his master a fugitive slave, under the civil law or the law of nations. On the contrary, the slave is held to be free where there is no treaty obligation, or compact in some other form, to return him to his master. The Roman law did not allow freedom to be sold. An ambassador, or any other public functionary, could not take a slave to France, Spain, or any other country of Europe, without emancipating him. A number of slaves escaped from a Florida plantation, and were received on board of ship by Admiral Cochrane; by the King's Bench they were held to be free."

He mentions, also, a case that was decided as late, I think, as 1823, in the Court of King's Bench, which is found in 3 Dowling & Ryland, page 679—Forbes vs. Cochrane. Lord Chief Justice Best, in delivering the opinion in that case, says:

"The right of slavery is not a general right; it is a local right; it is spoken of by every writer that has ever written upon the subject as a local right."

Judge Best had not read the Lecompton constitution, nor the Dred Scott decision. He could not say now what he said then, that every writer that had ever written on this subject had treated it as a local right. In the same opinion, says the learned judge:

"Slavery is a local law; and if a man wishes to preserve his slaves, let him attach them to himself by ties of affection, or make fast the bars of their prison; for the moment they get beyond his local limits, they have broken their chains and have recovered their liberty."

That same judge goes further, and says:

"I go further; if a slave, acting upon his newly-acquired rights of a free man, had determined to vindicate the rights of his nature, and had said, 'I will not be forced back into a state of slavery,' and his death had ensued upon his resistance, it would have been murder in every individual who had contributed to that death."

The same judge, speaking of the slave, says:

"Whatever he may owe to the local law is got rid of the moment he gets beyond the local limit."

Speaking of an assertion that Mansfield was said to have made, that an action might be maintained on a contract for the sale of a slave in England, Chief Justice Best says:

"I can only say that I have searched with all the industry of which I am master, and that I can find no such decision."

This was a suit brought for the recovery of certain slaves that escaped from Florida to Admiral Cochrane, and the judge expressed some doubts, or, at least, said it was not proved that slavery existed in Florida; but he says:

"If it did prevail there it is a local law; it is an anti-Christian law, and it cannot be extended beyond the limits of its own State, nor be recognized in a country like this, where the courts of justice are regulated according to the law of nature and the revealed law of God."

That was the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, in England, as late as 1822. I have shown you, by these quotations and these opinions, that up to the rendering of the opinion in the Dred Scott case, it was the law of these States severally; it was the law of the Supreme Court of the United States; it was the law of the highest judicial tribunal in England, that the moment a slave escapes from the territorial limits of the jurisdiction which imposes the state of servitude upon him, that moment he becomes free; and that in the exercise of the rights of freedom which he acquires by stepping out from beyond the local limits of the jurisdiction which impose slavery upon him, he is a man—to all intents and purposes a man; and if an attempt is made by anybody claiming the right to reduce him to slavery, to take him, and he resists and dies, the death of that slave is murder in every man who contributed to bring about that result.

Sir, these are the great settled principles of the law, and they are not to be shaken to-day by any judicial assumption, or any legal quackery on this subject. They stand immovable and immutable as the eternal foundations of truth. While civilized society maintains its tribunals and its organization, these principles will stand, and the Supreme Court of the United States will find that, like the waves of the ocean, they toss themselves against the rock-bound shores; but they toss themselves in vain, only to fall back whence they came. These are positions which cannot be shaken. They rest not only upon law, but upon humanity; upon reason; upon every conviction which belongs to human nature, and to a common manhood.

Having disposed of that part of the case—and I think I have gone far enough, so that any school-boy in the free States, who has been to our common schools long enough to read, may confute and refute, and confound forever the gross assumption of this court—I now proceed to the other point to which I proposed to address a few remarks, and that was, that at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution slavery was so universally acknowledged and practiced upon, that nobody thought of questioning it. The Supreme Court say:

"It was regarded as an axiom in morals, as well as in politics, which no one thought of disputing, or supposed to be open to dispute; and men in every grade and position in society daily and habitually acted upon it in their private pursuits, as well as in matters of public concern, without doubting for a moment the correctness of this opinion."

The "opinion" here alluded to was "that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit;" and they add:

"And in no nation was this opinion more firmly fixed or more uniformly acted upon than by the English Government and English people."

How is that? I believe the Supreme Court have not decided that the Revolution did not take place in 1776; or that the Declaration of Independence was not made about that time; but at the commencement of the eighteenth century, about the year 1704, this opinion was rendered by Lord Holt, in the case of Smith vs. Gould, reported in 2 Lord Raymond's Reports, 1274, which was an action of trover for a negro. Lord Holt, speaking for the whole court, says:

"This action does not lie for a negro no more than for any other man, for the common law takes no notice of negroes being different from other men."

And in Salkeld's report of the same case, (2 Salkeld, 666,) the same learned judge says:

"Men may be the owners of property, and therefore cannot themselves be the subject of property."

That was one hundred and fifty years ago. Then we come down to 1772, and we find Lord Chief Justice Mansfield deciding the Somerset case. I will read that decision:

"The state of slavery is of such a nature that it is incapable of being introduced on any reasons, moral or political, but only by positive law, which preserves its force long after the reason, occasion, and time itself, from whence it was created, is erased from the memory. It is so odious that nothing can be suffered to support it but positive law. Whatever inconveniences, therefore, may follow from the decision, I cannot say this case is allowed or approved by the laws of England, and therefore the black must be discharged."

That was the law of England in 1772. Going back to the commencement of the century, and coming down to 1772, we find the same doctrine held. In the opinion I have already read of Chief Justice Best, he says, that with the best industry he could give to the subject, he had never found that a contract for the sale of a slave was allowed in England. These were the doctrines of the courts. I have another authority, which I do not propose to put in as a judicial authority, but I propose to put it in to answer that part of the opinion of the Supreme Court in which they say this doctrine had never been questioned by anybody. I show you that it had been questioned by the judicial tribunals; it had been questioned by Lord Holt; it had been questioned by Lord Mansfield; and, in 1790, immediately after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the great orator of Ireland, [John Philpot Curran,] speaking before a British court, said:

"I speak in the spirit of the British law, which makes liberty commensurate with, and inseparable from, the British soil—which proclaims even to the stranger and the sojourner, the moment he sets his foot upon British earth, that the ground on which he treads is holy, and consecrated by the genius of universal emancipation. No matter in what language his doom may have been pronounced; no matter what complexion incompatible with freedom an Indian or an African sun may have burnt upon him; no matter in what disastrous battle his liberty may have been cloven down; no matter with what solemnities he may have been devoted upon the altar of slavery; the first moment he touches the sacred soil of Britain, the altar and the god sink together in the dust; his soul walks abroad in her own majesty; his body swells beyond the measure of his chains that burst from around him; and he stands redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled, by the irresistible Genius of Universal Emancipation."

And yet, sir, in the face of these glowing declarations, of these sublime enunciations, of these eloquent tributes to the great principle of liberty, your Supreme Court have come down from their bench, gone into the political arena, and commenced their career by declaring that the right to hold and to trade in slaves, at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, was so universally recognized and practiced upon, that no man thought of questioning it. I have shown you that it was questioned in England; that there were men high in position there, occupying exalted places in the kingdom of Great Britain, who had questioned the rightfulness of the traffic in slaves, and the right to hold slaves. I beg Senators to bear in mind the exact question which I am arguing. I am not introducing these instances here for idle declamation. I am not introducing them as part of an anti-slavery discourse; but I am introducing them to prove to the Senate, to the country, and to the world, that when they undertake to say that the right to hold and to traffic in slaves was unquestioned, they state that which cannot be sustained by history.

Now, sir, how was it in this country? The Supreme Court say that this right was so well understood in this country, so universally acceded to, that even the great and sublime truths which are embodied in the Declaration of Independence, which, if they were uttered to-day, would be held to embrace all mankind, did not embrace them at that time, because the opposite sentiment, that it was right to hold slaves, was so universal, so unquestioned, and so unquestionable, that nobody thought of questioning it. I have been at some little pains to ascertain what the views of some of the men in this country about the time of the Revolution, and about the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, were. I begin with North Carolina. I took that State first, because a distinguished Senator from that State [Mr. Briggs] was in the chair yesterday, and I did not know but that he would be to-day; and I wanted to compliment him by putting his own State first. The first Provincial Congress of North Carolina, held at Newbern on the 24th of August, 1774, resolved—

"That we will not import any slave or slaves, or purchase any slave or slaves imported or brought into this Province by others, from any part of the world, after the 1st day of November next."

That authority is to be found in the American Archives, fourth series, first volume, page 735. Again, the Continental Congress of the United States, October 20, 1774, formed an association or agreement, consisting of fourteen articles; the second article of which is:

"That we will neither import nor purchase any slave imported after the 1st day of December next, after which time we will wholly discontinue the slave trade, and will neither be concerned in it ourselves, nor will we hire our vessels, nor sell our commodities nor manufactures, to those who are concerned in it."

By the fourteenth article, they resolved:

"And we do further agree and resolve, that we will have no trade, commerce, dealings, or intercourse whatsoever with any colony or province in North America which shall not accede to, or which shall hereafter violate this association, but will hold them as unworthy of the rights of freemen, and as inimical to the liberties of this country."

That is to be found in the same volume, on page 915. Those men who would not agree that they would neither import nor purchase any slave after the 1st day of December, were not worthy of social or business intercourse, and unworthy of the rights of freemen, and inimical to the liberties of the country. That agreement, or convention, as it is called, of the Continental Congress, made in 1774, was signed by all the members, including George Washington and Patrick Henry, from Virginia, and the two Rutledges from South Carolina.

I come now to another State, Georgia. The Provincial Congress of Georgia, held at Savannah, on the 18th of January, 1775, resolved:

"That we will neither import nor purchase any slave imported from Africa, or elsewhere, after the 15th day of March next."

George Washington, in a letter to Charles Pinckney, Governor of South Carolina, on the 17th of March, 1792, says:

"I must say that I lament the decision of your Legislature upon the question of importing slaves after March, 1793. I was in hopes that motives of policy, as well as other good reasons, supported by the direful effects of slavery, which at this moment are presented, would have operated to produce a total prohibition of the importation of slaves, whenever the question came to be agitated in any State that might be interested in the measure."

In a letter to John F. Mercer, dated September 9, 1786, George Washington says:

"I never mean, unless some particular circumstances should compel me to it, to possess another slave by purchase, it being among my first wishes to see some plan adopted by which slavery in this country may be abolished by law."—Sparks's Life of Washington, vol. 9, p. 159.—Note.

In a letter to Robert Morris, dated April 12, 1786, he says:

"I hope it will not be conceived from these observations that it is my wish to hold the unhappy people, who are the subject of this letter, in slavery. I can only say, that there is not a man living, who wishes more sincerely than I do, to see a plan adopted for the abolition of it; but there is only one proper and effectual mode by which it can be accomplished, and that is by legislative authority; and this, as far as my suffrage will go, shall never be wanted."—Sparks's Writings of Washington, vol. 9, page 159.

In a letter to the Marquis de la Fayette, of the date of April 5, 1783, he says:

"The scheme, my dear Marquis, which you propose as a precedent, to encourage the emancipation of the black people in this country from the state of bondage in which they are held, is a striking evidence of the benevolence of your heart. I shall be happy to join you in so laudable a work; but will defer going into a detail of the business until I have the pleasure of seeing you."—Sparks's Writings of Washington, vol. 8, p. 414, 415."

I have some other authorities. In the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, Colonel Mason, of Virginia, an illustrious name in an illustrious Commonwealth, then and now, said:

"Slavery discourages arts and manufactures. The poor despise labor when performed by slaves. They prevent the emigration of whites, who really enrich and strengthen a country. They produce the most pernicious effect on manners."

I am not going to criticise that. I am not here to speak on a question of manners. I leave that where Mr. Mason left it.

"Every master of slaves is born a petty tyrant."

I am only quoting, sir.

"They bring the judgment of Heaven on a country."

Again, Mr. Mason is reported to have said:

"He held it essential, in every point of view, that the General Government should have power to prevent the increase of slavery."

That is to be found in the third volume of the Madison Papers, page 1391. Again, Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, afterwards Vice President of the United States, (page 1394 of the same volume,) said:

"He thought we had nothing to do with the conduct of the States as to slaves, but ought to be careful not to give any sanction to it."

Mr. Madison (page 1429) "thought it wrong to admit in the Constitution the idea that there could be property in men."

But there is another very important fact in the history of that convention. They finally adjourned on the 17th day of September, 1787. On the 13th day of September, 1787, after the discussions in the convention had been listened to, after the suggestions of Colonel Mason, of Virginia, of Madison, and of other men of that day, who thought slavery ought not to be countenanced and allowed in the Constitution, there came up the clause fixing the enumeration that was to be made to establish the ratio on which Representatives were to be chosen. As it read then, it fixed the number, and said, "including those bound to servitude." You will find on page 1569 of the third volume of the Madison Papers, that Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, moved to strike out the word "servitude," and insert "service" in its stead; and it was done unanimously, said Mr. Madison, because the word "servitude" implied the condition of slaves, and "service" described the obligations of free persons. So you find that those held to service are described in the Constitution, because the convention unanimously thought that did not describe the condition of slavery; and, therefore, they put "service" instead of "servitude." These were the opinions of some of the men who were in the convention that framed the Constitution.

At the risk of being tedious, for I am not here to-day to make myself popular, but instructive, [laughter.] I will read a somewhat lengthy extract from another southern author. I would send it to the Secretary to read, but I am afraid he would not emphasize it properly, [laughter.] and I will read it myself. I read from Jefferson's Notes on Virginia, in which he treats on slavery. It is a very curious coincidence, that when Jefferson comes to speak of slavery, he speaks of it in the same relation that Colonel Mason did; and the whole article on slavery is put in under the head of "manners." I am not going to be drawn off into that field. Mr. Jefferson says:

"There must, doubtless, be an unhappy influence on the manners of our people, produced by the existence of slavery among us. The whole commerce between master and slave is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions, the most unremitting despotism on the one part, and degrading submissions on the other. Our children see this, and learn to imitate it; for man is an imitative animal. This quality is the germ of all education in him. From his cradle to his grave he is learning to do what he sees others do. If a parent could find no motive either in his philanthropy or his self-love for restraining the intemperance of passion towards his slave, it should always be a sufficient one that his child was present. But generally it is not sufficient. The parent storms; the child looks on; catches the lineaments of wrath; puts on the same airs in the circle of smaller slaves; gives a loose rein to his worst of passions; and thus nursed, educated, and daily exercised in tyranny, cannot but be stamped by it, with odious peculiarities. The man must be a prodigy who can retain his manners and morals undepraved by such circumstances. And with what execration should the statesman be loaded, who, permitting one half the citizens to trample on the rights of the other, transforms those into despots, and these into enemies, destroys the morals of the one part, and the amor patriæ of the other. For, if a slave can have a country in this world, it must be any other in preference to that in which he is born to live and labor for another; in which he must look up the faculties of his nature, contribute as far as depends on his individual endeavors to the evanishment of the human race, or entail his own miserable condition on the endless generations proceeding from him.

"With the morals of the people their industry also is destroyed; for, in a warm climate, no man will labor for himself who can make another labor for him. This is so true, that of the proprietors of slaves a very small proportion indeed are ever seen to labor. And can the liberties of a nation be thought secure when we have removed their only firm basis—a conviction in the minds of the people that these liberties are the gift of God?—that they are not to be violated but with his wrath? Indeed, I tremble for my country, when I reflect that God is just; that his justice cannot sleep forever; that, considering numbers, nature, and natural means only, a revolution of the wheel of fortune, an exchange of situation, is among possible events; that it may become probable by supernatural interference. The Almighty has no attribute which can take side with us in such a contest."

So says Mr. Jefferson; and yet the Supreme Court say that it was unquestioned, and nobody thought of questioning it at the time of the American Revolution, and of the adoption of the Federal Constitution. These Notes of Jefferson on Virginia, by the way, were first published, I think, in 1780 or 1782, during the Revolution, and before the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The record does not stop there. Mr. Jefferson was not the only man who entertained these sentiments on this subject at that time and subsequently. I will read an extract from the preamble of the act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania which abolished slavery in 1780, and you will find that that is not "semi" on the subject. The Legislature of Pennsylvania, in 1780, declare:

"And whereas the condition of those persons who have heretofore been denominated negro and mulatto slaves has been attended with circumstances which not only deprived them of the common blessing they were by nature entitled to, but has cast them into the deepest afflictions, by an unnatural separation and sale of husband and wife from each other and from their children; an injury, the greatness of which can only be conceived by supposing that we were in the same unhappy case. In justice, therefore, to persons so unhappily circumstanced, and who, having no prospect before them wherein they may rest their sorrows and their hopes, have no reasonable inducement to render the service to society which they otherwise might, and also in grateful commemoration of our own happy deliverance from that state of unconditional subjection to which we were doomed by the tyranny of Britain: Be it enacted, That no child hereafter born shall be a slave," &c.

Patrick Henry, in a letter to Robert Pleasants, dated January 18, 1773, says:

"I believe a time will come, when an opportunity will be offered to abolish this lamentable evil. Everything we can do, is to improve it, if it happens in our day; if not, let us transmit to our descendants, together with our slaves, a pity for their unhappy lot, and our abhorrence for slavery. If we cannot reduce this wished-for reformation to practice, let us treat the unhappy victims with lenity. It is the furthestmost advance we can make towards justice; it is a debt we owe to the purity of our religion, to show that it is at variance with that law which warrants slavery. I know not where to stop. I could say many things on the subject, a serious view of which gives a gloomy perspective to future times."

Again, John Jay—(of whom Webster said that when the ermine fell on him it touched nothing less pure than itself,) whose name and whose principles live to-day, in the second and third generations, son and grandson, and, I believe, even to the fourth also, maintaining, in their purity, the same principles which illustrated the life of their illustrious ancestor; individuals, whom it is my pride to number amongst my personal and dearest friends—said:

"The State of New York is rarely out of my mind or heart, and I am often disposed to write much respecting its affairs; but I have so little information as to its present political objects and operations, that I am afraid to attempt it. An excellent law might be made out of the Pennsylvania one, for the gradual abolition of slavery. Till America comes into this measure, her prayers to Heaven will be impious. This is a strong expression, but it is just."

John Jay said, in 1789, that until America comes into this measure for the abolition of slavery, she cannot in the penitence of her stricken soul look up to Heaven and say, "Our Father," without being guilty of impiety. Such was the opinion of John Jay.

The record does not stop there. William Pinckney, of Maryland, in 1789, the very year of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, when the Supreme Court say there was such a perfect Dead sea in the public heart and public morals on this subject, in a speech in the Maryland House of Delegates, said:

"Sir, iniquitous and most dishonorable to Maryland is that dreary system of partial bondage which her laws have hitherto supported with a solicitude worthy of a better object, and her citizens by their practice countenanced."

"Founded in a disgraceful traffic, to which the parent country lent her fostering aid, from motives of interest, but which even she would have disdained to encourage, had England been the destined mart of such inhuman merchandise, its continuance is as shameful as its origin."

"Wherefore should we confine the edge of censure to our ancestors, or those from whom they purchased? Are not we equally guilty? They sowed around the seeds of slavery; we cherish and sustain the growth. They introduced the system; we enlarge, invigorate, and confirm it."

I shall not detain the Senate longer by reading from the records and from our history what were the opinions of the men of that day; and yet this Supreme Court have solemnly decided all this history out of being; have judicially declared—no, sir, not judicially, this was politically. They have decided that slavery and the slave trade, in the very day and time that Pinckney, and Jay, and Jefferson, and Madison, and all the great men who illustrate and adorn and embellish our history, were pouring forth imprecations and denunciations against the system, was so unquestioned and unquestionable that nobody thought of questioning it. The Supreme Court go further—I could forgive them almost anything else—and, as I understand it, they heap reproach on our revolutionary history and our revolutionary men. The Chief Justice, speaking of the Declaration of Independence, says:

"It then proceeds to say: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among them is life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.'"

"The general words above quoted would seem to embrace the whole human family; and if they were used in a similar instrument at this day would be so understood. But it is too clear for dispute, that the enslaved African race were not intended to be included, and formed no part of the people who framed and adopted this declaration."

Sir, the men who framed the Declaration of Independence; the men who fought the battles of liberty; and the men who wrote our Constitution, understood the meaning of language quite as well as the Supreme Court, and if I were put on oath, I should say a little better. They knew the circumstances in which they were placed; they knew the crisis in which they were called to live and to act; they knew that the experiment which had been made from the beginning of time up to that day, of free government, had been a failure; they knew that every effort and every attempt that oppressed man had made had failed; and they felt that to them, at that time, and at that day, was committed, by the Arbitrator of national destiny, the great question to solve for themselves, for their posterity, for all coming time, the great problem whether man was capable of free government. They went into that contest fully understanding the character of the strife by which their position was to be maintained; fully sensible of the character of the contest upon which they had entered. They went into it, as has been well said on another occasion, poor in everything but faith and courage. They were without arms, without wealth, without even a name amongst the nations of the earth, rebel provinces; but they were strong in faith, strong in hope, strong in patriotic impulse, and strong in their reliance on the Most High; and they went, taking their lives, their fortunes, and their honors in their hand. They threw themselves into the world's Thermopylae of that day, and they declared that they held certain great truths to be self-evident, and that among these truths was, that all men were entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Why? Not because it was written in the musty folios of speculating philosophers; not because it was found in the writings of patriots of other days; not because their fathers had vindicated on the field of battle their right to be free; not because the old British Commons had brought King Charles to the block; not because their old Puritan ancestry, on the battle-fields of Naseby and of Marston Moor, had written in their own blood, on their own country's soil, their determination to be free. No, sir, none of all these; but they said that man was entitled to be free, because he was endowed by his Creator with that right. They stopped nothing short of the throne of eternity. They ignored all human reasons, all human platforms, and all human authority, and with unclouded eye fixed their gaze upon the eternal throne, and laid the foundation of the institutions which they were to build upon the eternal justice of God.

That, sir, is what the revolutionary fathers did; and when the contest was over, when the dust and the blood of battle had disappeared, and victory stood upon the flagstaff of their banner, these old men issued a declaration to the world. It was issued in 1783, the very year the war was over. "Let it be remembered," say they, "finally, that it has ever been the pride and boast of America that the rights for which she contended were the rights of human nature." They contended for no class, no condition. They contended for humanity. No matter, in the language of the Irish orator, what complexion, incompatible with liberty, an Indian or an African sun may have burned upon him, when he stands erect in the image of his Maker, a man, then say the fathers of the Revolution, "There stands one for whom we have fought; there stands a man who was involved in the great issues which led to the revolutionary war, and which we have vindicated with our blood." They continue further:

"If justice, good faith, honor, gratitude, and all the other qualities which enoble the character of a nation and fulfill the ends of government, be the fruits of our establishments; the cause of liberty will acquire a dignity and luster which it has never yet enjoyed, and an example will be set which cannot but have the most favorable influence on the rights of mankind."

There is the idea; true to their principles, true to the avowals of public sentiment, with which they went into that contest. Peace came in 1783; and in 1784, Thomas Jefferson, the immortal author of that immortal Declaration, began his labors in the Continental Congress, moving that all the territory we then owned, and all the territory that we might thereafter acquire, should be forever free from what he considered the contaminating and blighting influences of human slavery.

Those who are laboring with me in this great contest, may take courage from the perseverance with which Jefferson adhered to his policy. In 1783-84-85 and 86, the measure failed, but finally, in 1787, it partially succeeded, and the ordinance was passed prohibiting slavery from all the territory which we then owned. Yet, sir, in view of all this history, written as with a sunbeam upon the very walls of the room in which this tribunal assemble, they stand up in 1857, to declare to the world that the slave trade and slavery were so universally recognized and acknowledged that nobody questioned the rightfulness of the traffic, and nobody supposed it capable of being questioned. Not content with overturning the whole line of judicial authority to be found in every nation of Europe, and in every State of this Union, and of their own solemn recorded decision, they go on to make the avowal; and then go further, and undertake to tear from that chaplet which adorns the brows of the men of the Revolution the proudest and fairest of their ornaments; and that was the sincerity of the professions which they made in regard to the rights of human nature. It is true, the court in their charity undertake to throw the mantle of ignorance over these men, and say they did not understand what they meant. Sir, they did understand it; and the country understood it. There was a jealousy on the subject of liberty and slavery, at that time, of which we are little prepared to judge at the present day. It is found beaming out on the pages of the writings of all these men.

If the opinions of the Supreme Court are true, they put these men in the worst position of any men who are to be found on the pages of our history. If the opinion of the Supreme Court be true, it makes the immortal authors of the Declaration of Independence liars before God and hypocrites before the world; for they lay down their sentiments broad, full, and explicit, and then they say that they appeal to the Supreme Ruler of the universe for the rectitude of their intentions; but, if you believe the Supreme Court, they were merely quibbling on words. They went into the courts of the Most High, and pledged fidelity to their principles as the price they would pay for success; and now it is attempted to cheat them out of the poor boon of integrity; and it is said that they did not mean so, and that when they said all men they meant all white men, and when they said that the contest they waged was for the right of mankind, the Supreme Court of the United States would have you believe that they meant it was to establish slavery. Against that I protest, here, now, and everywhere, and I tell the Supreme Court that these things are so impregnably fixed in the hearts of the people, on the page of history, in the recollections and traditions of men, that it will require mightier efforts than they have made or can make to overturn or to shake these settled convictions of the popular understanding and of the popular heart.

Sir, you are now proposing to carry out this Dred Scott decision by forcing upon the people of Kansas a constitution against which they have remonstrated, and to which there can be no shadow of doubt a very large portion of them are opposed. Will it succeed? I do not know; it is not for me to say; but I will say this: if you force that—if you persevere in that attempt—I think, I hope the men of Kansas will fight. I hope they will resist to blood and to death the attempt to force them to a submission against which their fathers contended, and to which they never would have submitted. Let me tell you, sir, I stand not here to use the language of intimidation or of menace; but you kindle the fires of civil war in that country by an attempt to force that constitution on the necks of an unwilling people; and you will light a fire that all Democracy cannot quench—ay, sir, there will come up other Peters the Hermit, that will go through the length and the breadth of this land, telling the story of your wrongs and your outrages; and they will stir the public heart; they will raise a feeling in this country such as has never yet been raised; they will awaken another great crusade; and the men of this country, en masse, will go as they did of olden time, in another crusade; but it will not be a crusade to redeem the dead sepulcher where the body of the Crucified had lain, but to redeem this fair land, which God has given to be the abode of freemen, from the desecration of a despotism sought to be imposed upon them in the name of "perfect freedom" and "popular sovereignty."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. HARLAN. I move the postponement of this question until to-morrow, and that it be made the special order for one o'clock.

Mr. SEWARD. There is a special order for to-morrow, on which the Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. HARLAN. I will say Monday next.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The special order which was set for to-day has not been taken up, for the reason that the special order upon which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire had the floor has been taken up, and occupied the greater part of the session. If it be proper, I will move that the special order which was fixed for to-day go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a motion now pending, which is to postpone the consideration of this subject until Monday next, at one o'clock, and make it the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMODORE PAULDING.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the joint resolution (S. No. 7) directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding, which was the special order fixed for to-day, be postponed to and made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. L. D. FINCKEL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced as members of the special committee to which was referred House bill No. 127, providing for the apportionment of clerks and messengers in the Government offices in Washington, Messrs. SMITH of Illinois, SEWARD, KELSEY, PENDLETON, GILMAN, CLEMENS, and ANDERSON.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the further carrying out of the order of the House calling the States and Territories for bills and resolutions; and that bills and resolutions were in order from Florida.

COURT-HOUSE, ETC., AT APPALACHICOLA.

Mr. HAWKINS introduced a bill for the construction of a court-house, post office, and custom-house at Appalachicola, in the State of Florida; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE TEXAS LEGISLATURE.

Mr. BRYAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas, calling on the United States Government to refund the money heretofore paid out by the State of Texas, for the defense of her frontier, since the 28th day of February, 1855; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas, recognizing the rank of Captain John G. Todd, late of the Texan navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TEXAS LIGHT-HOUSES.

Mr. BRYAN submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the necessity of establishing light-houses and placing buoys at the entrances and in the bays of Galveston, Matagorda, Aransas, and Corpus Christi; also, at the mouths of the Rio Grande and Brazos rivers, and San Luis Pass, and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

BOUNDARIES OF TEXAS.

Mr. REAGAN introduced a bill to authorize the President of the United States, in conjunction with the State of Texas, to run and mark the boundary lines between the territories of the United States and the State of Texas; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

LAND GRANT TO IOWA.

Mr. CURTIS introduced a bill to amend an act granting land to the Territory of Iowa to aid in the improvement of the Des Moines river, in said Territory; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PORT OF DELIVERY AT COUNCIL BLUFFS.

Mr. CURTIS also introduced a bill to establish a port of delivery at the city of Council Bluffs; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT KEOKUK.

Mr. CURTIS also introduced a bill to provide for the erection of a marine hospital in the city of Keokuk; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT KEOKUK.

Mr. CURTIS also introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a custom-house and post office building at the city of Keokuk; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WESTERN BOUNDARY OF IOWA.

Mr. CURTIS also introduced a bill to extend the western boundary of the State of Iowa, to the Missouri river; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

DES MOINES RAPIDS.

Mr. CURTIS offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform this House of the amount of money remaining unexpended and applicable to the improvement of the lower or Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi river, and the amount heretofore expended thereon. Also—

First. The number of yards of rock excavation required to carry out the plan of that improvement;

Second. The number of yards removed each year since the work commenced;

Third. The advantages of further delay and ultimate inadequacy and hazard which will attend the navigation of the proposed channel, when completed;

Fourth. The expediency of adopting a slack-water canal, with suitable locks, along the Iowa shore, as a substitute for the plan at present pursued, and that this matter be at the discretion of the Secretary, be referred to the topographical engineers, and such civil engineers as he may deem proper.

FEES OF MARSHALS, ETC.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, introduced a bill to regulate the fees of the marshals of the States and Territories of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, also presented the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of restricting the sale of the public arable lands belonging to the Government to actual settlers, in limited quantities, and report by bill or otherwise.

HARBOR OF OZAUKEE.

Mr. BILLINGHURST introduced a bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Ozaukee, Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HARBOR OF MANITOWOC.

Mr. BILLINGHURST also introduced a bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Manitowoc, Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HARBOR OF SHEBOYGAN.

Mr. BILLINGHURST also introduced a bill for continuing the improvement of the harbor of Sheboygan, Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the practicability of improving the Des Moines and Rock Island rivers, and the navigation generally of the upper Mississippi river, by means of dams and reservoirs upon the head-waters of the Wisconsin, Black, Chippewa, and St. Croix rivers, and other tributaries of said Mississippi river, according to the plan for the improvement of the Ohio river, by Charles Ellet, Esq., Civil Engineer, and report the result of their inquiries to this House.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGER BILL.

Mr. SCOTT offered a bill for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels navigating the ocean, propelled in whole or in part by steam; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and be ordered to be printed.

Mr. LETCHER. I would make a suggestion to the gentleman from California. The Committee on Commerce, I understand, have reported back a bill in regard to the preservation of lives on those same vessels, and it will come up on the day set down for it by special order of the House. I understand that my friend from California designs to offer his proposition, hereafter, as an amendment to that bill. I would suggest, therefore, that it be printed, and that it be left before the House, so that the gentleman may offer it at any time. If referred, it may not be reported back by that time.

Mr. SCOTT. I am much obliged for the suggestion made by the gentleman from Virginia. This bill I intend to offer as an amendment to the bill introduced by the Committee on Commerce; but I now propose to have it printed, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce. The bill has been carefully prepared on the basis of the report made by a committee of underwriters of the city of New York, and I desire that it may be printed, and referred to the committee I have indicated.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REFUNDING OF DUTIES.

Mr. McKIBBIN introduced a bill to remit and refund duties upon goods, wares, and merchandise destroyed by fire; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. LETCHER. I move its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means. It is usual to give that reference to a bill of this kind.

Mr. McKIBBIN. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

The bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

GRANT OF PUBLIC LANDS TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McKIBBIN introduced a bill making a grant of lands to the State of California, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ADDITIONAL LAND OFFICES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McKIBBIN also introduced a bill to create two additional land offices in the State of California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ADDITIONAL INDIAN AGENTS.

Mr. SCOTT introduced a bill to authorize the appointment of two additional Indian agents for the State of California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

IMPROVEMENT OF RIVERS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. SCOTT also introduced a bill for the improvement of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers, below the cities of Sacramento and Stockton; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LIGHT-HOUSE ON LAKE SUPERIOR.

Mr. KINGSBURY introduced a bill for the erection of a light-house on Lake Superior; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

POST ROUTES IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. KINGSBURY offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post

Roads be instructed to inquire into the propriety of establishing a post route from Albert Lea, Freeborn county, Minnesota, via Bristol, Worth county, Iowa, to Mason City, Cerro Gordo county, Iowa; also, from Albert Lea to Chain Lakes, via Blue Earth City, Faribault county, with a branch to Winnebago City, in Minnesota.

PAYMENT OF CLERKS IN OREGON.

Mr. LANE introduced a bill making an appropriation for the payment of clerks employed in the offices of the registers of the land offices at Oregon City and Winchester, in the Territory of Oregon; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXTENSION OF LAND LAWS.

Mr. LANE also introduced a bill for extending the land laws east of the Cascade Mountains, in Oregon and Washington Territories; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MAJOR ALVORD.

Mr. LANE also introduced a bill for the relief of Major Benjamin Alvord, paymaster United States Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE GADSDEN PURCHASE.

Mr. OTERO introduced a bill to establish a separate judicial district south of the Gila, and to provide for the representation of the inhabitants of the Gadsden purchase in the Territorial Legislature of New Mexico, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

PENITENTIARY OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. OTERO also introduced a bill making appropriation for the completion of the penitentiary buildings of the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

CAPITOL BUILDINGS, NEW MEXICO.

Mr. OTERO also introduced a bill making appropriation for the completion of the capitol buildings of the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. OTERO also introduced a bill providing for the examination of claims for Indian depredations in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SURVEYOR GENERAL OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. OTERO also introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the offices of surveyor general of New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes," approved July 22, 1854; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LAND DISTRICTS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, introduced a bill to divide the Territory of Washington into four land districts; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MILITARY ROADS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, also introduced a bill for the construction of military roads in the Territory of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CLERKS OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, also introduced a bill authorizing the settlement of the accounts of the clerks of the United States courts in Oregon and Washington Territories; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, also introduced a bill making additional appropriations for the erection of the public buildings of Washington Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

SURVEY OF THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, also introduced a bill to provide for a survey of the Columbia river, in the Territories of Washington and Oregon; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would suggest (not that we particularly desire to have jurisdiction of this subject) that all bills affecting the Territories ought to go to the Committee on Territories. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The question was taken on the reference to the Committee on Territories; and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the reference to the Committee on Commerce; and it was so referred.

RAILROAD IN KANSAS.

Mr. PARROTT introduced a bill to aid the Territory of Kansas in the construction of a railroad therein; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT IN KANSAS.

Mr. PARROTT also introduced a bill to establish an additional land district in Kansas Territory, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

POST ROUTES IN KANSAS.

Mr. PARROTT also introduced a bill to establish certain post routes in the Territory of Kansas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

LANDS OF NEW YORK INDIANS.

Mr. PARROTT also offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the condition of the lands set apart in the Territory of Kansas as a reservation to the New York Indians, and to report by bill or otherwise.

RAILROADS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. FERGUSON introduced a bill making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the Territory of Nebraska, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said Territory, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SURVEYOR GENERAL OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. FERGUSON also introduced a bill to establish the office of surveyor general in the Territory of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PENITENTIARY IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. FERGUSON also introduced a bill to provide for building a penitentiary in the Territory of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE PLATTE RIVER.

Mr. FERGUSON also introduced a bill to provide for building a bridge across the Platte river, in the Territory of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

ROAD IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. FERGUSON also introduced a bill for the construction of a road in the Territory of Nebraska, from the Platte river to the Kansas line; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed seven thousand extra copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1857; three thousand copies for distribution by the Coast Survey office, and four thousand copies for the use of the members of the House; and that the same be printed and bound with the plates, in quarto form; and that the printing of said plates shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

Mr. UNDERWOOD objected.

RESOLUTIONS OF MAINE LEGISLATURE.

Mr. MORSE, of Maine, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine, in reference to the fishery bounties; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine in reference to French spoliations, to the fishery bounties, to the introduction of foreign paupers and criminals, and to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Dred Scott; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PIKE asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the members of the Committee on Enrolled Bills of this House shall have the power to vote on all questions at any time before the result of any vote shall be announced.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to that.

Mr. PHELPS. Let it be modified so as to make it read, "when absent from the House in the discharge of their duty."

The resolution was so modified.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I understand that the committee have no right to be absent during the sittings of the House, except by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is true; and yet the Committee on Enrolled Bills are compelled to hold nearly all their sessions when the House is in session.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would suggest the propriety of amending that resolution so as to include committees of conference, who are usually engaged at the close of a session in the discussion and settlement of important questions. They ought to have a right to record their votes under the same regulations.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to the resolution.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. WALTON submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared for the use of the House, in addition to the statements on the public lands named in the resolution of this House adopted on the 18th instant, a tabular statement exhibiting the area, expressed in square miles and acres, of lands assigned or reserved to Indian tribes, the tribes to which are assigned a reserve, geographical locations of such lands, and the date of the assignment or reservation in each case.

POST OFFICE BUILDINGS IN STATE CAPITALS.

Mr. WALTON. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a post office at each of the capitals of the several States in the Union, where a post office has not already been erected or provided for in connection with United States courts or custom-houses.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

AMENDMENT OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. CHAFFEE introduced a bill to amend the several acts now in force in relation to the Patent Office; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill to repeal so much of the several acts relating to American seamen as relates to the issuing of certificates of citizenship or protections by collectors of the several ports of entry; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FRENCH SPOILIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, also introduced a bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoliation committed by the French prior to the 31st of July, 1801; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CAPE COD HARBOR.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill making an appropriation for the preservation of Cape Cod harbor, in the State of Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PLYMOUTH HARBOR.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts, also introduced a bill making an appropriation to repair the works for the preservation of the harbor of Plymouth, Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts, also submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House the estimates for the repair of the works in Plymouth harbor, Massachusetts, for the preservation of the same; and his opinion of the necessity of any immediate action in the prosecution of said works.

TAUNTON RIVER.

Mr. BUFFINTON introduced a bill for the improvement of Taunton river, in the State of Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BARK JEHU.

Mr. COMINS. Mr. Speaker, I have no resolution or bill to introduce, but rise to make a motion of a purely business character, and which in no way affects the political rights of individuals or States. There is upon the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 50, to authorize the issuing of a register to the bark Jehu. This was a Dominican vessel, called the Naiad Queen, which was sold to Daniel Draper & Son, of Boston, for repairs and other expenses incurred in the United States. I ask that it be taken up and put on its passage.

There was no objection.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, and then read in extenso.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COMINS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It is clear that this bill is being passed without inquiry and without explanation. It is rather a singular proceeding, and I must take exception to it. There is no reason why we should, without explanation, blindly order the Secretary of the Treasury to issue this register.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act for the relief of William B. Trotter;

An act to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments in certain cases;

An act for the relief of James G. Benton, E. B. Rabbitt, and James Longstreet, of the United States Army;

An act for the relief of James Beatty's personal representatives; and

A resolution to authorize certain officers and men engaged in the search for Sir John Franklin to receive certain medals presented to them by the Government of Great Britain.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. KNAPP, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the petition in the case of Thomas Houghton from the files of the House, for the purpose of reference in the Senate.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN HARTFORD.

Mr. CLARK, of Connecticut, introduced a bill for the construction of a suitable building for the accommodation of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and the several offices connected therewith, and the post office, at Hartford, Connecticut; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT BRIDGEPORT.

Mr. BISHOP asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the necessity of the construction of a custom-house and post office building in the city of Bridgeport, State of Connecticut, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, objected.

HARBOR OF BRIDGEPORT, ETC.

Mr. BISHOP also asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the condition of the harbors of Bridgeport and Norwalk, in the State of Connecticut, and to report by bill or otherwise, what appropriations are necessary to place said harbors in suitable and proper condition.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, objected.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, presented a communication from the War Department, transmitting, for the consideration and action of the House of Representatives, an estimate of the funds required for subsistence of troops in the Utah expedition, based upon the requirements of a circular of the Commanding-General, dated January 11, 1858; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a message from the President of the United States, transmitting to Congress a copy of a convention between the United States and his Majesty the King of Denmark, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues, the ratifications of which were exchanged in this city, on the 12th instant, and recommending that an appropriation be made to enable the Executive seasonably to carry into effect the stipulations in regard to the sums payable to his Danish Majesty's Government; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting two hundred and seventy-five copies of the official Army Register for 1858, for the use of the House of Representatives, as required by their resolution of the 1st of February, 1830; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

NEBRASKA CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of Nebraska, with the accompanying note:

OMAHA CITY, NEBRASKA TERRITORY,
HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January, A. D. 1858.

SIR: Inclosed please find copy of joint resolutions which have passed the Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Nebraska, which copy we were directed by the resolutions to forward yourself.

S. M. CURRAN, Chief Clerk of the House.
W. SAFFORD, Chief Clerk of the Council.
To Honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

JOINT RESOLUTION.

To the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas, Hon. B. B. Chapman is contesting the right of Hon. Fenner Ferguson to his seat in your body, as Delegate elect from the Territory of Nebraska, and believing it to be a duty devolving upon us as representatives of the people, to advise your honorable body of their wishes and sympathies in the premises: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Nebraska—

First. That a very large majority of the people of the Territory of Nebraska believe that Hon. Fenner Ferguson was fairly and legally elected Delegate from the Territory of Nebraska. Consequently, they will be slow to believe that efforts from any source will avail anything to deprive them of the representative of their choice, and of a representative in whose capacity, integrity, fidelity, and incorruptibility they have the fullest confidence.

Second. That the whole people of the Territory indignantly repel the foul aspersions attempted to be cast upon the character of the late Chief Justice of the Territory, the present Delegate elect, charging in effect perjury, under the preemption laws of the United States; knowing, as they do, that such charges and aspersions are maliciously false, and entirely unfounded, coming from what source they may, and they cannot but believe that such slanderous and libelous charges have been made in the hope or expectation that the right of the Delegate elect, to his seat, would be prejudiced thereby.

Third. That the foregoing preamble and resolutions shall be signed by the President of the Council and the Speaker of the House of Representatives; certified to by the Clerks of each body, and a copy of the same be forwarded by said Clerks to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, Hon. Fenner Ferguson, and Hon. B. B. Chapman.

J. H. DECKER,
Speaker of the House.
S. M. CURRAN, Chief Clerk of the House.
GEO. L. MILLER,
President of the Council.

Attest: WASHBURN SAFFORD, Chief Clerk of the Council.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not see that those resolutions state any facts in regard to the election in Nebraska, and I cannot conceive who the opinion of that Legislature can have any effect upon the question to be decided by this House. I therefore move, sir, to lay the resolutions upon the table without printing.

The motion was agreed to.

SURVEYOR GENERAL OF NEBRASKA, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the memorial and resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of Nebraska relative to the establishment of a new surveying district and the office of surveyor general for the Territory of Nebraska; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now insist on my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

CLERK TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a privileged question. The special committee on printing have instructed me to make a report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that that is not a question of such privilege as to take precedence of a motion to suspend the rules to go into committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I hope the House will receive the report and act upon it. It will not take a minute, and the committee are at a standstill for want of the authority asked for.

The report was read as follows:

In SPECIAL COMMITTEE, January 20, 1858, it was Resolved, That a clerk is necessary to the dispatch of the business of the committee.

Resolved, That the chairman report to the House said resolution, and ask for authority to employ a clerk at a sum not exceeding four dollars per day.

No objection being made, the committee were authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] to waive his motion for a moment, to allow me to introduce a bill for reference only.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will do so if there be no objection; but if a single objection be made I shall insist on my motion.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I object.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I was not in my seat when my State was called, and I now desire to present a bill for reference only. It is a bill to extinguish the Indian titles to reservations in Georgia, and other adjacent States. It is the same bill which was reported last session, and I merely desire to have it referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I must object, and insist on my motion.

Mr. PALMER. I hope the gentleman will allow me to introduce a bill for reference. I was absent on necessary business in the Clerk's office when my State was called.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I must decline to yield. All the States have been called. I am sorry that I cannot accommodate the gentleman.

The question was then taken on Mr. JONES's motion; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BOGOC in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, it had under consideration the annual message of the President of the United States, and certain resolutions submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] for the reference of that message. The committee had progressed in the consideration of those resolutions to the last resolution, which related to the subject of a Pacific railroad. To that resolution the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] had offered an amendment, proposing to refer so much of the message as relates to that subject to a select committee of thirteen. To that amendment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] had submitted an amendment, to strike out "thirteen" and insert "nine." The question is upon that amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which has been debated on both sides, and, therefore, no further debate is in order.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question then recurred upon Mr. PHELPS's amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

And that the committee be required to designate and report the best practicable route for the construction of the said road.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit to the committee a few remarks by way of reason for altering the resolution. I regard the construction of the Pacific railroad as a fact that is settled and determined. I am aware that in the convention which assembled at Cincinnati in June, 1856, a platform was constructed, in the foundation of which were placed a few fossiliferous rocks, on one of which appears an inscription to the effect that "the Constitution does not confer on Congress the power to commence and carry on a general system of internal improvements." But the obsolescence of that idea was demonstrated in a very few weeks thereafter, in Congress, by the passage of five separate internal improvement bills, over the head of the President's veto, appropriating nearly a million dollars to various internal improvement purposes.

The President of the United States in his inaugural address, and in his recent annual message to Congress, uses language which I have not time, in the five minutes allotted me, to read, but which the reporters will please to incorporate in their report of my remarks.

The following occurs in the President's inaugural:

"The Federal Constitution is a grant from the States to Congress of certain specific powers; and the question whether this grant should be liberally or strictly construed has more or less divided political parties from the beginning. Without entering into the argument, I desire to state, at the commencement of my administration, that long experience and observation have convinced me that a strict construction of the powers of the Government is the only true, as well as the only safe theory of the Constitution. Whenever, in our past history, doubtful powers have been exercised by Congress, these have never failed to produce injurious and unhappy consequences. Many such instances might be adduced, if this were the proper occasion. Neither is it necessary for the public service to strain the language of the Constitution; because all the great and useful powers required for a successful administration of the Government, both in peace and in war, have been granted either in express terms, or by the plainest implication.

"Whilst deeply convinced of these truths, I yet consider it clear that, under the war-making power, Congress may appropriate money towards the construction of a military road, when this is absolutely necessary for the defense of any State or Territory of the Union against foreign invasion. Under the Constitution, Congress has power 'to declare war,' 'to raise and support armies,' 'to provide and maintain a navy,' and to call forth the militia 'to repel invasions.' Thus endowed, in an ample manner, with the war-making power, the corresponding duty is required that 'the United States shall protect each of them [the States] against invasion.'

"Now, how is it possible to afford this protection to California and our Pacific possessions, except by means of a military road through the Territories of the United States, over which men and munitions of war may be speedily transported from the Atlantic States to meet and to repel the invader? In the event of a war with a naval Power much stronger than our own, we should then have no other available access to the Pacific coast, because such a Power would instantly close the route across the isthmus of Central America.

"It is impossible to conceive that, whilst the Constitution has expressly required Congress to defend all the States, it should yet deny to them, by any fair construction, the only possible means by which one of these States can be defended. Besides, the Government, ever since its origin, has been in the constant practice of constructing military roads. It might also be wise to consider whether the love for the Union which now animates our fellow-citizens on the Pacific coast may not be impaired by our neglect or refusal to provide for them, in their remote and isolated condition, the only means by which the power of the States on this side of the Rocky Mountains can reach them in sufficient time to 'protect' them 'against invasion.' I forbear for the present from expressing an opinion as to the wisest and most economical mode in which the Government can lend its aid in accomplishing this great and necessary work. I believe that many of the difficulties in the way which now appear formidable will, in a great degree, vanish as soon as the nearest and best route shall have been satisfactorily ascertained."

The President, in his late annual message, treats the subject as follows:

"Long experience has deeply convinced me that a strict construction of the powers granted to Congress is the only true, as well as the only safe, theory of the Constitution. Whilst this principle shall guide my public conduct, I consider it clear that under the war-making power Congress may appropriate money for the construction of a military road through the Territories of the United States, when this is absolutely necessary for the defense of any of the States against foreign invasion. The Constitution has conferred upon Congress power 'to declare war,' 'to raise and support armies,' 'to provide and maintain a navy,' and to call forth the militia 'to repel invasions.' These high sovereign powers necessarily involve important and responsible public duties; and among them there is none so sacred and so imperative as that of preserving our soil from the invasion of a foreign enemy. The Constitution has, therefore, left notli-ing on this point to construction, but expressly requires that 'the United States shall protect each of them [the States] against invasion.' Now, if a military road over our own territories is indispensably necessary to enable us to meet and repel the invader, it follows as a necessary consequence, not only that we possess the power, but it is our imperative duty to construct such a road. It would be an absurdity to invest a Government with the unlimited power to make and conduct war, and at the same time deny to it the only means of reaching and defeating the enemy at the frontier. Without such a road it is quite evident we cannot 'protect' California and our Pacific possessions 'against invasion.' We cannot by any other means transport men and munitions of war from the Atlantic States in sufficient time successfully to defend these remote and distant portions of the Republic.

"Experience has proved that the routes across the isthmus of Central America are, at best, but a very uncertain and unreliable mode of communication. But, even if this were not the case, they would at once be closed against us in the event of war with a naval Power so much stronger than our own as to enable it to blockade the ports at either end of these routes. After all, therefore, we can only rely upon a military road through our own territories; and ever since the origin of the Government Congress has been in the practice of appropriating money from the public Treasury for the construction of such roads.

"The difficulties and the expense of constructing a military railroad to connect our Atlantic and Pacific States have been greatly exaggerated. The distance on the Arizona route, near the thirty-second parallel of north latitude, between the western boundary of Texas, on the Rio Grande, and the eastern boundary of California, on the Colorado, from the best explorations now within our knowledge, does not exceed four hundred and seventy miles, and the face of the country is, in the main, favorable. For obvious reasons, the Government ought not to undertake the work itself by means of its own agents. This ought to be committed to other agencies, which Congress might assist, either by grants of land or money, or by both, upon such terms and conditions as they may deem most beneficial for the country. Provision might thus be made not only for the safe, rapid, and economical transportation of troops and munitions of war, but also of the public mails. The commercial interests of the whole country, both east and west, would be greatly promoted by such a road; and, above all, it would be a powerful additional bond of union. And although advantages of this kind, whether postal, commercial, or political, cannot confer constitutional power, yet they may furnish auxiliary arguments in favor of expediting a work which, in my judgment, is clearly embraced within the war-making power.

"For these reasons, I commend to the friendly consideration of Congress the subject of the Pacific railroad, without finally committing myself to any particular route."

By reference to these passages, it will be seen that the President honors this subject with a constitutional argument, in which he derives, from the war-making power reposed by the Constitution in Congress, the power to construct this great and important public work; but I think that he might have derived it more plausibly from other parts of the Constitution. It is manifest, from these passages in the inaugural address and in the annual message, that this is one important part of the programme of the Administration; as much so as the acquisition of Cuba or the protectorate of Central America. And when we know that the friends of the Administration have large majorities in both branches of Congress—and when we observe the singular unanimity and harmony with which all suggestions from that quarter are acted upon, and adopted by them—we can have no doubt that the execution of this great work will be effected; and that, too, in a very short period.

As the President has expressly left the question open, it becomes important to settle and determine, in the first instance, by what route this work should be constructed. We know that there are four great rival routes, each of which has many able and earnest advocates. One is to terminate at Nisqually, near Puget Sound; two at San Francisco; and one at San Diego, on the west coast. Of the eastern termini, one is to be at Chicago, one at St. Louis, one at Memphis, and one at New Orleans. To settle the rival claims of these several routes, and to determine the great geographical and topographical questions which necessarily arise in deciding their respective claims, will require the labor of a committee selected and set apart for that especial purpose—selected it ought to be, from those portions of the country more immediately interested in the construction of the work.

It is important to settle, the first thing we do, where we shall have this road built—this great trans-continental road; this "military road;" this great highway and thoroughfare, as I believe it will be, for the traffic, the trade, and the commerce of the world—bringing to us, from the "gorgeous East," by the West, that trade which we have hitherto received by the East. I say that it is very important that we settle and decide, in the first place, where we shall have that road located, and then—[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I am opposed to the proposition, as I think the best practicable route is known. To show that it is, I ask to have read, as part of my remarks, an extract from the message of Governor Randall, of Wisconsin.

It was read, as follows:

"The necessity of a thoroughfare by wagon or by railroad, or by both, in our own latitude, to the Pacific, for the convenience of trade and emigration, is so apparent that I suggest that the Legislature join in the efforts now being made for that purpose, and memorialize Congress on the subject. From the head of Lake Superior to Puget Sound, the distance in a direct line is about fourteen hundred miles, and by the railroad route lately explored by Governor Stevens, about eighteen hundred miles. The explorations and surveys of the several routes—northern, middle, and southern—have resulted in establishing the fact that the northern route possesses advantages over all the others yet explored, in these particulars: It requires, by connecting with present roads, less railroad to be built, to make a railroad communication between the Atlantic and Pacific, by several hundred miles. It is through a better district of country—one capable of sustaining an agricultural population—nearly the entire way. The gradients are less and the general altitude much lower. It furnishes a greater supply, with more general distribution of wood, timber, coal, water, and building stone, and facilities for supplying workmen and material in the progress of the work. Between the navigable waters of the Missouri at Fort Benton, and the navigable waters of the Columbia at the mouth of the Peluse river, fifty miles above Fort Wallah Wallah, the distance is four hundred and fifty miles. With these and other facilities for furnishing supplies, the work of constructing this railroad can be simultaneously commenced, and carried forward at Lake Superior, Puget Sound, Fort Benton, and Fort Wallah Wallah, thus requiring less time for its completion than other routes where the work must be continuous from either terminus. The climate, too, of the northern route, is better adapted to labor, and a greater amount can be performed in a given length of time by the same force. In a commercial point of view, this line is the most direct between the great shipping ports of Asia and India, and the great commercial cities, New York and Liverpool; and for North American produce it avoids the tropical regions. It is of the greatest importance that Congress should make an appropriation for a wagon road from Fort Benton to Wallah Wallah. It is believed that $200,000 will be sufficient for this purpose."

The question was taken on Mr. MAYNARD'S amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend the resolution, by adding, after the word "construction," the following words: "of a road, railroads, and telegraphic lines to the Pacific ocean; and all petitions and matters relating thereto, be referred to a committee of fifteen, to be appointed by the Speaker, with leave to report at any time."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit a question of order on this amendment. It proposes to change the rules by permitting this committee to report at any time. That may not be done, except there be one day's notice, or except the rules be suspended; and this committee cannot suspend the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will modify my amendment, by striking out that portion of it which authorizes the committee to report at any time.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the proceedings which took place on the 19th day of December last. I think, sir, that it is well for us to look at this matter a little, to see its present position as compared with what took place on this subject a few weeks since. The amendment which I offer is very nearly in the language of the resolution submitted by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT.] Immediately upon that resolution being offered, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] moved that it be laid upon the table. That resolution provided for the appointment of a special committee to take this Pacific railroad question into consideration. I want the committee to understand what was the action on the resolution at that time. I find, by referring to the proceedings of the House, which I hold in my hand, that on the vote to lay the resolution on the table, the yeas were—94, and the nays 96; the proposition only failing of being tabled by two majority. And, sir, I was astonished on looking at this record, to find that my Democratic colleagues, or, perhaps, I might say, in view of recent events, my late Democratic colleagues, every one of them voted that the resolution should be laid upon the table. Even among them I find the name of my colleague and friend from the Alton district, [Mr. SMITH,] who, the other day, made such a glowing and eloquent appeal to us to appoint this special committee, and who went so far as to suggest the extreme measure of direct taxation, in order to accomplish and complete this great work. Well, the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table by a close vote. Immediately, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES,] on the other side of the House, made the rather unusual motion to reconsider that vote. A point of order was made upon the motion, but the Chair decided that the motion was in order.

Then, sir, what do we find further? When the motion to reconsider was entertained, in order to settle the matter and get at a direct vote, I moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. Let us look still further; though the House refused to table the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT,] by two votes, yet it refused to lay on the table the motion to reconsider that vote by ten majority, all my Democratic colleagues, and, I believe, all the Democrats from Indiana, except one, [Mr. DAVIS,] voting with the majority. And also, among the number who voted against laying the motion of the gentleman from Indiana upon the table, and thus leaving the matter open, I find the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] who is the author of the resolution before the committee. I will not undertake to say that these gentlemen were not then, as they profess to be now, friends of this measure; but it seems strange, indeed, that we find them now so zealous for the appointment of a committee to be headed by the gentleman from Missouri, while they were opposed to the committee proposed to be raised by the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. I take no part in the question between him and his colleagues; but I desire, on this occasion, to put myself right in relation to the vote I saw proper to cast on the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT,] a few days ago. I was one of the number that the gentleman from Illinois thinks proper to refer to who voted against that proposition. My position has always been favorable to the construction of a railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I believe that the project is proper and constitutional. I will state, to prevent my position being misunderstood, that I voted against the resolution of the gentleman from New York for the reason that there was nothing upon which to predicate such a resolution. No bill had been introduced and presented for the consideration of the House. The question had been presented by the President's annual message, but no steps had been taken for its reference; and this is the ground which is occupied by many gentlemen who favor the construction of a Pacific railroad, and who voted against the resolution of the gentleman from New York. There was nothing upon which to base it. The usual number, sir, was thirteen. That was the number of the committee which acted on this great and important question at the last Congress. So far as my recollection serves me, that was the number of that committee, and I believe that it is sufficient. The larger you make the committee, the more difficult will it be to get a majority together to act.

My impression is, Mr. Chairman, that we have talked about this question long enough, and that we ought to act, and act at once. It is to be hoped that this resolution of the gentleman from Missouri will be agreed to; that the committee will be raised; and that they will engage industriously in the discharge of their duties, and report such a bill as will insure its passage through this body.

For myself, sir, I have a particular route in view, which I believe is the most practicable; and when the question comes up, I shall be ready to express my views as to the practicability of the routes suggested. Notwithstanding I may believe that a certain route is more practicable than another, I stand here pledged to-day to vote for almost any route rather than have none at all. I am opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, and think the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri, as originally presented, a good one.

Mr. BRANCH. I rise to a question of order. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois to be to strike out certain words just now inserted by the gentleman from Tennessee. I make the point of order, that when the House, by a vote, has inserted words, it is not in order to move to strike those words out. I make the point, because I believe the words inserted on motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, to be the best we can adopt.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that he understands the rule to be this: when certain words are inserted by the committee or the House, it is not in order to strike those words out; but a motion to strike out another part of the resolution carrying those words with it, is in order, because it is a different proposition. The Chair will read a short extract from the Manual. "After 'a' is inserted"—the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is comprehended under the term "a," and remembering that, the gentleman from North Carolina will understand the decision of the Chair—"it may be moved to strike out a portion of the original paragraph comprehending 'a.'" It is true, that a motion to strike out certain words, and no other words, would not be in order; but a motion to strike out a portion of the original paragraph, carrying with it the words inserted, would be in order, because it is a different proposition. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BRANCH. I believe the decision of the Chair is correct, and therefore withdraw my point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendment is not in order.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT offered the following as a substitute for the pending resolution:

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the subject of a Pacific railroad be referred to a select committee of thirteen, to be appointed by the Speaker. And in order fairly to represent the various sections of the Union, said committee shall be appointed from the different States, as follows:

From the New England States, New York, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Illinois, (80 members).....	4
From New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana, (62 members).....	3
From Maryland and Virginia, (19 members).....	1
From Delaware, Florida, North Carolina, and Georgia, (18 members).....	1
From Tennessee, South Carolina, and Arkansas, (18 members).....	1
From Kentucky, Missouri, and Texas, (19 members)....	1
From Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, (16 members).....	1

Mr. BENNETT. If the friends of a Pacific railroad in this House are willing to treat the various routes fairly, I am willing to vote for the select committee moved by the gentleman from Missouri. But if there is to be a favorite route, and it is to be a southern route at all events, and no other—a route that is to be urged as an executive measure and which Democrats are to favor, and if everything is to be drifted in that direction, I am opposed to it from the beginning. That resolution gives to the South a large proportion of the committee. It will place upon that committee five members who are, from location, in favor of a southern route; while the northern route has but four, and the central route only three, classifying them according to location.

It is not strange that a gentleman who occupies the position of the gentleman from Missouri should be wedded to a particular route. Its real starting point is from the capital of his State, and it runs through his own district. I say it is not strange that gentlemen occupying a position like his should be in favor of a particular route. But what I want in the organization of this committee, if we are to have any, is that the committee shall fairly represent all the routes, and the business of the country; and that, coming from every section of the Union, their report should have some credit with the House as being a conclusion arrived at from a conviction that it was the best route, and not because it was a favorite route with the Executive, or because certain distinguished gentlemen desired to have it adopted. I do not believe the southern route is practicable, but I may be wrong in that opinion. I do not believe that $500,000,000 in gold would build a railroad upon the southern route. I think it is utterly impracticable. Others, no doubt, think differently; but if they will give us a fair committee I am willing to vote for raising it.

I presume the city of New York has more business with California than all the southern States in the Union. The States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and all the New England States, have a large amount of business with California; and three fourths of all the railroads and business of the Union with California is north of Virginia. Then why is it that this southern route should be insisted upon, to the exclusion of all others? As a military road, it will be useless. There is nobody in that direction to fight, and probably never will be. I do not want the southern route to be a foregone conclusion in the organization of the committee. For one, I shall go against any committee, whether standing or select, unless it is understood that all the routes are to have fair play. My proposition embraces a fair committee, and nothing else. The northern and central States were given one member of this committee for twenty members or over in this House, while the southern States have been allowed one member for from nineteen to sixteen members. The southern route has five friends upon the committee, while the northern route has only four, and the central route three, leaving California to decide between them; so that a committee organized in this way cannot possibly bring in a bill here for any one route, unless it is upon a conviction that it is the best one—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LETCHER. There seems to be a great deal of anxiety as to who shall have the nursing of this particular bantling. Now, I prefer myself that it shall go to the Committee on Roads and Canals, for some two or three very important reasons. The first is, that the chairman of that committee [Mr. JONES, of Tennessee] has nothing else in the world to nurse, unless you give him this. He will have abundant opportunity, and abundant leisure, to take care of this scheme; to give it all proper attention, and to introduce it into the House—if he should think it a proper scheme for introduction here—in such shape as would be likely, at least, to meet my approbation. I hardly think, though, it would meet the approbation of a majority of this House, which seems to be clearly in favor of a railroad upon some line north, south, or middle, but without knowing very well which line is to be taken.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] is ready to go for any line, but he does not know which is the best line. And he proposes the constitution of a committee here of so many from one section, and so many from another section, an so many from a third section; and he says the result will be that these sections will be brought into harmony, and that the best line will necessarily be adopted. Now I do not think that follows by any means. But whether it will or will not, I avow very frankly, so far as I am concerned, that my purpose is to defeat any railroad, whether it is a presidential railroad or anybody else's railroad. I am opposed to the recommendation of the President upon this subject—decidedly and unalterably opposed to it; and I trust, when the occasion offers, I shall have an opportunity to give the reasons in detail for that opposition.

While I am opposed to his scheme, I am opposed to any scheme that will involve this Government in any way whatever in internal improvements upon the magnificent scale which such a scheme as this proposes. I do not believe the money is here now to build one line of road; but I believe, in order to get one, some gentlemen upon this floor would be willing to involve the country in the expense of constructing three.

And, sir, besides all this, it seems to me to be a most remarkable doctrine, that you can commence the construction at the western border of the States, and run it to the eastern border of California, and be within the Constitution; and yet you cannot make a foot of railroad from the capital here to the point where you begin on the western border, without violating the Constitution, by going through the States. Now, sir, if it is a military road; if it is indispensable for military purposes; if it is necessary to carry troops; and if the Government has the power to construct that military road, where is the limitation in the Constitution to regulate the point at which it shall begin, and declare that it shall begin in the Territories, and shall not go through the States?

The question now being upon Mr. BENNETT's amendment,

Mr. BENNETT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BOYCE and BINGHAM were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 76.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, what is the question now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] to refer the subject of the Pacific railroad to a select committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Of how many?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirteen.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment, by striking out "thirteen" and inserting "ten."

Mr. Chairman, I was not aware, until a few moments ago, that the votes of myself and my colleagues with whom I am associated upon this side of the Chamber, were called in question in the manner in which they have been this morning, and I was a little surprised to hear the remarks made by my colleague over the way, [Mr. WASHBURN.] I did not hear the commencement of those remarks. My mind was occupied with other subjects. I see he has taken the pains to procure a copy of the Daily Globe of December 21.

Mr. OLIN. I rise to a point of order. My point is, that it is wholly immaterial to the question now before the committee how the gentleman voted on a former occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state what the gentleman from Illinois is aware of already, that the rule requires that his remarks should be in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I am not going to oppose my own amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. In explanation of the amendment then.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Certainly; I am going to explain it, and I hope I shall be able to do so to the satisfaction of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. OLIN,] who has not been so particular during the harangues that have been made upon his side of the House to confine those speaking to the question.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Do I understand the gentleman to offer an amendment?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have offered an amendment, and I hope I shall be allowed to say what I have to say without further interruption. I was remarking, sir, that in the Globe of the 21st of December, which I hold in my hand, the names of my colleagues, Mr. MARSHALL, Mr. SMITH, Mr. MORRIS, Mr. SHAW, and myself, have been underscored with black lines by my colleague over the way, [Mr. WASHBURN,] for some purpose known to himself. He, it seems, calls in question the propriety of our votes in opposing the resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT,] who addressed the committee a few moments ago. My colleague did not, in his remarks, undertake to say what he infers from that vote; but I can tell him very distinctly what he may infer from it. And, in the first place, I need only call his attention to the remarks made the other day by a gentleman who sits on the right hand of the gentleman from New York, who said that this was an Administration measure, and he preferred to let members upon this side of the House have control of it. When the gentleman from New York introduced a resolution, the adoption of which would, according to parliamentary practice, have placed him at the head of the committee which is to report upon this subject, I was very well aware of the source from which the proposition emanated.

I am not unmindful, sir, of the bills which were reported by that gentleman during the last Congress, to absorb and consume and gormandize the public lands for the benefit of the thousand plundering schemes which seemed to meet with such distinguished favor from him. I had a very decided objection to the source from which the proposition came. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] had, long prior to that, introduced a resolution of a similar character, proposing to raise a select committee; but his resolution was objected to. He stood ready, however, to renew the proposition, and I was disposed to give him a chance of doing so rather than to indorse the proposition of the gentleman from New York, who was in such great haste to take charge of the matter, and place himself at the head of the committee.

In regard to my action about the Pacific railroad, I shall not now enter into any explanation for the satisfaction of my colleague or anybody else. I am willing that the question should go to a select committee; and I think that such committee can be raised without dividing the Union into patchwork, as was proposed a little while ago by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT.] I do not go as far as my friend from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] who intimates that he is utterly opposed to the Pacific railroad, whether it be a presidential railroad or not. I suppose, however, that the gentleman, in thus placing himself in antagonism to the Administration on this question, will hardly be read out of the party, because he is not yet, I believe, considered a distinguished aspirant for the Presidency. If he was, we should perhaps find the Washington Union, and other papers, stabbing at him as it does at others who chance to differ with the Administration on some questions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to the amendment of my colleague, and I will state briefly some of the reasons why. I am glad that my colleague has had the opportunity of offering his amendment, because it shows to us and to the country how he regards this proposition. He says that he voted against the proposition of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT,] because he does not like the quarter from whence it came.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a point of order. I insist that the debate shall be confined to the question pending before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state that the rule requires that the members who speak under the five-minutes' rule shall speak either in support of, or opposition to, the amendment. It is true that a good deal of indulgence is often allowed by the Chair, because, as some gentleman has said, it is difficult to tell, at once, what direction a gentleman intends to give his remarks. But the Chair must say that he thinks the privilege has been too much extended. The Chair cannot see what reference the remarks originally made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] those subsequently made by his colleague, [Mr. HARRIS,] or those now being made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] have to do with the amendment offered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My colleague was opposed to the number of the committee proposed to be raised by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, and he was allowed to state his reasons. I wish to state my reasons why I am in favor of the number, and take my own mode of doing so. And allow me to say to him and to the committee, that I differ with him in toto in regard to this question. I am for a Pacific railroad, earnestly, sincerely, and in good faith. I do not care from what side of the House the proposition comes; whether it be from the Republican side, (from which nearly the whole number of votes that are to carry the measure are to come,) or whether it be from the Democratic side. I care not what party or what individual shall have the credit of the measure, provided the credit belongs to such party or such individual. But there were some things in the vote the other day, to which I referred—

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Will my colleague allow me to ask him if his side of the House will vote for a southern route?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I presume that will depend on circumstances; but I will not undertake to speak for anybody but myself. But let me say here, that, as far as I am concerned, I will vote for no route except it be fixed by law. I voted during the last session of Congress for a certain mail road to the Pacific ocean, and I hope my friend from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] will explain something about that matter. Congress left it to the contractors to determine the route; but that power of the contractors to fix their own route seems to have been construed away by the Government; and instead of a mail line over a route which would be of some service to the country, we have seen it crowded away down south to the thirty-second parallel of latitude, running through an unknown land. So far as I am concerned, I shall vote for no bill which shall give any discretion to this Administration to fix the route. I believe that the northern route is the only practicable one; and I shall hope to see it adopted by the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a point of order. I want to get the President's message into the House, so that we may get at the regular business of the session. I therefore ask the Chair to confine members, in their remarks, to the explaining or opposing of amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's [Mr. WASHBURN's] time has expired.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. PHELPS's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair takes occasion to say that the rule will be more rigidly enforced in future, and gentlemen will be required to confine themselves to explaining or opposing amendments.

Mr. FLORENCE. That will not bother me a bit. I am never out of order. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to make an inquiry, to know whether I am in order or not. [Laughter.] I desire to move to strike out all after the words "referred," and insert the words "to the Committee on Roads and Canals."

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order. The original proposition was to refer to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. FLORENCE. Let me hear the original resolution, because I want to stick to the rules of order, and want to discuss only what is clearly in order.

The original resolution was read.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then my amendment is not in order. I move to strike out the entire proposition made by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS.] That is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am for the original proposition, and want to speak to it; and I want to know how I can speak to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has submitted no amendment that is in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I move to strike out the words "a special committee of thirteen," and I will state the reason why I do so.

The CHAIRMAN. And insert what in place of it?

Mr. FLORENCE. "The Committee on Roads and Canals."

The CHAIRMAN. Inasmuch as that was the original proposition it will not be in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will the Chair have the resolution reported, and I will get at it.

Mr. POTTLE. I want to know if the gentleman's five minutes have not expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not submitted an amendment yet. He will have five minutes after he submits his amendment.

The original resolution was again read.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to strike out all after the word "referred," and insert the words, "to the standing committee having power to control its disposition." I can tell you the committee which I think ought to have it. I am for referring it to the Committee on Roads and Canals. I believe that that is the committee which has the power to control the disposition of that part of the President's message.

I have confidence in that committee. I believe that it is one to which we may with great propriety intrust this subject. It does not follow because the chairman of that committee is known to be opposed to any appropriation for the construction of this road, that all the members of the committee are likewise opposed to it. Nor does it follow that because that committee, as stated by the gentleman from California the other day, is intrusted with important business referred to them by the House, they cannot make provision to relieve themselves from the burden; and, as the gentleman sympathized with the burden that that committee had imposed on it, it occurred to me that we could very easily relieve them by giving them two clerks, so that the objection of the gentleman from California to referring this subject to that committee, can have no weight.

Now, sir, the gentleman from New York makes a subdivision or equalization, or a graduation, or, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] very properly termed it, a patchwork of the reference. I think that a committee constituted as the Committee on Roads and Canals is, will meet even the purpose which the gentleman had in view by making the suggestion which he did. I am surprised that there should be any objection to referring this subject to the Committee on Roads and Canals, which is composed of gentlemen of strict integrity, and to which a subject of this kind may well be referred. I will state frankly that it is a matter of surprise to me that there should be any objection to referring it to those gentlemen, headed as they are by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES], because they are men of clear heads and strict integrity. There can be no doubt but they will report fairly. If the chairman has constitutional scruples, and does not believe that there is power in the Constitution to construct such a road, it does not follow, I will repeat, that every other gentleman of the committee believes as he does. In the last Congress we had proof that the chairman of a committee did not exercise any too much influence over the minds of the other members of the committee. The committee of investigation was a proof of that fact. I believe that the chairman agreed with the committee in but a single instance, and that may be cited as a precedent.

Mr. PHELPS. I have sought the floor, not for the purpose of making a speech, but to oppose the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania, and to make this remark to the committee: that if we are to come to any result in relation to this matter, we ought to confine ourselves to voting instead of talking. The proposition is a simple one. Shall a select committee be raised to which the subject of a Pacific railroad shall be referred? My desire in asking for a select committee was that the committee might be constituted so as to be favorable to the proposition; for by the parliamentary law, a select committee should be constituted of those favorable to the subject referred to it. Let us vote on the proposition, and dispose of the President's message, that we may go on with the other business of the House. I oppose the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLSON. I offer the following amendment:

And be further instructed to report to this House in what part or parts of the Constitution authority has been granted to Congress by the States to undertake the construction of a railroad, or other works of a similar nature, through any State or Territory of the United States.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is probable the committee will adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri, and create a special committee. I would myself much prefer that it should be submitted to a standing committee properly having charge of the subject, because we all know, as the gentleman from Missouri has just now said, that according to parliamentary usage the committee will be so constituted as to contain a majority of members in favor of the scheme. Therefore, sir, and because it will contain this majority, and because that majority may believe the power, which I notice in my amendment, to be so plain and clear that they may not even recognize the possibility of a doubt in any other mind, that I wish to instruct them to inform such of us as are skeptical on the subject, where the power is to be found.

Now, sir, I shall be very glad to be informed on that subject. I am in favor of internal improvement and external improvement and everything to which the name of improvement properly belongs; and if I can be convinced, without any violation of the faith pledged by the States to each other, when they adopted the Constitution, that any work of public necessity or great public advantage can be constructed by our agency, I should be willing to give it my confidence.

But I confess, Mr. Chairman, to so much obtuseness in my examination of the Constitution, that my political curiosity is piqued to know in what part of the Constitution the authority in question has been delegated to Congress. I am sure that this would be a labor of love to the committee. I am sure, with a majority of the committee honestly desiring the completion of what they call this great work, they will gladly undertake this task. Perhaps they will perform it successfully, and they may find aid in quarters where they now little expect it. I have not yet been able to see the authority in question in that part of the Constitution so frequently referred to in the power to declare war. This is sometimes referred to as a military road; but if so, I have not the faculty to comprehend what a military road is. If it be a road useful in war, then every turnpike, every by way is a military road. If it be a road useful in war, why then a road from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico is a military road, and may be undertaken by the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded tellers. Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the committee rise.

The motion was disagreed to, there being, on a division, ayes 11, noes 119.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to—ayes 47, noes 87.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. PHELPS.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to strike out the words "select committee of thirteen," and insert, "Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business."

This Pacific railroad question has been here ever since I have been a member of Congress. It has been before us some five or six years; and yet members who favor the project seem to differ with each other. The whole question, therefore, I think, ought to be revised and examined; and I do not know of any committee having more time to attend to it than the Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business. I think when the session terminates, the Pacific railroad question will still be unfinished business; and therefore ought to be referred to that committee.

The amendment was not agreed to; seven members only voting in favor thereof.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I have an amendment which I desire to submit in good faith. It is to strike out the word "route," and insert "routes." I will not detain the House by any lengthy remarks. I am in favor of the appointment of a select committee, and think one should be raised to examine this question. It is a very important one. A select committee to investigate it has been appointed in the Senate; and it is right and proper that a similar committee should be appointed by the House. At the same time, I think the resolution ought not to be confined to one route, whether a northern, a southern, or a central one; neither of which alone would probably get a majority of the votes of this House. I desire, therefore, to leave the way open and free to the committee that shall be appointed, to recommend as many routes as they think proper. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman from Virginia, a few moments ago, asked where the authority was to be found in the Constitution for this proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is between the words "route" and "routes."

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. If there is no authority to make one route, there is no authority to make two or more; and I submit that the argument is pertinent. I rose merely to respond to that question briefly. The authority is found, sir, where Mr. Jefferson found authority to begin the national road; where Mr. Monroe, Mr. Madison, Mr. John Quincy Adams, and General Jackson found authority to approve bills for that and other improvements.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I must insist upon it that my friend from Maryland shall confine himself to the question—the distinction between routes and route—and not argue the question of constitutionality.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I hope the gentleman will not object to my remarks.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I cannot withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to say, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania insists on his question of order, that the Chair is unable to perceive that the argument being made by the gentleman from Maryland goes to prove that the word "route" ought not to be stricken out and the word "routes" inserted in place of it. That is the question to which the gentleman is required by the rule to confine himself.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will not trouble the committee with an appeal from the decision of the Chair, but will wait for another opportunity to continue my remarks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, demanded tellers on the amendment to the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Maine, and HATCH were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 74.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEITER. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

And that said committee report whether there is any constitutional authority for making such railroad; and if so, that they specify in their report the provision of the Constitution under which such authority is claimed.

Mr. Chairman, without committing myself, either for or against this proposition, I say to this committee that, in my judgment, the question of building a Pacific railroad is one that should be considered, not only as to the practicability of making such a road, but that we should go behind all that, and look to the Constitution and see whether there be any authority in that instrument for the construction of such a work.

If, sir, that construction of the Constitution which has always been contended for by the dominant party in this House, is to prevail, why, then, there is an end of the Pacific railroad, in my judgment. If, on the other hand, the construction which has been contended for by the opponents of that party is to prevail, then there is authority, though not expressed, perhaps, in the Constitution itself, for the construction of the road.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I rise to a question of order. I would inquire if this amendment is not the same as the one offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] and voted upon a while ago?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes it is substantially the same; but thinks the point of order comes too late.

Mr. LEITER. Does the Chair rule me out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. LEITER. I say, then, that if the principle which has prevailed in the Democratic party for the last quarter of a century is to be applied to this measure, then there is an end of your Pacific railroad, and I now congratulate my friends upon the opposite side of the House that their Democratic President has recommended a measure, the principle of which has, in my judgment, received the brand of arrant Federalism for twenty-five years.

Now, sir, I do not claim to belong to the same stripe of Democracy as the gentlemen on the other side of the House, to all intents and purposes. Yet I claim to be a Democrat, and as such, I claim still for the Constitution of my country a strict construction; and especially do I require it in a case of the magnitude of this mighty project, which has been agitated in this country for years. I probably differ, on this question, with the gentlemen on this side of the House; yet I am not willing now in a five-minute speech to say wherein I differ with them. I offered this amendment specially for the purpose of permitting my friend from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] to give us his views in regard to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I wish to indicate where I think this power is to be found. The argument from precedent is found in more than one instance in the President's message applicable to other topics: I propose to apply it to this. The power is found where Mr. Jefferson found authority to commence the national road; where Mr. Monroe, Mr. John Quincy Adams, and General Jackson found the authority to continue it; where the present President of the United States found the authority to vote for the making of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal; where the last Congress found the authority to enter on the soil of Maryland to make the Washington aqueduct; where the Congress of the United States has repeatedly found the authority to declare the great navigable waters of the western country perpetual channels of commerce; where Congress found the authority to declare the Wheeling bridge a post road; where the last Congress found authority to overrule the President's veto of the improvement bill; where this Congress has found authority to build post offices under that clause of the Constitution which says that Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads. Having the power to establish the post office by building it, I suppose they have the equal power to establish the post road by building it. I find it in that clause of the Constitution which gives Congress power to carry on war—it gives the power to march soldiers, and it gives the incidental power to provide where they may march. I find it in that clause of the Constitution which says that Congress shall provide for the common defense; and this is for the common defense of the Pacific States. I find it in that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce among the States. In that clause it is that Congress has hitherto found the authority to declare the navigable waters of the western country perpetually open channels of commerce.

There are the places, in three several clauses of the Constitution, in which the power is found to sanction what has been the practice of the Government during the whole period of its existence, with the exception of one or two parts of Administrations; and if it be necessary to make a construction again, I am now ready to make it. It has been sanctioned by the decision of the Supreme Court; and that construction of the power of Congress has been sanctioned by this House, when it passed a law declaring the Wheeling bridge a post road, in order that it might not be torn down, under the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States. I think, sir, that there is an array of authorities on the construction of the Constitution, and of precedents under the action of the Government, which, if it does not solve the doubts of my ingenious friend from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] will oppose some obstacles to the establishment of a different construction.

Mr. MILLSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on Mr. LEITER's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof:

That so much of the President's message and accompanying documents as relate to the Pacific railroad be referred to a select committee of fifteen, with power to report by bill or otherwise.

I desire to bring back the resolution as near as possible to the original resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS.] I would as lief have a committee of thirteen as a committee of fifteen; but it is necessary to make it a different number, so that the amendment may be in order. I desire to have this subject committed to a committee, with power to inquire fully in regard to the various routes, and to report to this House one or more roads, as they may see fit. If gentlemen desire that that reference should amount to nothing more, let the committee be limited in the manner proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

I was not present when the amendment was offered, or I should have opposed it. I do not believe that it is possible for a committee to concur in a report on any route whatever. If the committee be limited in the beginning to only one road—if they are to ascertain and inquire, and report a bill for the establishment of only a single line, there will probably be no concurrence among them. But let the matter be left open. Let the committee inquire, and they may finally come to a resolution which will enable them to report a specific route; or they may report two lines or three, and the House, from the report which the committee may make, may select one. But I am sure that that amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, will tend to defeat the measure altogether. Such is the judgment of the avowed and known opponents of the measure, as was clearly seen at the last division. I presume that every gentleman in the House, who is opposed to the measure, voted against the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LEITER,] because they knew that by voting down that amendment, they would destroy every prospect of the passage of the Pacific railroad bill by this Congress.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am opposed to the amendment, because I believe that we have no constitutional power to act on the subject at all.

I was struck very much with the argument of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] on the subject of authority. Among other authorities, the war-making power steps in. Why, if we had a war with any foreign Power, and if it became of interest to us to protect our Pacific frontier, how should we do it? I suppose it would take a hundred years to build this road. Again, I was very much surprised to hear the gentleman refer to the power of building the Washington aqueduct, when we are the express legislators for the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I did not allude to the District of Columbia. I spoke of the State of Maryland, through which it is being built.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If that is the point on which the gentleman hangs, he ought not to have connected it with the District of Columbia, as I suppose everybody understands that it was a work for the benefit of this District, to which the gentleman referred.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I did not connect it with the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Perhaps the gentleman criticises me properly in that respect. But what struck me as most remarkable was this: that the gentleman referred to authorities for the purpose of deciding this question, which authorities the gentleman is, I presume, in the habit of repudiating.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I recognize all of them, and join issue with the gentleman as to what is constitutional.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am very happy to hear it, because they may, perhaps, furnish us with some evidence on this subject before the debate is closed.

But one word more, Mr. Chairman. The people of California are very able to take care of themselves, if you provide them with munitions of war. The finest soldiers under the sun are there in abundance. The same difficulty that we would have to experience in getting there would apply with increased force to any Power with which we may be ever engaged in war; and the idea that it is necessary for the protection of California that we should have this road, is an idea which I repel without hesitation. It is a mistake. California has bone and muscle there to protect herself against any Power that can assail her.

A MEMBER. How about rebellion?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. She can go out of this Union, in my opinion, whenever she sees fit; and as to any insurrection among her people, she has the power to put that down, I answer for it, with such assistance as she can find without difficulty.

But the argument has been, "we must get this road, that we may be able to repel the attack of any great naval Power, such as England or France." If that be so, we must, of course, look to that view of the argument. But if it be to put down rebellion, there is nothing to prevent us from marching there with the facilities that we now possess.

But, again, the idea of building a railroad which it will take one hundred years to complete, for the purpose of meeting an enemy on that coast, which enemy would get there around Cape Horn, or across the isthmus, is to my mind a fallacy of argument.

I think, for these reasons, that there is nothing in the project. It will do for gentlemen to talk about and make capital of; but the idea of building a road with the aid of the Federal Government alone, is to me an absurdity—a road preceding population, instead of population preceding the road.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MAYNARD and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

The amendment was agreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 93, noes not counted.

Mr. MILLSON demanded tellers on the amendment as amended.

Tellers were not ordered.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. PHELPS moved that the committee rise and report the resolutions to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 23.

had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the President's annual message, and had adopted a series of resolutions which he was directed to report to the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the resolutions be concurred in; and on that motion called for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Are the resolutions divisible?

The SPEAKER. They are, if a division is called for before the previous question is seconded.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand a separate vote on the resolutions in relation to the Pacific railroad.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. STANTON. Was not a resolution, in regard to Nicaragua, amended in committee?

The SPEAKER. The resolutions were reported from the committee as a whole.

Mr. STANTON. Must not the question be taken whether the House will agree to the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The resolutions originated in the committee, and were not sent there from the House. If they had been, then amendments would have been reported. The resolutions are reported as original propositions.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Not as they were introduced in committee by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, but as the committee agreed to them.

The first eleven resolutions were concurred in.

The twelfth resolution was reported as follows:
Resolved, That so much of the President's message and accompanying documents as relates to the Pacific railroad, be referred to a select committee of fifteen, with power to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is it in order to amend by making the reference to the Committee on Roads and Canals?

The SPEAKER. It is not; the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Can this House refer the same subject to different committees at the same time?

The SPEAKER. If the House chooses to do so the Chair thinks it can. It is a question for the House and not the Chair.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HILL. I have been absent from the House for several days on account of indisposition; and as I do not know what the resolution is, I would be glad if the Clerk would report it.

The resolution was reported.

Mr. FLORENCE. May I ask one question?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have a right to ask a question, and I do not care whether the gentleman objects or not. [Laughter.] I wish to know whether, if this proposition is lost, it will be in order to move to refer it to the Committee on Roads and Canals?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, if this resolution is not carried, the House will have no control over the matter, inasmuch as the President's message will not be before the House.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 137, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Anderson, Andrews, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Buringame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Elliott, English, Farnsworth, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Landy, Leach, Leidy, Lovjoy, Maclay, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nicklack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Ward, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, Wood, Woodson, and Wortendyke—137.

NAYS—Messrs. Bennett, Bocoek, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Caskie, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Dowdell, Edmundson, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Garrett, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Milson, Moore, Peyton, Powell, Quitman, Reilly, Rufin, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Trippie, Watbridge, Whiteley, Winslow, and John V. Wright—60.

So the resolution was adopted.

Pending the call,

Mr. AVERY stated that his colleague, Mr. ATKINS, was confined to his room by indisposition. Mr. WALDRON stated that Mr. CLEMENS was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, stated that Mr. GILMER had been called home by the severe indisposition of a member of his family.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the first resolutions were adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Department of State, inclosing a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, requesting that an appropriation may be made to defray certain expenses in negotiating the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, and requesting the House to give it the proper direction; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting, as required by the fourteenth section of the act approved March 3, 1851, the annual report of his office for the year 1857; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act to authorize the issuing of a register to the bark Jehu; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. KEITT. I move that the House adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at three o'clock and thirty minutes) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 21, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. C. H. HALL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOUSTON presented the petition of Randall Pegg, praying to be allowed the difference between the pay he received and that allowed to the other watchmen who were employed at the public buildings, during the time he served as a watchman at the Patent Office buildings; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the memorial of Joseph Dowd, who served in the war with Mexico, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PUGH presented the memorial of the board of trustees of the Protestant University of the United States, at Cincinnati, Ohio, praying that that institution may be endowed by a grant of public land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES presented a petition of citizens of Dubuque, Iowa, praying that a grant of land be made to aid in the construction of a railroad from some point on the Missouri river, westwardly, in the direction of the South Pass in the Rocky Mountains, with a branch in the direction of Oregon and Washington Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of William C. Pease, a captain in the United States revenue service, praying to be reimbursed an amount of public money lost by him while on deposit in bank, and which he has been obliged to pay out of his private funds; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SEWARD. I present the petition of Nancy Hammond, who is a widow woman residing in the county of Fairfax, State of Virginia; whose father, in the year 1775, raised a company of men, proceeded to Bennington, and was engaged in that battle, and continued in the service until he was honorably discharged. From the records of the country, it appears that he received for his patriotism and services, in the whole, the sum of £3 18s. 3d. She is poor, and asks that Congress will award something to her as a means of subsistence, which may benefit her for the very short remainder of her days, and she shows that there is no collision with any other interest. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the petition of the legal representatives of George Mayo, deceased, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of G. W. Bluford, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That Hope S. Newbold have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY NEXT.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

NOTICE OF A BILL

Mr. YULEE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill ceding to the several States lands owned by the United States within their respective limits.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 76) to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington, and District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STUART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 77) to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the liabilities of ship-owners, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENJAMIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 80) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Olivier Landry, of the State of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

FLORIDA VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. YULEE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish to the Senate estimates for appropriations to pay such part of the volunteer force operating in Florida, during the past year, as may remain unpaid for the want of appropriations applicable to the purpose, including in such estimates all the companies that have been mustered or recognized by the order of the President.

COMPENSATION OF DECEASED SENATORS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the representatives of the late Senators Bell, Butler, and Rusk, who attended the special session of the Senate convened by the President on the 4th of March last, and who have since died, compensation for the said Senators respectively, at the rate of $3,000 per annum, from the commencement of said session to the time of their decease.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, it was Ordered, That so much of the report of the Secretary of the Interior, accompanying the President's annual message as relates to the public buildings and grounds, be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 46) to grant the right of preemption in certain lands to the Indiana Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2) granting a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands to actual settlers, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the petitions of Joseph Chase, James Young, and Alexander Keef, reported a bill (S. No. 78) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue land warrants to Joseph Chase, James Young, and Alexander Keef; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Laurent Millaudon, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 81) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Commerce, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate, to inquire into the expediency of constructing a custom-house at Keokuk, Iowa, and of making Sioux City, in that State, a port of delivery, and constructing a custom-house therein, submitted an adverse report.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a memorial of citizens of that portion of the public domain lying east of Lake Pepin, and the Mississippi river, in the Territory of Minnesota, reported a bill (S. No. 82) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be surveyed the tract of land in the Territory of Minnesota, belonging to the half-breeds or mixed bloods of the Dacotah or Sioux nation of Indians, and for other purposes," approved 17th of July, 1854; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of George M. Gordon, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 83) to vest the title to certain warrants for land in George M. Gordon. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 27) to detach Selma, in the State of Alabama, from the collection district of New Orleans, and make it a port of delivery within the collection district of Mobile.

Also, that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 14) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register or enrollment to the vessel called James McIndoe, now owned by Thomas Coatsworth, James G. Coatsworth, and William Coatsworth, of Buffalo, New York; and

A bill (H. R. No. 22) to alter the time of holding the courts of the United States for the State of South Carolina.

Also, that the House had passed the Senate joint resolution (S. No. 4) to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,'" with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 50) to authorize a register to be issued to the bark Jehu; which was thereupon signed by the President.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 25) to grant to every head of a family one hundred and sixty acres of land, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I will simply remark here, that the committee were unanimous in making the recommendation, and I am authorized to move that the bill be made the special order for the second Monday in February, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to military affairs, reported a bill to increase the military establishment of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the bill be made the special order of the day for Monday next, at one o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is already a special order for Monday next, at one o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I move that it be made the special order for that day, at half past twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

DRED SCOTT DECISION.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Cornelius Wendell, the sum of fifteen cents per hundred pages for twenty thousand copies of the opinions of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Dred Scott vs. John F. A. Sandford.

I ask for the adoption of the resolution now, if it be not objected to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know what the practice of the Senate has been, but there is a rule which prescribes that all resolutions which create a charge on the contingent fund shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and unless some suggestion be made, I shall direct the reference of this resolution to that committee.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That rule can be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have some explanation of this matter before I am disposed to waive the privilege of objecting.

Mr. BROWN. That amounts to an objection to the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not interpose an objection now. I only say, that unless some explanation be made of it satisfactory to me, I shall object.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to that committee.

HENRY VOLCKER.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. STUART, to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 39) to confirm the title of Henry Volcker to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STUART. When the Senate passed to the consideration of the special order yesterday, I had nearly concluded all that I proposed to say on this subject. I had shown that, from a careful inspection of the papers, there were many evidences that this was a fraudulent claim, and I had made a suggestion that I thought there was a very important principle involved in the case as to the liability of the United States, in any event, under existing head laws for Texas head-rights; but I thought that the point which I made was entirely fatal to this case, without considering either of those propositions, and I was about illustrating it. This Texas head-right, if it be a valid one, and has not been located upon any public lands, is now an authority in the hands of the owner to locate it on any lands in the State of Texas; just like our bounty-land warrants. A man who is the bona fide holder of a land warrant, may locate it any day, on any public lands of the United States subject to entry. If this individual, Volcker, really owns this head-right, he can go to-day, or any other day when he pleases, and locate it on six hundred and forty acres of land within the limits of the State of Texas. But, sir, he seeks authority from Congress to locate it on six hundred and forty acres of land in the Territory of New Mexico, now belonging to the United States, if there is no private claim to that land. I wish to make this suggestion with some emphasis, because there is nothing in the papers to show that the land at this day is not claimed by some bona fide owner, under a preemption or other law of the United States.

It is conceded by the Senator from Louisiana, the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, that the proof of titles which this individual introduces in connection with his application, would be entirely insufficient as against an adverse claimant. That he concedes, and it will be obvious to any gentleman who will take time to examine these papers. Now, should the United States grant a patent for six hundred and forty acres of land, to an individual, who presents, on his own showing, a defective title, or should not Congress, in any case, if it were a land warrant, insist that the applicant should make out prima facie a valid title to the land warrant, and to the land that he claimed? I think there would be no denying that. So in this case: the claimant seeks, upon equitable grounds, to procure a warrant from the United States for six hundred and forty acres of land, and yet he does not show anything like a valid title to the certificate under which he claims it. I have referred to the laws of Texas, which require that these matters should be recorded. There is, among the papers, a transcript from the record, sent up by the proper recording officer in the State of Texas—of Bexar county—and that transcript shows one of two things: either a forgery, or an entirely insufficient execution of the papers under which this man claims.

Now, sir, I must deny that it is sufficient for a claimant to ask the United States to grant him a patent for six hundred and forty acres of land because there is no adverse claim interposed here, and because the bill proposes to make the patent only a grant of whatsoever title the United States has. In the first place, I have stated the reason, so far as it is applicable to the United States, that we should grant no man a patent who does not show prima facie a clear right to it; but in the next place, there being no proof in the case that there is no adverse claim, and no proof that this is now Government land belonging to the United States, may we not do very great injustice to an individual who is an occupant of this very land to-day? You clothe this claimant with the title of the United States to this land, and if the present occupant should turn out to be a man of limited means, this person, with the patent of the United States in his hand, can crush him. It gives him an advantage, for it gives him the fee-simple to begin with; and upon what right? None at all is presented by the case, except the fact that nobody else appears as a claimant. There is no evidence here that anybody else has notice that this man is a claimant. It is a difficulty that surrounds cases of this kind in Congress, that there is no notice to other men that this particular individual is claiming the land.

I have sent for the papers, for the purpose of stating a little more distinctly than I did yesterday, the evidence of the defect in regard to the certificate. I stated that this certificate of the certifying officer is a peculiar one. He says that he certifies to a correct transcript from the records, "with the interlineations and erasures." Here is the survey under which this man undertakes to claim; and before it was interlined or erased, it read in this way:

"STATE OF TEXAS, DISTRICT OF BEXAR.

"Survey No. 38. Field-notes of a survey of six hundred and forty acres of land made for George W. Paschal and B. M. Pruder, assignees of J. Houston, it being the land to which they are entitled."

The names of B. M. Pruder and J. Houston are erased. The words "they are" are erased, and "he is" inserted. No explanation of this is given. There is nothing in the transcript from this record which shows that either Paschal or Pruder or Houston ever had any right or title whatever to this certificate. What is the evidence contained in the survey itself? A survey made for these men, who were strangers to the certificate, as owners, showing no connection with the ownership to the certificate at all, but simply reciting that it is a survey for this certificate, No. 169. This certainly ought to be conclusive, because, unless the claimant, Volcker, shows that he, or some man under whom he claimed, has located his head-right upon a particular tract of six hundred and forty acres of land, there is no pretense that Congress should give him a patent for it, any more than the owner of a land warrant could come here and ask Congress to give him a patent for a particular one hundred and sixty acres of land which neither he, nor any one under whom he claimed, had ever sought to locate his land warrant upon. We do not deny the validity of this certificate so far as ownership is concerned, and its right to location in the State of Texas. If it is a valid certificate, it is valid to-day against any lands in the State of Texas.

I shall state one other fact, and then leave this case; for it seems to me too plain for argument. The survey, which it is sought to show applies to this certificate, was made in July, 1850, when the compromise measures, as they are called, were pending before Congress; and the result of which was, that Texas took a limitation of her boundaries narrower than she had before claimed, and left this land in the Territory of New Mexico, and belonging to the United States. The fact appears, that no attempt to record any one of these assignments was ever made, until 1851, after those measures were complete, after the boundary of Texas had been defined, so limiting it that these six hundred and forty acres of land were thrown beyond her jurisdiction. Then this man seeks to patch up a set of certificates, and get them recorded in Texas, under the law of Texas, so that he can fasten on six hundred and forty acres of saline land to which he has no right whatever. I think the Senate will not only reconsider this vote, but they will reject the bill.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan a question, with his permission.

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. Do I understand him to say that the survey of this land specifies the number of the certificate?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. The certificate itself is numbered?

Mr. STUART. No. 169.

Mr. PUGH. The survey is upon certificate No. 169?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. Is not that a sufficient identification? The survey may have been made by an agent.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator had looked into the laws of Texas, he would have seen that they authorized a survey to be made by an agent; but required the evidence of each step to be recorded, so as to show that he was an agent acting for the party that had an interest in the certificate. The record shows that neither Paschal, nor Pruder, nor Houston, under whom Volcker purports to claim, ever had any interest in the certificate at all.

Mr. PUGH. That is, the record does not show the assignment.

Mr. STUART. No, sir.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is, shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

The Senate refused to order the bill to be engrossed.

TENCH TILGHMAN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business before the Senate is the bill (S. No. 60) for the relief of Tench Tilghman; which will be read a second time.

The bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Tench Tilghman $1,000 for losses sustained by him in consequence of his appointment to a consulate, which was abolished by the Spanish Government while he was on his way to take charge of it.

Mr. CLAY. I move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow. The Senator from Louisiana is not here.

The motion was agreed to.

FREDERICK A. BELEN.

The bill (S. No. 61) for the relief of Frederick A. Beelen, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Frederick A. Beelen, Secretary of the United States legation at Santiago, Chili, $750, being the difference between the salary received by him, from the 1st of July, 1855, to the 1st of January, 1857, and the amount of salary to which he would have been entitled, at the rate of compensation existing when he was first appointed to that office.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to hear the report in that case read.

The Secretary read the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, by which it appeared that in August, 1854, Mr. Beelen was appointed secretary to the legation in Chili, with a salary of $2,000 per annum. He repaired to his post at once, and continued in the performance of its duties up to January 1, 1857. In September, 1855, he received a communication from the Department of State, informing him that, under the construction given by the Attorney General to the act of March 1, 1855, "To remodel the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," his salary as secretary of legation at Santiago would be only at the rate of $1,500 per annum from the 1st of July of that year. The law reducing his salary thus had the effect of an ex post facto law upon him. The lowest cost of reaching his post from the United States is $500, and the same amount paid in returning home, makes a sum equal to two thirds of the salary for a whole year. He is the only officer in the diplomatic service of the Government whose salary was reduced by the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JUDGE OF CRIMINAL COURT.

The bill (S. No. 64) to equalize the salaries of certain judges of the courts for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the salary of the judge of the criminal court of the District of Columbia shall, from and after the commencement of the last fiscal year, be the same as the salary of an associate judge of the circuit court of the United States for that District. It proposes to repeal so much of the third section of the act of 7th July, 1838, entitled "An act to establish a criminal court in the District of Columbia," as requires the clerk of the circuit court to attend the criminal court, and to authorize the judge of the criminal court to appoint a clerk to that court.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed, and read the third time?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have objection to the form in which this bill is drafted. I do not know that I have any objection to an increase of the salary of the criminal judge of this District. That may be very proper; but I have an objection to the manner in which it is proposed to do it. A petition is sent here, asking to have the salary of the judge of the criminal court increased, and for what reason? Because the judges of the circuit court for the District of Columbia receive a certain salary. That is the only reason. The petition of the members of the bar states, that the duties of the judge of the criminal court are equal to the duties imposed upon the judges of the circuit court; and therefore, they ask that his salary be put on the same footing as that of the judges of the circuit court. And a bill is reported from the Judiciary Committee to make his salary equal to theirs, but not fixing it at any certain sum.

My objection is to this mode of legislation. I would ask the question here of Senators, how many of you know to-day what the salary of the circuit judges in the District of Columbia is? If Senators do not know, I should like to know how many of the people of the District of Columbia are aware of the amount of salary paid to the judges of the circuit court in this District. I apprehend very few, and this is the way that salaries are being raised. On account of some particular service, which is imposed upon a public officer, his salary is increased. For extraordinary service his salary is raised. Then follows a bill to place the salaries of other officers, whose duties generally correspond with his, upon the same footing; and in that way the increase of the salary of one judge is made the stepping-stone for the increase of the salary of another.

Now, sir, if this bill can be amended so as to say, in so many dollars and cents, how much shall be paid to the judge of the criminal court of the District of Columbia, I am willing to vote him an adequate salary; but if you place it on the ground that his salary shall be the same as that of the judges of the circuit court in the District of Columbia, then, if in aftertimes it should become proper to increase the salaries of the circuit judges in consequence of special duties being imposed upon them, the salary of the criminal judge will go up also. I like to see plain language used in our laws, that can be understood by everybody. I am not prepared at this moment with an amendment which will carry out my object. If I was, I should offer it now; but I am not familiar enough with the wording of the bill to be prepared to offer it without a little consideration. I hope the bill will lie over until I can prepare an amendment fixing the salary of the judge of the criminal court at a certain sum, because he is entitled to it, and not because somebody else has a particular sum for his services. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a protest against the election of the Hon. GRAHAM N. FITCH and the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGHT as Senators from the State of Indiana, to submit a report, accompanied by a resolution. As it is a question of privilege, I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That in the case of the contested election of the Hon. GRAHAM N. FITCH, and the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGHT, Senators returned and admitted to their seats, from the State of Indiana, that the sitting members, and all persons protesting against their election, or any of them, by themselves, or their agents or attorneys, be permitted to take testimony on the allegations of the protestants and the sitting members, touching all matters of fact therein contained, before any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana, by first giving ten days' notice of the time and place of such proceedings in some public gazette printed at Indianapolis.

Mr. BAYARD. At the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] who says it will be argued, the resolution had better go over until Monday.

The resolution lies over.

MICHAEL KINNY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 35) for the relief of Michael Kinny, late a private in company I, eighth regiment, United States Army.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Michael Kinny on the pension list, at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing on the 11th of December, 1856, and to continue during his life.

Kinny enlisted at Boston, July 6, 1849, and was honorably discharged July 6, 1854, at Fort Bliss, Texas. Subsequent to his discharge the following remarks were found on a return from Fort Clark, Texas, for the quarter ending September 30, 1854, signed by Basil Norris, assistant surgeon of the United States Army, now on file in the surgeon general's office: "On the first of August I amputated the thigh of a teamster for gunshot wound through the knee-joint; the patient was nursed by our attendants, and recovered with a good stump." It appears that the petitioner was regularly employed in the quartermaster's department, and that while engaged in unloading a wagon, he received the wound referred to. There is in evidence that Michael Kinny was a man of unexceptionably good character during all the time he was connected with the public service; the committee, therefore, deem the petitioner's case one worthy of the favorable consideration of Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

REFERENCE OF BILLS.

The bill (H. R. No. 14) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register or enrollment to the vessel called James McIndoe, now owned by Thomas Coatsworth, James G. Coatsworth, and William Coatsworth, of Buffalo, New York, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 22) to alter the time of holding the courts of the United States, for the district of South Carolina, was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution of the Senate, (No. 4,) to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,'" was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

COMMODORE PAULDING.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 7) directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding. It requests the President of the United States to cause to be made a medal, with suitable devices, to be presented to Commodore Hiram Paulding, of the Navy of the United States, as a testimonial of the high sense entertained by Congress of his gallant and judicious conduct on the 8th of December, 1857, in arresting a lawless military expedition, "set on foot" in the United States, under the command of General Walker, and in preventing it from carrying on actual war against the feeble and almost defenseless Republic of Nicaragua, with which the United States are at peace.

Mr. DOOLITTLE and Mr. CLAY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLAY. I was about to move the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, for it seems to me that it is premature to discuss it at this time, as the action of the Senate would be tantamount to prejudging a question which is now before that committee; and hence, I would suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that it should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, that they may report on it, as they have the matter at this time under their consideration, under the reference of the President's message.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, what may be the final disposition of this proposition by the Senate I cannot now foresee; but I desire to state the grounds upon which I have deemed it my duty to introduce this resolution. In stating those grounds, it will be my endeavor to address myself calmly and dispassionately, to the judgment, and only to the judgment, of the Senate. By appealing to any partisan prejudice or passion, I should not be able to aid in the accomplishment of any great or good purpose if I would, and I certainly would not if I could. Yet, sir, I may speak earnestly on this question; for, I confess, I feel deeply the importance of this proposition introduced at this juncture of our affairs, involving, as it does, not only the character and conduct of a high, gallant, and veteran officer in the Navy of the United States, but involving, also, the policy of the present Administration, our neutrality laws, the laws of nations, our relations to the feeble Republics of Central America, and, perhaps, more than all, the honor, the integrity, and the good faith of the Government of the United States.

In stating the history of this case, I shall rely mainly upon the messages of the Executive, and other public official documents. Of General Walker as a military adventurer I shall have but little to say, and in what I may have to say, it will not be my purpose to deal in the language of denunciation. We first hear of General Walker as a military adventurer in his expedition into Sonora, when, with a handful of misguided followers, he was completely repulsed and defeated. Of General Walker's second military expedition from the United States against the republics with which we are at peace, the history is but too well known to the country. He entered into Nicaragua, and there, for a time, he was more successful. He held, or seemed to hold, for a time, the power in the Government of Nicaragua; but that same power by which he acquired it—the power of the sword—was turned against him. Hemmed in at Rivas, on all sides, by an overwhelming force, with inevitable destruction before and behind him; by whom was he rescued? I repeat the question, by whom was he rescued? By the Government of the United States. Sir, in stating this important fact, I do not rely upon my own information. I rely upon the declaration of the Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report, in which he declared that—"It was deemed necessary, as a measure of humanity and policy, to direct Commodore Mervine to give General Walker and such of his men, citizens of the United States, as were willing to embrace it, an opportunity to retreat from Nicaragua;" and "the action of Commander Davis, so far as he aided General Walker and his men, by the use of the St. Mary's, to retreat from Nicaragua and return to the United States, was approved by the Department."

The expense of transporting them across the isthmus, and the expense which was incurred for "necessary food, clothing, and medicine while on shipboard," amounting to more than fifteen thousand dollars, was recommended by the Department to be borne and paid by the Government of the United States.

I repeat then, sir, that it was the Government of the United States which rescued General Walker and his command at Rivas, from the people of Nicaragua, and snatched him from the very jaws of inevitable death. Commodore Paulding, in speaking of the condition of these men at the time when they surrendered—and I believe there is no one who will question the correctness of this statement—says:

"The remnant of the miserable beings who surrendered at Rivas were conveyed in this ship, (the Wabash,) last summer, to New York, and their sufferings are yet fresh in the memory of all on board."

Two facts are established, in my judgment, beyond all controversy: first, that whatever power General Walker has acquired in Nicaragua, was ended with his surrender at Rivas, whether that power was founded de jure or de facto; whether that power existed of right, or was a power sustained or acquired by the sword only; and secondly, that but for the interference of the Government and officers of the United States, General Walker and the men in arms with him in Nicaragua, would have come to an ignominious end. And, sir, how has he borne himself towards the Government to whom he is indebted for his life? Is it not a fact but too well known, that for months he was engaged in setting on foot and preparing the means for a military expedition within the United States, to carry on war against Nicaragua? How many public meetings have been held? What public newspapers have not given accounts of them?

But it is not my purpose, sir, to dwell on these facts in detail. I will conclude what I have to say on this point by referring to a paper which brought home to the knowledge of the Government of the United States, in a manner too distinct, too direct, too authoritative, to be overlooked or disregarded, the fact that this military expedition was being set on foot in the United States to carry war into the republics of Central America. As early as the 14th of September last, it was brought home to the knowledge of the Government, by a letter addressed to the Secretary of State, which I beg leave to read:

NEW YORK, September 14, 1857.

The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republics of Guatemala and Salvador, and the Chargé d'Affaires of the Republic of Costa Rica, have the honor to make known to the Secretary of State of the United States, that there is no doubt that there is being prepared, in the southern part of this Republic, an expedition, under the orders of the adventurer William Walker, the which, according to the advices published in the public journals, will sail about the middle of the present month, or the beginning of the next, and will proceed to the Bocas del Toro, where it will receive the armament which has been prepared in this port of New York to be forwarded to said point. It is probable that the uniting of the expeditionists and the aforesaid armament, at the Bocas del Toro, may be for the purpose of these new invaders of Nicaragua entering the port of San Juan del Norte, for they have no other port at which they can enter. The undersigned hope that the Government of the United States, in view that it cannot prevent the debarkation of this expedition, so publicly and shamelessly announced, like all the others, will order that a vessel of war of the United States prevent the landing of these aggressors in the Bocas del Toro, and that positive orders be given to the vessel of war that may be lying in San Juan del Norte, also to prevent the landing of the said filibusters on that coast, causing them to return to the United States, as transgressors of the laws of this country, and as disturbers of the peace and security of friendly nations.

With the highest consideration, the undersigned have the honor to subscribe themselves, of the Secretary of State of the United States, the attentive and obedient servants,
A. J. DE YRISARRI,
LUIS MOLINA.

Hon. LEWIS CASS.

By this letter, two facts are brought home to the knowledge of the Government of the United States. First, that the expedition was in existence and being fitted out; and secondly, that Nicaragua, or the person who was here, not then recognized it is true, but who claimed to represent the powers which had the control of Nicaragua and the harbor of San Juan, in advance, and before any order was given by the Secretary of State, requested the Government of the United States to prevent the landing of this expedition, and to cause them to return to the United States. It was in consequence of this letter addressed to the Secretary of State, no doubt, that four days afterwards, the Secretary of State issued his general circular to the commanders of our fleet; and to that circular, I beg leave also to call the attention of the Senate:

WASHINGTON, September 18, 1857.

Sir: From information received at this Department, there is reason to believe that lawless persons are now engaged within the limits of the United States in setting on foot and preparing the means for military expeditions to be used against the territories of Mexico, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica—Republics with whom the United States are at peace—in direct violation of the sixth section of the act of Congress, approved 20th April, 1818. And, under the eighth section of said act, it is made lawful for the President, or such person as he shall empower, to employ the land and naval forces of the United States, and the militia thereof, "for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States." I am, therefore, directed by the President to call your attention to the subject, and to urge you to use all due diligence, and to avail yourself of all legitimate means at your command to enforce these and other provisions of the said act of 20th April, 1818, against those who may be found to be engaged in setting on foot or preparing military expeditions against the territories of Mexico, Costa Rica, and Nicaragua, so manifestly prejudicial to the national character, and so injurious to the national interest. And you are hereby instructed promptly to communicate to this Department the earliest information you may receive relative to such expeditions.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

LEWIS CASS.

Before entering upon the discussion of the legal principles involved, and giving what, in my judgment, is the true construction of the language of these instructions, I beg leave to complete briefly the statement of the case. These instructions of General Cass, given in general and somewhat ambiguous terms, as all must concede, were of such a nature, that when Lieutenant John J. Almy had occasion to act under them, he directed a letter to the Navy Department asking for more specific instructions; and in answer to this request of Lieutenant Almy, the Navy Department issued the following instructions:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, October 12, 1857.

Sir: In reply to your letter of the 7th instant, it is true that American citizens have a right to travel and go where they please, when engaged in lawful pursuits, but not to violate the laws of their own or of any other country. They have a right to expatriate themselves and to become citizens of any country which is willing to receive them, but not to make that right a mere cloak and cover for a warlike expedition against it or its Government. Your instructions do not authorize you to act arbitrarily or upon mere suspicion. You will not seize an American vessel, or bring her into port, or use the force under your command to prevent her landing her passengers, upon mere suspicion. You will be careful not to interfere with lawful commerce. But where you find that an American vessel is manifestly engaged in carrying on an expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States against the territories of Mexico, Nicaragua, or Costa Rica, contrary to the sixth section of the act of Congress of April 20, 1818, already referred to, you will use the force under your command to prevent it, and will not permit the men or arms engaged in it, or destined for it, to be landed in any port of Mexico or Central America.

En route for Chiriqui you will touch at Mobile and New Orleans, and communicate with the United States district attorney at each of those ports.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

ISAAC TOUCEY.

Lieutenant JOHN J. ALMY, Commanding United States Steamer Fulton, Washington, D. C.

In completing my statement of the facts in this case, I shall rely almost altogether upon the messages of the Executive. I understand the President of the United States to assume, as an undisputed fact, that this expedition, of which Walker was the chief, was set on foot within the jurisdiction of the United States to make war against Nicaragua, a Republic at peace with us; that it was well known to the Government of the United States that this expedition was about to be carried on against Nicaragua; that the leader of this expedition was arrested by officers of the United States, but was discharged upon giving bail in the insufficient sum of $2,000; that soon after his discharge, Walker, with his command, embarked on board the steamer Fashion, a vessel of the United States, and sailing under the flag of the United States, and entered San Juan; and under the very guns of the Saratoga, a vessel of war of the United States, lying in the waters of San Juan, he was permitted to land upon the soil of Nicaragua; that immediately after landing, he commenced, and was actually engaged in carrying on, a lawless warfare against the people and the Government of Nicaragua; and that while he was so engaged upon the shores of Nicaragua, Commodore Paulding arrived in the harbor of San Juan, in command of the flag-ship Wabash; that after he arrived there, he immediately ordered General Walker and his command to embark on board such vessels as he should designate, and compelled them to embark and return to the United States. This transaction on the part of Commodore Paulding took place on the 8th of December last. On the 30th of December, the Minister of Nicaragua, recognized by the Government of the United States, addressed to the Secretary of State a letter, of which I will read a portion:

"The undersigned, in the name of the three Governments which he represents, returns thanks to the Government of the United States for having taken away the adventurer William Walker, and his invading band, from the point of which they had taken possession on the coast of Nicaragua; thus freeing those friendly countries from the evils with which they would have been visited, had these disturbers of the peace of nations been allowed the possibility of increasing their forces by new recruits. Those who, in the service which the Government of the United States has rendered to its friend, the Republic of Nicaragua, would seek for a warrant to say that the Nicaraguan territory has been violated, will hardly find it, from the moment that the world will have learned that the Government of Nicaragua, far from complaining of a violation of her territory, looks upon that act as an assistance, directed in behalf of its inviolability, which was wounded, in effect, by certain adventurers from the United States; and that it considers such assistance, extended by this Government, as a consequence of the measures which, by his note of the 14th of September last, the undersigned had asked this Government to adopt, giving orders to the Navy of the United States to capture the violators of the laws of neutrality.

"The point from which Commodore Paulding forced away those bandits, the violators of the laws of all nations, and, as such, justly assimilated, by the law of nations, to pirates and foes of mankind, is an almost desert one, on which there exist no Nicaraguan authorities that could have managed the apprehension of those felons. Nicaragua, therefore, considers that the proceedings of Commodore Paulding against Walker and his horde were entirely justifiable; for, as a man-of-war of any nation may take up pirates from a desert island, or one so thinly peopled that they can assert their dominion over it, although that island might belong to another sovereign nation, just so can bandits be apprehended, as enemies of the human race, by the armed vessels of a friendly nation, on a point of a foreign coast, which may be placed under circumstances like to those of the island mentioned by way of illustration.

"Considering it highly important that the tenor of this note—especially the portion touching emigration to Nicaragua—should be made public, the undersigned would entertain the hope that the Secretary of State will find no objection to have its contents published.

"The undersigned, with highest consideration, has the honor of tendering to the Secretary of State the renewed assurance that he is his respectful servant.

"A. J. DE YRISARRI.

"Hon. LEWIS CASS, Secretary of State, &c."

Seven days after this letter was received by the Department of State, the President of the United States communicated his message to the Senate, in which he used the following language:

"It unquestionably does not lie in the mouth of her invaders to complain in her name that she has been rescued by Commodore Paulding from their assaults."

And again:

"In regard to Nicaragua, she has sustained no injury by the act of Commodore Paulding. This has injured to her benefit, and relieved her from a dreaded invasion. She alone would have any right to complain of the violation of her territory; and it is quite certain she will never exercise this right."

I regret, sir, that the President of the United States did not feel called upon, also, to say that the Minister from the State of Nicaragua had expressly returned the thanks of Nicaragua to the Government of the United States for the act of Commodore Paulding, instead of complaining of a violation of her territory.

Upon these facts, which I have endeavored to state as briefly as I was able, I shall maintain that Commodore Paulding neither violated his instructions, when fairly construed, nor the laws of the United States, nor the territory of Nicaragua, nor the laws of nations; and that he is therefore entitled to the unqualified commendation of the President, of Congress, of the people of the United States, and, I may add, of the civilized world.

As I have already stated, the instructions which were issued by General Cass, as Secretary of State, and by Mr. Toucey, as the Secretary of the Navy, were general in their terms. They were little more, and they were certainly nothing less, than to enjoin on the commanders of the Navy the use of all diligence, and of all legitimate means within their power to enforce the provisions of the act of 1818. In reference to the rule which is to govern instructions issued to military commanders, whether at sea or upon land, I beg leave to refer to a distinguished authority, (Puffendorf,) and, I believe, all other writers on the laws of nations agree with him. Puffendorf lays down the rule, that while a general or admiral, with limited commissions or instructions, may not exercise any powers not given by them, that a paramount necessity arising from new and unexpected circumstances may compel him to go beyond the letter of his instructions to carry out their object. I quote his words:

"An admiral at sea, who is by his orders to be only on the defensive, may yet, notwithstanding such a confinement, upon provocation sufficient break in upon the enemy's fleet, and sink and burn as many of their ships as he can; all that he is forbidden is to challenge the enemy first, when they do not think of fighting. And so a general on land, though his instructions be not to engage the enemy, may yet, if he be attacked in his intrenchments, not only repulse them when they would force his camp, but make a sally and give them battle; and if he be set upon his march, and finds he cannot make a safe and honorable retreat, he may justly venture a fight."—Puffendorf, book 8, chapter 6, section 10.

And it must have been in reference to cases of such overwhelming necessity that Tully lays down the doctrine—

"That in affairs of such unexpected and straightening circumstances, a man should not think of staying for the instructions of the Senate, but be a Senate to himself, and do what he thinks will be best for the advantage of the Commonwealth."

As applied to ordinary circumstances, and in the absence of such overwhelming necessity, I admit that this doctrine would be altogether too broad, and would not receive my sanction; but there are exigencies which no human being can foresee, for which no specific instructions can be given in advance, which throw around a military or naval commander an absolute necessity for instant action—where, to retreat from his position, would be dishonor; and to wait for instructions from a Department a thousand miles away, would be a crime against all the laws of God and man. When charged with the execution, therefore, of a special undertaking, it is always implied in the instructions given, when they do not expressly forbid it, that he may do all in his power which the honor of his country, the laws of nature, and the laws of nations will allow, to effect the purpose of that special undertaking.

It can be pretended by no one that the instructions which were issued by the Secretary of State, or the Secretary of the Navy, forbid Commodore Paulding from touching the soil of Nicaragua. They expressly contemplate his acting in command of vessels within the waters of Nicaragua, and within its jurisdiction. The authority given is to prevent the landing of these persons upon the soil of Nicaragua. The authority given is the power to enforce all the provisions of the act of 1818—among them, "to prevent the carrying on" of this lawless war against Nicaragua. It might become absolutely necessary, in order to prevent the landing of an expedition, that the commodore in command of a fleet should touch the soil itself. If we were to suppose that the expedition consisted of ten thousand men, instead of three hundred or four hundred, that it was embarked on board a dozen ships, instead of one, it might become necessary for the commodore of the fleet to land and take possession and control of a fort on shore, to command the entrance into the harbor, and thus prevent the landing of the remainder of the expedition.

But again, Mr. President, I beg leave to refer to another authority, and I claim the indulgence of the Senate for so doing, for the reason that the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH,] on a former occasion, speaking in reference to the doctrine which I had expressed, advised me very kindly to look into the authorities on the subject, saying that I would find no law to sustain the positions which I have taken. I refer to Vattel, who says that—"There are occasions when the subject may reasonably suppose the sovereign's will, and act in consequence of his tacit command."

It was this principle which authorized and justified Commodore Dale to commence hostilities against the Tripolitans in 1801, when it was believed that war was intended by them. Neither Commodore Dale nor Captain Sterret, the officer who made the first capture, was censured; but, on the contrary, both were highly applauded, and the latter received the thanks of Congress and a sword, although at the time war had not been declared against Tripoli. It was the same principle which authorized and justified Commodore Rodgers in blockading the port of Tunis, and forcing the Bey to terms; and afterwards drawing his ships up before the batteries of Tangier, and threatening hostilities to the Emperor of Morocco, in the year 1805. It also authorized and justified Commodore Decatur in threatening hostilities to the Bey of Tunis and the Bashaw of Tripoli, in the year 1815, and forcing them to restore large amounts of money taken from our citizens. Neither of these officers was censured for his conduct, which he believed to be in accordance with the wishes of the nation, although the United States had not declared war against those Powers. Sir, it was by virtue of this principle that Captain Ingraham, in the harbor of Smyrna, performed the gallant deed for which he received the thanks of Congress.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him, as he has referred to me? The point on which I told the Senator to look into the authorities, he has not alluded to at all. I understood him to state, on a former occasion, that the Government of the United States was liable to foreign nations for any act of private aggression committed by any one of our citizens, and I told the Senator then that I should like to see the law for it, and I should like to hear the law for it now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That point in this argument I shall by no means overlook. I shall refer to the authorities on that question. But to return to the point I was considering: in my judgment, the only fair construction to be put upon the language, vague and general as it must be conceded to be, which is used in the circular of General Cass, and in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, is this: that it was intended to confer on the commander of the fleet all the power which the President of the United States himself could have exercised for the same purpose. If these instructions bear any other construction; if it were intended by the President of the United States to withhold any power which he might lawfully exercise, it would be but equivalent to saying that the Administration of the Government was in collusion with General Walker. Will any friend of the Administration stand up on this floor and say that the President of the United States intended to withhold the exercise of any power with which he was clothed by the law, for the purpose of putting an end to these lawless expeditions? Will any one stand up and say that, underneath the vague and general words contained in those instructions, there is a concealed intention to withhold the exercise of such power? Sir, there is but one alternative in construing the instructions given to Commodore Paulding: either the Administration intended in good faith to give to him all the power which the law would give, or the Administration purposely withheld the power in order to collude with General Walker. For my own part, I prefer to give to those instructions that construction which is consistent with the honor and good faith of the Government of the United States, and which is consistent with the honor and the good faith of the Executive, when he declares, as he does in his message:

"The Government itself, at least in the estimation of the world, becomes an accomplice in the commission of this crime, unless it adopts all the means necessary to prevent and to punish it."

Was it intended by these instructions not to give any power which the President could give to Commodore Paulding? If such was the intention, by the words of the President himself let the Administration be judged. The Administration would become an accomplice in the commission of the crime, unless it adopted all the means necessary to prevent and punish it.

"This now brings us to the consideration of the important question, 'what powers may the President of the United States lawfully exercise upon this subject?' It must be borne in mind that the people of the United States live under three distinct systems of law. There are the laws of the several States, whose jurisdiction is bounded by the limits of the States themselves; there are the laws of the United States, whose jurisdiction is coextensive with the whole of the United States; there are the laws of nations, whose jurisdiction is coextensive with the civilized world. The laws of nations, as well as the laws of the United States, are to be regarded by the Government of the United States. They are equally binding upon its Government, upon its citizens, and upon every department. The people of the United States therefore owe a triple allegiance to the laws of the States in which they live; to the laws of the United States, and to the laws of nations. In our intercourse with the nations of the world, with all foreign nations, we are governed, not by the statutes of the United States, not by the statutes of the several States, but by the code of laws which is denominated the law of nations, based upon those maxims which are written in adamant upon the common conscience and the common sense of mankind. By our treaty of friendship with the Republics of Central America, as well as by the laws of nations, this Government was bound to keep the peace. Every department of this Government was under that obligation, and the President of the United States, as the chief executive officer of the United States, having charge more especially of our foreign relations, and of our intercourse with foreign States, when he took the oath of office, was sworn to see that the laws of nations, so far as our own Government and our own citizens were concerned, should be faithfully executed, and should not be violated. With great force, therefore, it might be urged that, even independent of the act of 1818, the President of the United States, as the commander-in-chief of the Navy, might interfere if he saw that citizens, sailing upon our ships, under our flag, were committing depredations upon other nations and the citizens of other nations; that he might lawfully interfere to preserve the peace, to arrest them in the act, and prevent the commission of those crimes against the laws of nations and the peace of the world. But, sir, if any doubts existed on that subject, the statute of 1818 has removed them in my judgment entirely; and I beg leave now to call the attention of the Senate to the construction to be given to the language of the act.

I confess that I was greatly surprised by the position which was taken by the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] and other Senators upon this floor, that the President of the United States, by the eighth section of this act, was not authorized to employ the Navy of the United States beyond our territorial jurisdiction outside of one marine league from our coast, or a cannon shot from shore. So clear is the language of this statute, in my judgment, that, had I not heard such an opinion declared upon this floor, I would not have believed there could be any two opinions about it. I beg leave to call your attention to the language of the act. The sixth section is as follows:

"That if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for, any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince, or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are [at] peace, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $3,000, and imprisoned not more than three years."

It is the eighth section of the act which clothes the President of the United States with the power to employ the land and naval forces—I now read so much of the section as is applicable to this case. After declaring the power, the purpose for which it may be used is stated in this language:

"For the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States, against the territories or dominions of any foreign prince, or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace."

The crime against the laws of the United States is defined in the sixth section of the act; and it consists in what? "In beginning and setting on foot an expedition, with intent to carry it beyond their jurisdiction, against the territories of some other State." It is not, I agree with the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] the intention which constitutes a crime independent of the act itself; and what the statute of the United States assumes to punish is not the carrying on of the expedition against a foreign territory or State, but the beginning and setting on foot of the expedition within the territories of the United States.

But the eighth section of the act gives the President a power to do what? Not to prevent the setting on foot, nor the beginning of an expedition, but to prevent the carrying on of an expedition from the United States against the territories or dominions of a foreign State. So far as the crime of setting on foot or beginning an expedition within the territories of the United States is concerned, the ordinary process of the courts of the United States is sufficient. The courts have jurisdiction; the marshal has the power to arrest; and the President of the United States, if called upon to interfere, may be called upon to aid the marshal in the execution of process; but when so called upon, it is by virtue of other provisions of other statutes of the United States, and this provision of this statute for that purpose would be wholly unnecessary. It is to give to the President power to prevent the carrying on of this expedition, after it leaves the jurisdiction of the United States, against a foreign State, that this power is given at all. It would be utterly impossible to carry on an expedition against the territory of Nicaragua, a thousand miles off, and to carry it on within the jurisdiction of the United States, and it is absurd to suppose it. It is utterly impossible.

Again, sir, to a person of fair ordinary understanding, what is the meaning of this language: "To carry on an expedition from one nation against the territories of another?" Apply it to Governments, and by all the rules of construction it means nothing more nor less than to carry on war, aggressive war, by sea or land, by one Government against another. Applied to individuals, what is it? It is but a lawless incursion, by the citizens of one Government into the territories of another Government, to make lawless war against its citizens. It means nothing more, and it can mean nothing less. With all deference, therefore, to the opinions of honorable Senators, I must beg leave to say that, in my opinion, there is not a shadow of foundation for this construction of the act of 1818.

Allow me to inquire why any such construction should be given to it? Is there any reason for it? Is there any principle involved in it? What is our Navy for, and why do we expend millions in its support, if it is only to act within one marine league of our coast, within cannon shot from shore? Shall I be answered that the object of our Navy is to afford protection to our citizens, wherever they may go, over the sea, throughout the civilized world, and, at the same time, must I be told that that Navy must not be used by the President of the United States, as commander-in-chief, for the purpose of preventing organized bodies of our own citizens from carrying on lawless war against the citizens and territories of our friendly sister Republics? A glorious thing, indeed, it was when Commander Ingraham, in the harbor of Smyrna, threw the flag of the United States over the prostrate form of the poor Hungarian exile, fleeing from the Austrian police to seek its protection! Did he stop to inquire whether it was within the letter of his instructions? Did he stop to inquire, even, whether he was within the jurisdiction of the United States, and within cannon shot of its shore? Did he stop to inquire whether he was not within the waters of a neutral territory? No, sir. He did not point to any act of Congress, to any section of the statute, to any letter in his instructions. He looked, rather, down deep into his own heart, and read that law which the Almighty has stamped upon the conscience and the common sense of mankind. As he stood upon that deck, he remembered the honor, the dignity, and the power of that glorious Republic which he there represented. He looked upon that glorious flag which he bore, and pointed to his guns. It was a glorious thing, indeed, thus to afford protection to all, the humblest of our citizens, and to all who may claim our protection throughout the civilized world. But is it any the less glorious, or less a duty, before high heaven or the world, to throw the protection of that giant arm over the weak and defenseless citizens of other nations, from lawless invasions by organized bodies of our own citizens? Mr. President, put yourself in his position, in view of all the facts, circumstances, and the exigencies, with which he was surrounded, and what would you have done? Had Commodore Paulding, when he arrived in the harbor of San Juan, quietly folded his arms as he stood upon his deck, and looked on, having full power to prevent it, Nicaragua being in no condition to resist it, but beseeching the Government of the United States to prevent it, and not have interfered, would he not have been an accessory to the crime?

This brings me to the consideration of another important question involved in this case, and that is, did Commodore Paulding, by the act of capturing and arresting Walker and his command on the soil of Nicaragua, violate the territory of Nicaragua, or the rights of Nicaragua? No other Government upon the face of the earth has a right to complain. The President says truly that the invaders of Nicaragua would have no right to complain, in her name, of the invasion of her territory. Put this case in the strongest light against Commodore Paulding, and what is it? He has inflicted no injury upon Nicaragua, no injury upon any human being; he has saved the lives of the citizens of Nicaragua, and perhaps the very existence of the Government itself. It must be conceded on all hands, that if Commodore Paulding has been guilty of any violation of law, it is the merest technical violation in the world, a mere imaginary injury which he has inflicted. Nicaragua not only did not complain, but she has ratified the act. More than a week before the President of the United States assumed to pass his censure upon Commodore Paulding, the letter of the Minister of Nicaragua, addressed to the State Department, had expressly waived any technical right to complain which she might prefer against the Government of the United States. She had expressly declared that she looked upon the act not as a violation of her territory, but as a friendly act, directed to assist her in defending her territory and its inviolability.

But aside from the fact that Nicaragua assented in advance; aside from the fact that Nicaragua has given her sanction and returned her sincere thanks and acknowledgments, since the act was done; I ask, upon the rules which govern the intercourse of nations, whether Nicaragua could have any right to complain, if she would? I will stand with the honorable Senator from Ohio, or any other Senator on this floor, and maintain the sacred inviolability of the territory of all neutral nations against hostile invasions. I admit the general rule of law to be that no State, with its armed forces, may enter the soil, or within the jurisdiction of another State, with hostile purposes. But while I admit this to be the general rule of the law, are there no exceptions? There is one exception, where express consent has been given in advance, as I maintain it was, in substance, in this case. There is another, when the consent may be presumed, from the circumstances and the necessities of the case, and may be subsequently ratified by the Government whose territory has been invaded. It is of the very essence of giving offense that the entry must be with hostile and not with friendly intentions. I go further, and maintain, that in cases of paramount necessity the forces of one nation may enter, not only without the assent, but even against the express refusal of the neutral Power, as in the cases to which I have already referred, of Commodore Dale, Captain Sterret, Commodore Rodgers, Commodore Decatur, and Commander Ingraham. So, too, in pursuing piratical expeditions they may enter upon neutral territory, and why? Because their entry is presumed not to be hostile, but to be friendly to the nation whose territory is entered. Pirates and robbers, by the laws of all nations are outlaws, and it is not to be presumed that any nation intends to afford protection to pirates and outlaws; and you may enter on their soil for the purpose of arresting them. Such were the instructions expressly given by the Government of the United States in the case of Commodore Porter.

"If, in the pursuit of pirates found at sea, they shall retreat into the unsettled parts of the islands, or foreign territory, liberty is given to pursue them so long only as there is reasonable prospect of being able to apprehend them."

As the case of Commodore Porter has been referred to, I may as well state that Commodore Porter, when he was put on his trial for the occurrences at Foxardo, was charged in the specification, not for entering on the soil of a neutral territory, but for capturing the citizens of Spain, and inflicting injury on them, and divers acts of hostility. But again, sir, Vattel, in speaking upon this subject, says:

"When, therefore, an army find themselves exposed to imminent destruction, or unable to return to their own country, unless they pass through neutral territory, they have a right to pass in spite of the sovereign, and to force their way, sword in hand." "Extreme necessity may even authorize the temporary seizure of a neutral town, and the putting a garrison therein, with a view to cover ourselves from the enemy, or to prevent the execution of his designs against that town, when the sovereign is not able to defend it."—Vattel, book 3, chapter 7, section 122.

But, Mr. President, if there are, as it is claimed by the friends of General Walker, some circumstances in his history which ought to rescue his name and his command from the odious epithet of being guilty of piracy, still, it must be acknowledged, as is stated by the President, in his message, that he has been guilty of "the crime of setting on foot, or providing the means for a military expedition within the United States, to make war against a foreign State with which we are at peace"—a crime of an "aggravated and dangerous character." It was a crime against Nicaragua; and so far as that is concerned, it was a crime in the nature of treason, for it aimed at the subversion of the Government itself. It was a crime against the Government of the United States also, in usurping the war-making power of the United States, which belongs to Congress alone, and so far it is in its nature of the degree of treason against the Government of the United States.

But, sir, I undertake to justify the act of Commodore Paulding on a still stronger ground; and this brings me to the point to which my honorable friend from Ohio has called my attention. There is no writer upon the law of nations, I believe, who does not maintain that, if one State knowingly suffers its citizens to organize for the purpose of carrying on war against a nation at peace with it, and it has the power to hinder it, it is a just cause of war if it does not hinder and prevent it. Bring this case home to ourselves. The President of the United States is right when he declares "that people never existed who would call any other nation to a stricter account than we should ourselves, for tolerating lawless expeditions from their shores to make war upon any portion of our territories."

Suppose that some General Walker, for months in the British provinces of Canada, should be engaged in setting on foot and preparing the means for a military expedition to sail and take possession of, and burn down, the city of Buffalo, in the State of New York; that these facts are well known to the Government of Canada; that they have the power at their command by which they can prevent it, but they suffer it to set sail, to arrive in the port of Buffalo, and destroy the city: will the honorable Senator from Ohio pretend that that would not be a just cause of war by the United States against Great Britain? Puffendorf, to whom I will again refer, lays down the rule in this language:

"No community, whether civil or otherwise, is obliged by any action of particular members, without some culpable act or omission of its own."—See Grotius, l. 2, c. 21, s. 2.

But among the several ways that commonwealths are involved in wars, from the injuries committed by their subjects, he mentions, as first among them, sufferance, and uses this language:

"As to the matter of sufferance, it is manifest that the person who knoweth the commission of a crime, and hath power to hinder it, without apparent danger of greater evil by doing it, and is obliged to do it, must be supposed to be guilty of the crime himself. For it is necessary the knowledge of the fact should be attended with the power to hinder it; one of these separately not being sufficient to communicate any share in the guilt, and the governors of commonwealths are presumed to know what their subjects frequently and openly commit; and their power to hinder it is always supposed, unless the want of it be manifestly proved."—See Grotius, l. 2, c. 21, s. 3, 4, 5, 6.

Governments, therefore, like individuals, may be held responsible, not only for what they do, but for what they omit to do; not only for what is done by their express authority, but for that which is done by their own citizens to the knowledge of the Government, and when the Government has the power to hinder it. Let me take this case: by the Constitution of the United States no one of the States of this Union can declare war. The war-making power is in Congress alone; but suppose the State of New York, notwithstanding the Constitution of the United States, should, in fact, raise a large army for the purpose of taking possession of the provinces of Canada, and should invade its territories, take possession of its towns, and subjugate its people: would it not be a just cause of war by Great Britain against the Government of the United States? Would not war actually exist between the two nations? In vain would the Federal Government disavow the act; in vain would our Minister at St. James hold up the Constitution of the United States, and say that by the Constitution New York has no right to declare war—the war-making power rests with the Government of the United States alone. Sir, the unanswerable, the self-evident, the overwhelming reply, would come: "New York is a part of the United States; the citizens of New York are citizens of the United States, and they did make war. New York is a part of the United States, and it is the business of the Federal Government to see that New York obeys the Federal Constitution; it is the business of the Federal Government, and not the business of Great Britain." It would be in vain to disavow the act; in vain to declare that the State of New York had no power, by the Constitution of the United States, to make war upon the British territory. If this Government may be involved in war by suffering its own citizens to organize illegal expeditions for the purpose of waging war upon a friendly Government—if that be a just cause of war against this Government—then I maintain the doctrine to be inevitable that the Government of the United States is bound to exercise every power that it possesses to arrest that war at the very earliest moment, and to prevent its further progress.

I hold, therefore, that in this case, knowing that this expedition existed; having full power to hinder it; besought by Nicaragua to do so, Nicaragua being in no condition to resist it, we were bound by every principle of the law of nations, every dictate of common sense, every precept of religion and humanity, to arrest it at the earliest stage of its progress. I maintain that if Commodore Paulding, in that exigency, and within the harbor of San Juan, when he had this command of General Walker completely within his power, and within the reach of his guns, had done otherwise, he would have become accessory to the crime. Representing this nation, as he did, there on that ground, if he had refused to arrest him and his command, he would have committed the Government of the United States to the very war which Walker was waging against the Government of Nicaragua. From the hour that he should so refuse, every advance made by General Walker would be an advance by our permission; every blow he struck would be a blow struck by our own citizens, because we did not withhold it. Every shot he made would be fired by our permission; and every drop of blood that he shed would stain our hands.

Sir, in that exigency, Commodore Paulding could not have done otherwise than he did, without bringing dishonor upon the Government of the United States, upon its good faith, and its integrity. Nicaragua might complain, indeed, that we suffered this lawless expedition to violate her territorial jurisdiction; but she not only does not complain, she has no right to complain that we have withdrawn it from her jurisdiction. She might complain, indeed, that these forces from the United States were permitted to burn down the dwellings of her citizens, and to take their lives; but she has no right to complain because we restrained them from making any further progress in this lawless war against her. She might, indeed, complain that we suffered the tiger to be unchained, but not that we chained him up again. She might, indeed, complain that, by our own culpable act, when we had the power to hinder it, we "let slip the dogs of war;" but certainly she has no right to complain that we seized them and called them home again.

Sir, I maintain that this was a case of as imperative necessity as any case of self-defense. It was of vital necessity to save the lives and property of the peaceful citizens of the Republic of Nicaragua; and of vital necessity to save the very Government itself. It was of equally vital necessity to save the honor, the integrity, and the good faith of the Government of the United States; and, perhaps, to save us from a war with Nicaragua, who, from her very feebleness, might become the most powerful of adversaries, enlisting not only the sympathy, but perhaps the support, of France, Great Britain, and the world, in arms against us for tolerating such expeditions against our peaceful neighbors.

Sir, let me strip this transaction of all its high-sounding titles; let me tear off all the paraphernalia of war; let there be no flags, no armament, no drums beating; bring it home to a simple transaction between individuals, and how does it stand? There is a maxim of the law under which we live, in every State, that a man's home is his castle; no person may trespass upon it; no intruder may enter it; even the officers of the law may be forbidden an entrance. Let me put this case: suppose the head of a family, or the head of a plantation, should be informed that his own sons, or members of his family, or others for whose acts he might deem himself responsible, had begun and set on foot an expedition, for the purpose of carrying it on against the peaceful dwelling on a neighboring farm or plantation, and that their purpose was in the night time to set fire to the dwelling, and burn it to the ground, with its sleeping inmates; suppose the head of this family, informed of these facts, should at once procure a force for the purpose of preventing this expedition from being carried on to its terrible consummation; they escape; he pursues them; he follows them upon the highway; he arrives upon the highway just in front of the premises, when, with their torches all lighted, they are ready to set fire to the dwelling: must he stop at the gate? Is there any law, human or divine, which forbids his entering upon the premises? Could he justify himself by saying: "I did not authorize it; I endeavored to prevent it; but I have no right to trespass upon my neighbor's premises, though I go to save his life, my sons from crime, and myself from infamy; my neighbor's home is his castle; it is sacred from all intrusion?" No, sir; he would become an accessory to the guilt, if he did not enter the premises, and even enter into the house, for the purpose of preventing the commission of the crime. Would any action of trespass lie against him? Is there a judge in Christendom who would not charge the jury, if they were called to try it as a mere question of technical trespass, that, from the circumstances of the case, the jury might presume that he entered with the permission of the owner, and that no action of trespass would lie against him?

Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senate but a very few moments longer, while I run a parallel between the case of Commodore Paulding and the action of the present Administration in relation to it, and the case of General Jackson and the action of the Administration of Mr. Monroe. General Jackson entered the territory of Spain with an armed force, not only without its consent, but against the express remonstrance of its authorities. The Governor General, writing to General Jackson, says:

"I have solemnly to protest against this proceeding, as an offense against my sovereign; and I do exhort you, and require of you, forthwith to withdraw from the same, in default of which, and in case of a continuance of your aggression, I shall repel force by force."

In this case Nicaragua invites the act. Nicaragua tenders its sincere thanks and acknowledgments to the Government of the United States for what Commodore Paulding has done, as a friendly act towards the Government of Nicaragua. The reasons given by General Jackson, quoting from his own letter, I beg leave to state:

"This is the third time the American troops have been compelled to enter Pensacola from the same causes. Twice had the enemy been expelled, and the place left in quiet possession of those who had permitted the irregular occupancy. This time it must be held until Spain has the power or will to maintain her neutrality. This is justifiable, on the immutable principles of self-defense. The Government of the United States is bound to protect her citizens; but weak would be all her efforts, and ineffectual the best advised measures, if the Floridas are to be free to every enemy, and on the pretext of policy or necessity, Spanish fortresses are to be opened to their use, and every aid and comfort afforded. I have been explicit, to preclude the necessity of a tedious negotiation. My resolution is fixed; and I have strength enough to enforce it."

The reasons assigned by Commodore Paulding for arresting General Walker and his command are stated by himself, as follows:

"I could not regard Walker and his followers in any other light than as outlaws who had escaped from the vigilance of the officers of the Government, and left our shores for the purpose of rapine and murder; and I saw no other way to vindicate the law, and redeem the honor of our country, than by disarming and sending them home."

"In doing so, I am sensible of the responsibility that I have incurred, and confidently look to the Government for my justification."

"Regarded in its true light, the case appears to me a clear one; the points few and strong."

"Walker came to Point Arenas from the United States, having, in violation of law, set on foot a military organization to make war upon a people with whom we are at peace. He landed there with armed men and munitions of war, in defiance of the guns of a ship-of-war placed there to prevent his landing."

"With nothing to show that he acted by authority, he formed a camp, hoisted the Nicaraguan flag, called it the 'headquarters of the army of Nicaragua,' and signed himself 'commander-in-chief.'"

"With this pretension he claimed the right of a lawful general over all persons and things within sight of his flag. Without right or authority, he landed fifty men at the mouth of the river Colorado, seized the fort of Castillo, on the San Juan, captured steamers and the goods of merchants in transit to the interior, killed men, and made prisoners of the peaceful inhabitants, sending to the harbor of San Juan del Norte some thirty or forty men, women, and children, in the steamer Morgan."

"In doing these things without the show of authority, they were guilty of rapine and murder, and must be regarded as outlaws and pirates. They can have no claim to be regarded in any other light."

"Humanity, as well as law and justice and national honor, demanded the dispersion of these lawless men."

"The remnant of the miserable beings who surrendered at Rivas were conveyed in this ship, last summer, to New York, and their sufferings are yet fresh in the memory of all on board."

"For the above reasons, which appear to my mind quite sufficient, I have disarmed and sent to the United States General William Walker, and his outlawed and piratical followers, for trial, or for whatever action the Government in its wisdom may think proper to pursue."

What was the language of the administration of Mr. Monroe, when the Spanish Government remonstrated with the Government of the United States for this invasion of her territory? Mr. Adams, then Secretary of State, in his letter to the Spanish Minister, says:

"By all the laws of neutrality and of war, as well as of prudence and of humanity, he was warranted in anticipating his enemy by the amicable, and, that being refused, by the forcible occupation of the fort. There will need no citations from printed treatises on international law to prove the correctness of this principle. It is engraved in adamant on the common sense of mankind. No writer upon the law of nations ever pretended to contradict it. None, of any reputation or authority, ever omitted to assert it."

Allow me to inquire, did the administration of President Monroe censure General Jackson? Did the administration of President Monroe send a message to any branch of Congress, filled up with half censure and half apology? No, sir. The language used by that Administration I beg leave to quote:

"The President will neither inflict punishment, nor pass a censure, upon General Jackson, for that conduct, the motives for which were founded in the purest patriotism; of the necessity for which he had the most immediate and effectual means of forming a judgment; and the vindication of which is written in every page of the law of nations, as well as in the first law of nature—self-defense."

The only regret that I feel is, that the present Administration did not stand by Commodore Paulding as the administration of Monroe stood by General Jackson, and instead of apologizing and half censuring the act, did not approve it openly, frankly, firmly, and have done justice to that gallant and veteran officer, who, under these trying circumstances, sustained the honor, the integrity, and the good faith of the Government of the United States.

There is a single remark in the passage I have just quoted, which strikes me with great force:

"Of the necessity for which he had the most immediate and effectual means of forming a judgment."

So it is, and so it ever has been, that in the midst of action upon the field or upon the sea the commander of armies or of fleets has the best means of judging of the necessity which compels instant action, from which he cannot withdraw without dishonoring himself, and where, as I said before, to wait for instructions would be a crime against God and man. It is to my mind no mystery why the popular heart pays its homage to the great military and naval commanders who have displayed this highest quality of the human mind. We all know in our own experience, that there are times when we see with a much clearer conscience and a stronger brain than at others. We know, too, that in the midst of action, in trying emergencies, a military commander is often wrought up to the very highest point of enthusiasm, when all that is manly within him is roused to the point almost of inspiration, and he sees as no other eyes can see, the circumstances, the exigencies, the necessities which are pressing upon him for immediate, instant action. Especially was this true in reference to the great man now departed, to whose course I have referred. He was among the few of those men that occasionally appear upon the stage of human action to give direction to its affairs—one of those gifted, providential men, who are endowed with that which neither wealth can purchase, power monopolize, institutions of learning bestow, nor dying men bequeath; one of those who come into the world, whether in a palace or a manger, with souls lighted with celestial fire and natures stamped with the impress of God's nobility. Sir, the remark which is made by the administration of Mr. Monroe, in speaking of the conduct of General Jackson, that he had the best means of judging of the necessity of the act, is equally true in the case of Commodore Paulding. In my judgment, if he had done otherwise, if he had declined to arrest this expedition of Walker, he himself would have become accessory to it; he would have committed the Government of the United States, and made it responsible for every act that was done after his refusal to interpose.

Mr. President, allusion was made by the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] to the case of Texas, and to the doctrine which was laid down by Mr. Webster and others, on that subject; but I have occupied the attention of the Senate so long already, that I fear I should do injustice to the Senate, as well as to myself, if I should continue the discussion any longer. I will only say, in conclusion, that I do not object to the doctrine of expatriation, as it is properly understood. I do not deny the right of all citizens of any nation in the world, peacefully to emigrate from one jurisdiction to take up their home within the jurisdiction of another; but I, at the same time, maintain that they have no right to make that the mere pretext or cloak for setting on foot a military expedition to go into the territories of peaceful neighboring republics, not to find a home, but to wage war against the citizens and the Governments of those republics.

Nor do I object to the peaceful expansion of the territories and the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States. When the Government of the United States and the policy of the Administration can be again restored to what I understand to be the true policy of the republican fathers in this Government; when the doctrine can be again enunciated, which I understand to be the true doctrine, that the Constitution of the United States of itself carries slavery nowhere; that the Constitution of the United States of its own force does not carry the law of slavery into any Territory or any State, I shall not object to the peaceful expansion of the territories of the United States. I have looked forward to the time when, in the visions of my youth, and in the hopes of my maturer years, I have expected to see, by peaceful acquisitions and treaty stipulations, the dominion of the United States bounded not only by the Atlantic on the east, and the Pacific on the west, but by the Arctic ocean on the north and the Isthmus of Darien on the south. I have looked forward to the period, and hoped I might see it, when, in the fullness of time and under the operation of the laws of peaceful emigration, all the continent of North America might become embraced within the dominion of the Government of the United States. With something more than a dream of fancy I have looked forward to the time, if the flag of the United States is not to be made the flag of slavery extension instead of the flag of liberty, when it will bear, not thirteen stars, nor thirty-one stars, but be spangled all over with stars, and our glorious mountain bird shall plant it upon the highest peak of the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada, where it shall bear, and bear forever, the chosen name and the chosen motto of our forefathers: upon the one side "the United States of America," and upon the other "E Pluribus Unum,"—though many, we are one—and that it will stand there forever.

Mr. BROWN. I have listened to the speech of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin with some pleasure and some profit. I gave notice the other day of my purpose to move an amendment to his resolution. That amendment will indicate distinctly to the Senate how far I differ from the Senator who has just resumed his seat. I send it to the table, and ask to have it read.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, which is to strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert the following:

That Congress has heard with surprise of the arrest of William Walker, and about one hundred and fifty other prisoners, at Punta Arenas, in Nicaragua, by Hiram Paulding, commanding United States naval squadron, on the 8th day of December, 1857; and seeing that said act was in violation of the territorial sovereignty of a friendly Power, and not sanctioned by any existing law, Congress disavows it; and being officially notified that said Paulding acted without instructions from the President or the Secretary of the Navy, Congress expresses its condemnation of his conduct in this regard.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, if I had any prepared, set speech to make, I should, of course, prefer making it on some other day than this; but I have not. What I have to say can as well be expressed in five or ten minutes as in as many hours. It will be seen that the proposition which I submit contains very few and very plain suggestions. I first assert, in the amendment, that Congress has heard with surprise of the arrest of William Walker and his associates, about one hundred and fifty in number, without giving to Mr. Walker any style. I do not even call him General Walker. I do not give to the people who were with him a habitation anywhere, but speak of them as they were—as persons. I claim that that is a truism in point of fact, that when the intelligence reached us, Congress was surprised. Is there a man who hears me now that does not respond to that declaration, that he was surprised by the intelligence that this arrest had been made?

When I take the ground that it was done in violation of the territorial sovereignty of Nicaragua, I do not undertake to locate the sovereignty or to give it any particular designation or direction. I simply take the ground that the sovereignty is somewhere; that it does not belong to us; that by invading it we violated it. Nicaragua is, beyond all question, no part of the United States. It is a foreign territory. Commodore Paulding, with an armed force, landed on the shores and made arrests, in violation of the sovereignty of that territory. I care not whether the sovereignty be in William Walker, as its legitimate President, or in the party who now claim it, or anybody else. It is a discovered country; the sovereignty rests somewhere, but beyond all dispute it is not in the United States. When we landed there with an armed force, and made arrests, we violated the sovereignty. I care not in whose person it may exist, or who has the right to control it for the time being.

The next proposition is, that the act was not sanctioned by any existing law. I listened to the speech of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, to hear under what law this act of Commodore Paulding was to be justified. The President tells us, in the very outset of his message, that it was a "grave error" on the part of Commodore Paulding. He does not pretend, in his message, to justify it on any legal grounds—although he undertakes to palliate the offense, as I conceive it to be, of the commodore. I have listened, but I have listened in vain, for a suggestion from some quarter, which would show that there was lawful authority for this act. The Senator, it is true, has read to us from Vattel and Puffendorf, and other writers on international law, but all his authorities point to cases not at all like this. He has read us no authority from Puffendorf, or Vattel, or any other writer on international law, nor can he, which shows that you have the power to land on the shores of a friendly country and make arrests; to arrest the man who has been recognized as the President of the country by your own Government, and bring him away. William Walker was recognized as the de facto President of the Republic of Nicaragua. If there has been a legitimate and fair election in the country, it was in the case of Mr. Walker. At an election fairly conducted he was chosen President of the Republic; but he is arrested by a military force from the United States, violently dragged from his country, brought here, and then set at liberty.

I am glad that the Senator, in his anxiety to give a medal to Commodore Paulding, has not undertaken to justify the use of such violent expressions as that Walker and his men are pirates, and outlaws, and buccaneers. These expressions interlard the whole of the dispatches from Commodore Paulding; and he puts his own defense on the ground that these men were pirates. He who perhaps understands, and has studied most deeply the ground on which he stands, undertakes to defend himself on the hypothesis that Walker was a pirate, and that his followers were pirates. If they were, I demand to know by what authority the President of the nation turned loose a pirate in the city of Washington? I demand to know by what authority one hundred and fifty pirates were turned loose in the peaceful streets of Norfolk? The defense has failed—wretchedly failed.

The President tells Congress in his message that he had no authority to hold Walker and his associates; that they were amenable, if at all, to the judiciary of the country, and to nobody else. Great God! sir, has the President no power to order a pirate to be held in custody? Shall it be set up here in the Senate that the President can send an armed ship, or an armed fleet, to Nicaragua, arrest a pirate upon a foreign friendly soil, bring him to the United States, and when he gets him here, just at that point his power ceases? This is a wretched, miserable pretext. I am glad to see that the pretext that Walker was a pirate, that his followers were pirates, is not defended in the Senate. The President has rightfully enough ignored the charge. He thinks Walker has violated the law; that he has committed a misdemeanor; that he is responsible to the judiciary of the country, to whom he quietly hands him over. But all this does not come to the point suggested in my amendment, that this arrest was not sanctioned by any existing law.

If it was in violation of the territorial sovereignty of a friendly Power, and was not sanctioned by any existing law, then does not my conclusion follow as a matter of course, that Congress must disavow it? That is all I ask you to do, up to that point; to disavow that which is in violation of the territorial sovereignty of a friendly Power which is not pretended to be sustained by any existing law of your own country. I continue:

And being officially notified that said Paulding acted without instructions from the President or the Secretary of the Navy, Congress expresses its condemnation of his conduct in this regard.

I put the condemnation expressly on the ground that his lawless act is disavowed by the President and the Secretary of the Navy. If they had avowed it, I would have directed my censure to a higher mark. If they had avowed it as an act of the Government, I should have asked Congress to pass a vote of censure against the Secretary or the President, or whoever gave the order.

We have fallen, sir, upon strange times, and, in my judgment, have sadly departed from the lessons taught us in the earlier, and, I might add, better days of the Republic. In 1822, Commodore Porter, who wore his epaulets and bore his sword with distinguished credit, was sent in the command of a squadron to the Gulf of Mexico, and ordered to cruise in the West Indies and the waters of the Gulf, in search of pirates. He was told, as the authority before me shows, clearly and distinctly, that he might pursue the pirates on land; that they were the enemies of the human race; that all civilized men were combined against them; but he was told, at the same time, that he must not pursue them in violation of the local authorities of any country. He might continue the pursuit until he should be bidden to give it up, and then he must cease. In 1824, it was ascertained by Lieutenant Platt, one of the subordinate officers in that squadron, that a large quantity of goods had been stolen from Saint Thomas, and probably carried to Foxardo, in the Island of Porto Rico. Lieutenant Platt pursued, and having accumulated such evidence as satisfied him that the goods were secreted at Foxardo, he landed with a view of finding them. Some persons not authorized to arrest his progress, forbade his pursuing them; but being informed by others that these were not persons in authority, and seeing, therefore, that he was not violating the letter of his instructions, he went forward. He found the officer of the port, who received him cordially, and promised him assistance. While he was actually engaged in a search for the stolen goods—goods stolen, not by imaginary, but real pirates—the alcalde suddenly changed his mind, seized the lieutenant, thrust him into prison, and heaped divers insults and outrages upon him. Commodore Porter, receiving intelligence of these events, went to Foxardo and landed a military force, with a view of demanding reparation for the insult offered to the American flag, borne by Lieutenant Pratt, under the circumstances which I have named. It became necessary to spike some guns; but no blood was shed, no gun was fired. The alcalde, on a sort of promise from Commodore Porter, that he should be protected in the exercise of his lawful authority, and that there was no purpose to subjugate him, at once came out and said frankly, "I have committed this outrage under compulsion, by orders."

Commodore Porter was acting strictly within the letter of his instructions, as he claimed, and as I believe, from very recent investigations of all the papers; but it suited the Spanish authorities to complain of him. He was at once relieved from his command, and ordered home to be put upon trial. After being detained here for weeks and weeks, the Administration in the mean time having undergone a change, Mr. Monroe having gone out and Mr. John Quincy Adams having come in, Commodore Porter complained of the delay. He filed a letter with the President, and perhaps two or three with the Secretary of the Navy, complaining of the delay which had occurred in his trial. Finally he was put on his trial before a naval court-martial. He was convicted and sentenced to six months' dismissal from the service of the United States. Here was a gallant officer, covered over with scars, entitled to stars, garters, and medals, arrested by the order of his Government because he had landed upon a friendly soil, and undertaken to make arrests, not of imaginary, but real pirates—people who were confessed to be so; not only relieved of his command, but brought back to the United States in disgrace, put upon his trial, convicted, and sentenced.

While I do not stand here to defend the harsh proceedings in that case, I instance it for the purpose of showing what measure of justice was meted out in the earlier days of the Republic in comparison with that which the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to mete out to Commodore Paulding. Here was a man acting within the letter of his instructions; but the Administration had undergone a change. He had been told that these people were the enemies of all mankind. President Monroe had two or three times complained in his communications to Congress of the want of efficiency in the Spanish authorities. He had called on Congress to nerve the arm of the Executive to chastise these depredations on our commerce in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico. Mr. Monroe had declared to Commodore Porter, through Mr. Smith Thompson, then Secretary of the Navy, in express terms, that in pursuing the pirate he might land upon any soil, but that he must not—mark you—continue the pursuit after persons in authority should forbid his doing so.

Lieutenant Platt claimed that he had not violated that instruction; that he had lived up precisely to the very letter of it; that when told by persons not in authority to cease the pursuit, he had determined to do it until he was informed that these people were not authorized to give any such command; that he then proceeded, that he was received cordially by the commander of the port and by the alcalde, persons in authority, who promised him their assistance; and then in the midst of all that he was thrown into prison, charged himself with being a pirate, his flag insulted, and himself derided. Then Commodore Porter landed, as I have said before, for the purpose of chastising this insolence, and was promptly met by an apology. On these general facts, I say again, he was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced, and the sentence was carried into execution. Now, with a case before us, where a commodore, according to the Secretary of the Navy and the President, is acting clearly beyond his instructions, without authority, landing upon a foreign soil, without any sort of shadow of authority from the President or Secretary, making important arrests, we are called upon to vote him a medal.

There is another point in this transaction: Commodore Porter was tried, among other things, for insubordination in writing insolent letters to the President and Secretary of the Navy. I have the letters before me, but do not care to weary the Senate by reading them; but let Senators take the letters of Commodore Porter in 1824 and 1825, and compare them with the insolent productions of Commodore Paulding addressed to the present Secretary of the Navy; and answer me whether, if Porter was tried, convicted, and sentenced for writing such letters as he wrote, what ought to be done with Commodore Paulding for writing such as he has written? I am not here to say that Paulding ought to be punished for writing an insolent letter to the Secretary of the Navy. If the Secretary does not think proper to vindicate himself, he may go unvindicated; I shall not stand here in his defense. What I say is, that we are falling upon strange times, when a commodore—a flag-officer—can write to the Secretary of the Navy, and actually reprimand him. Take his letter and read it. It is an actual reprimand, addressed by a commodore in the service to the Secretary of the Navy, saying, in effect, "Sir, you foggy, you nincompoop, you are meddling with a matter you know nothing about; let me and my command alone." The Secretary of the Navy writes back very complacently that he did not really mean to reprimand him; but, after all, he thinks he has some authority; and he rather thinks he has the right to dispose of the naval force as he pleases. It was not so in other days. If that letter had been addressed by Commodore Porter, or by any of the older commodores, to such a Secretary as Smith Thompson, or Samuel L. Southard, he would have been arrested, he would have been tried, he would have been convicted, and he would have been punished. If the present Secretary of the Navy does not think proper, however, to vindicate his official honor, he can let it alone; it is none of my business.

The question with which we have to deal is, whether we will vote Commodore Paulding a medal for these services. Just think of it. The joint resolution proposes that the President have a medal, with suitable devices, presented "as a testimonial of the high sense entertained by Congress of his gallant conduct." Great God! Commodore Paulding, commanding as many, perhaps, as one hundred guns—I have not made the estimate of it, but there were certainly so many—having disposed of them at his leisure, with five or six hundred men, captures—what? Walker and a handful of filibusters, who laid down their arms at the very first summons, and made no sort of resistance upon paper or anywhere else, and Congress is called upon to vote a falsehood—that in this there was extraordinary gallantry! I know very well that the commodore, writing home to the Government, says that all his men behaved with extraordinary gallantry. Why, sir, I suppose the next thing will be, if our army should approach Salt Lake, and all the Mormon men should be away, and they should make a desperate charge and capture all the women, they must all have medals for their extraordinary gallantry. [Laughter.] It would be a much more gallant act than this act of Paulding, and one much more deserving a medal.

I object to this resolution, because it is not true in point of fact. It is asking Congress to vote a falsehood—I beg the Senator's pardon; I do not mean it in any offensive sense—but it is not true in point of fact that Paulding has displayed any gallantry. There was no occasion to display gallantry. Who does not know that at the very first instant, upon his summons, Walker and his men laid down their arms? They did not even threaten to fire. The gallant heroes, with Commodore Paulding at their head, walked upon the shore and then walked back again; and for that, Congress is to vote a deliberate historical falsehood, that they have displayed extraordinary gallantry! Then their conduct is said to have been "judicious." Judicious in what? Judicious in obeying his instructions? I thought it was the duty of officers, naval and military—nay, sir, I thought it the first duty of a soldier—to obey the letter of his instructions.

Then we are asked to assert that all this was done "in arresting a lawless military expedition set on foot in the United States." That assumes the whole matter in controversy. I undertake to say that the expedition was not lawless, and that no facts have been presented to show that it was so. Even the enthusiastic Senator from Wisconsin admits the right of expatriation. He would claim for himself at this very moment the right to leave the country, to swear allegiance to any other Government; and in going, to bear arms upon his person, would he not? Is there a Senator here; is there an American citizen who listens to me at this moment, who would not claim for himself the right to leave his country, to expatriate himself, to swear allegiance to any other Government, and in doing so, to bear arms on his person? Did Walker, or any of those supposed to have been under his command, do anything more? They went, and they went with arms in their hands, as they had a right to do, as the President admits, as every Senator that has yet spoken admits, and as the Senator from Wisconsin claims that he would have the right to do. Then, by what authority is it called lawless? Have men acted in a lawless manner in doing that which all of us claim we have a right to do? Is there any lawlessness in doing that which every man insists every American citizen has a right to do, and which you may not hinder under any existing law, and for the hindrance of which you never will pass any law through Congress?

It is assumed that the expedition was set on foot in the United States. Where is the evidence of it, sir? Where is the proof. I deny it? I say the fact is not as stated. I say there was no expedition, lawless or otherwise, set on foot in the United States. I admit that persons who were born under our flag and entitled to the protection of our laws, went voluntarily, every man acting on his own responsibility, with arms in their hands, with a view to assist what they claimed to be the rightful Government of Nicaragua, in the person of William Walker. This, I claim, they had the right to do. It was no expedition set on foot. It was a body of American citizens, each man for himself, acting for himself, and on his own responsibility, doing precisely what, under the law, he had a right to do. When they got beyond the limits of the United States, if they organized an expedition, and placed William Walker, or any other man, at the head of it, I claim that they did only what they had a right to do, and for the doing of which they were in no manner responsible to the laws of our country. If the doctrine can be maintained, that we are overseers of the high seas, that our police jurisdiction extends everywhere—not only on our own soil, and within our own waters, but upon the high seas, even to Nicaragua, and every other country—then I grant you there may have been some violation of law; but I claim that your jurisdiction is confined to the soil and to the single marine league, and for the purposes of the commercial law, three marine leagues; and by no stretch of law, by no stretch of imagination, can you carry it beyond three marine leagues. It being admitted that Walker was not only off our soil, but without the jurisdiction of the waters over which we hold control, not only not upon the water, but actually upon the soil of a foreign country; and there being no evidence that any expedition was fitted out or set on foot on our soil, within our jurisdiction, or on the high seas; and the expedition, if it existed at all, was found on a foreign soil, then I claim that that declaration in the Senator's resolution, is not true in point of fact. It is a simple naked declaration, which Congress is asked to vote, but which is not sustained by any evidence on God's earth.

I said, Mr. President, at the outset, that I had no regular prepared speech to make. In reference to the case of Commodore Porter, to which I have alluded, I have forbore to read the correspondence, the letters, and instructions, because I did not care to consume the time of the Senate; but the facts are as I have stated them, as proven by the volume before me, to which I have turned my attention, and given some study. If we are to vote Commodore Paulding a medal, I hope it will be done for reasons which are at least true in themselves. If we are to vote censure against him, I want it to be done for reasons which are true. If I have not stated the reasons correctly in my amendment, on the suggestion of any Senator I will modify or change them. I think they are rigidly correct, strictly and emphatically correct in every particular. I intended they should be so. If I am mistaken, I shall listen to the suggestion of any Senator, and change it until the facts and the legal positions are stated correctly; but I cannot stand by quietly and see a proposition introduced and gravely urged here, to vote a medal to an officer for violating the laws of his country, for doing that which the President tells us was a "grave error," and which has not been, and cannot be, defended on any grounds, legal or moral.

Mr. PUGH. When the message of the President on this subject was read some days ago, I took occasion to declare that, in my opinion, the arguments of the President were not justified by any law, and that the action which had been taken by the naval commander was contrary to law. I should not have referred to the subject again, not even for the elaborate argument of the Senator from Wisconsin, had I not observed in the reports of remarks made elsewhere, some very confident and very positive assertions on this subject.

What is this transaction as it comes before us? A post-captain in the Navy finds Mr. Walker and one hundred and fifty other persons, some of whom are said to be citizens of the United States, and some have no citizenship at all so far as we know, within the territory of another nation, on a bleak point of land, and he arrests them; the chief-tain he brings here, or rather brings him to the city of New York, and then causes him to be brought before the Secretary of State. When the party arrested asks, "of what am I accused?" the Secretary tells him to go his way; there is no accusation against him. His followers, one hundred and fifty in number, are brought by the Navy to the port of Norfolk, and they are turned loose. There is no accusation against them.

Now, sir, the first question which I put before, I put again: were these men arrested as fugitives from the justice of the United States? If they were, why were they not handed over to the judiciary? Why was not the marshal of the southern district of New York told to take William Walker and hand him over to the marshal of the eastern district of Louisiana, where it is said this offense was committed, if he were a fugitive? Why were not these one hundred and fifty other men delivered over to the custody of the marshal of the southern district of Alabama, where it is said they set on foot their expedition? Sir, it is idle for any man to say that they were arrested as fugitives. I grant the power of the President, under the law, to pursue a fugitive from the justice of the United States. He may pursue him over the whole of the high seas. He may take him by an extradition treaty, or by an oral extradition for the case, from any other country, and the fugitive cannot complain. The pretense that these men were fugitives is an excuse invented after the act. If they were fugitives, why were they not handed over to the power which was capable of trying an accusation of this character? All arguments, therefore, as to the power of the President, as commander-in-chief of the Navy, to pursue a fugitive from the justice of the United States are out of the case.

Were they arrested as pirates? Then I make the same question: what is the law on that subject? It is settled. You can try a pirate at the first port to which you bring him. Why was not William Walker committed to prison in the city of New York? Why were not his followers committed to prison in the State of Virginia? There is no trial, no accusation; they are turned loose; in fact, there is no pretense that they committed any act of piracy. We know what that is. It is an act of violence, of robbery, or of murder, committed on the high seas, beyond the jurisdiction of any nation, upon any peaceful person or any peaceable ship. These men are not accused of that.

Then, sir, for what have they been arrested? Senators say they are arrested by the consent of Nicaragua. Can she give power to the President of the United States, by her consent? Who ever heard before that a foreign nation can consent that our Government, or our executive officer, shall exercise power? He must get it from the laws of his country. He cannot get it by the consent of any other Power; so that the question of the consent of Nicaragua is out of the case.

Then we are told that he gets it by the law of nations. Where? These men, I am told, have committed an offense against the law of nations. Where is it? The Constitution of the United States has a clause, that disposes of all this in a moment. Here is the power conferred on Congress:

"To define and punish piracies, and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations."

Is the offense defined by Congress? If it is, hold them to a trial. If it is not defined by Congress, the President cannot execute it. Execute an unwritten law of nations against an individual! Why, sir, the power lies with Congress to define the offense and punish it. Let us have done, then, with all arguments arising from the law of nations. The President cannot execute them, unless they have been defined by acts of Congress. Now we come back to the question.

It is suggested that the President, as commander-in-chief of the Navy, has some power. What is his power? It is the same over the Navy and over the Army, and over the militia. It is a power to execute the law of the land; but you must have a law before it can be executed. He has the right to call out the Army, or naval forces, or the militia, to aid civil process to preserve the public peace. These things are defined by law; and we come back at last to the question, where is the act of Congress which authorizes the President of the United States to go to the territory of Nicaragua, or go to the coasts near her, and exercise a police power? Sir, it must be an act of Congress. It cannot be the consent of Nicaragua; it cannot be the unwritten law of nations; it cannot be any of his power as commander of the naval forces. Where is the act? Gentlemen tell me that it is the act of 1818; and it is that or nothing. To begin with, the act of 1818 is a municipal law. It is not a law to define and punish any offense against the law of nations. It is a law to punish offenses against our own municipal sovereignty, and so the Supreme Court has decided, and so its manifest text and interpretation are. Its title is so: "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States." Against our sovereignty, our municipal sovereignty; and so it is in every section. The first section provides—

"That if any citizen of the United States shall, within the territory or jurisdiction thereof, accept and exercise a commission to serve a foreign prince, State, colony, district, or people," &c.

"Sec. 2. If any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlist or enter himself," &c.

"Sec. 3. If any person shall, within the limits of the United States, fit out and arm," &c.

"Sec. 5. If any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, increase or augment the force of any ship-of-war, cruiser, or other armed vessel," &c.

"Sec. 6. If any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition," &c.

These are the offenses. There is but one offense in this whole statute, the locus in quo of which is outside of the territory and jurisdiction of the United States, and that is defined by the fourth section. What is that?

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen or citizens of the United States shall, without the limits thereof, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly aid or be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming, any private ship or vessel-of-war, or privateer, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed to cruise, or commit hostilities, upon the citizens of the United States or their property," &c.

Not against Nicaragua, but against another citizen of the United States. That is the sole offense provided for from the beginning to the end of this statute, that can be committed out of the territory and jurisdiction of the United States; there is no other.

Now, sir, what is the eighth section of the act? That does not define any crime; it is in furtherance of the other provisions. It is a long section:

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That in every case in which a vessel shall be fitted out and armed, or attempted to be fitted out and armed, or in which the force of any vessel-of-war, cruiser, or other armed vessel, shall be increased or augmented, or in which any military expedition or enterprise shall be begun or set on foot, contrary to the provisions and prohibitions of this act; and in every case of the capture of a ship or vessel within the jurisdiction or protection of the United States, as before defined; and in every case in which any process issuing out of any court of the United States shall be disobeyed or resisted by any person or persons having the custody of any vessel-of-war, cruiser, or other armed vessel of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, or of any subjects or citizens of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, in every such case it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, for the purpose of taking possession of and detaining any such ship or vessel, with her prize or prizes, if any, in the order to the execution of the prohibitions and penalties of this act, and to the restoring the prize or prizes in the cases in which restoration shall have been adjudged, and also for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States against the territories or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace."

What is the President's power under that? It is to use the land or naval forces, or the militia, to prevent the carrying on of an enterprise from the jurisdiction of the United States. Where is he to exercise it? In Nicaragua? Look at the words of this section. The power given to the President is a power to prevent. It is to prevent an expedition before it starts from the territory of the United States. It is to prevent the carrying on of it, not to stop it after it has been carried on. He is to prevent the carrying on of an expedition, not to arrest the expedition after it has disembarked at the port to which it is destined. He is to prevent its being carried on from the territory of the United States, not to arrest it in the territory of some other Power.

Why, sir, such a collection of words of settled signification in the English language, and according to all the principles of law, cannot be found in any other statute. To give this law the construction that gentlemen claim for it, is to give the President of the United States a power as absolute as that of the Autocrat of Russia. I say his power, under this section, is no greater over the naval forces than over the land forces; and it is no greater over the naval and land forces than it is over the militia of any State of the Union. And now let us see what gentlemen have to say to the consequences of their own argument. William Walker was in Nicaragua. They tell us the President could send the naval forces there to bring him away. To be sure, his expedition was over, as far as it was an expedition. It had reached the destined shore. It was an expedition no longer. It was expedition expedite. It was not being carried on. It was already completed, so far as the expedition was concerned. It is said the President can go to Nicaragua and bring them away, and can take the Navy for that purpose! Can he take the Army? Can he take the militia? If he can take the Navy, he can take the Army and the militia, and when is the power to stop? He found these men at the mouth of the river; he took them away peaceably. Suppose they had refused to come; suppose, when Commodore Paulding summoned the surrender, they had refused to surrender; suppose, when he fired, they had fired again; then, where is the President's power? To make war in a foreign country, to take the Navy, the Army, and the militia, to carry on a war in a foreign country, without any act of Congress! Some of them had gone up the river forty or fifty miles, and had taken possession of a fort.

Does the President's power extend to sending the Army and Navy up the river? He summons the fort to surrender, and the fort does not surrender; has he the power to fire on it? And if he and his troops be beaten and driven off, has he the power to get reinforcements and go again? Suppose, after he has arrived there, General Walker and his men succeed in defeating the forces of the United States: has the President power to make new levies? Is it true that, under this act of Congress, the President, of his own will, without notice to Congress, without leave of Congress, can transport not merely the Navy, but the entire Army of the United States, and the militia of every State of the Union, into Central America to carry on war? That is what it comes to.

I said before, and I say again, that the law is susceptible of no such construction. It violates the plainest rules of English grammar. It violates the plainest principles of constitutional law. The power of the President is to use the Army and the Navy and the militia to prevent the expedition; to prevent its being carried on from our territory; and when he has done that, his power is at an end. If they succeed in escaping him, it is no more than happens with regard to twenty other crimes that are committed every day. If he wants more power, let him come to Congress. But he has not it yet; and that, in my judgment, is the whole of this question.

It is said that William Walker sailed in an American vessel, and that the American vessel belongs to our jurisdiction. True, and for any offense committed whilst on board that vessel he is amenable to our law; but it is not alleged that he committed any, for it is not an offense, under the act of 1818, to fit out an expedition in foreign ports against citizens of other Powers; but only to fit it out against our own citizens.

The Senator from Wisconsin said the other day, as I understood him, that the Government was responsible for acts of violence committed by its citizens. I said then that I should like to hear the law for that. It is a monstrous proposition. If one of our citizens goes over into Canada and commits a homicide, are we amenable as a nation? Certainly not.

But the Senator was to show me the law for it; and he read, with great self-satisfaction, a paragraph to the effect that if a Government knowingly permits its subjects to commit acts of aggression, and, having the power to prevent them, does not prevent them within its limits, it becomes a casus belli. I do not doubt that; I do not deny it. That is not the proposition at all. The proposition is, that these men, according to his own statement, escaped all our just means of prevention, went beyond our limits, and there committed their offense. If they had been arrested by the President, or if they had been delivered up to Commodore Paulding by the authorities of Nicaragua as offenders against our law, and restored here, it would have been a different case; we could have proceeded to a trial; but these men have had no trial. Their property has been taken from them; their enterprise, whether it was good, bad, or indifferent, has been broken up; and when they ask for redress, or ask for attention, or for some sort of hearing; demand to know the nature and cause of the accusation against them, why they have thus been interrupted, we are entertained with a discourse about the evils of filibustering.

I did not, on the former occasion, say a single word in favor of William Walker and his enterprise. I do not know that I understand his enterprise. If he has gone hence to a peaceful country and committed acts of aggression and violence upon unoffending people, he deserves the severest reprehension; but if he has gone to a country that has been distracted by civil war for the last ten or fifteen years, and especially if he has been invited there, and has taken upon himself and his followers all the fate of war, he has done no more than all the conquerors and great soldiers of antiquity and of modern times have done.

We are told of the virtuous indignation of Nicaragua. What is Nicaragua? She is but a name, a myth to-day. Who is this gentleman who assumes to forgive her debts? He is a sort of general agent and attorney for half a dozen of the nations down there. He represents one or another of them in these papers, as he finds it most convenient. If there be any truth in them, Nicaragua is conquered by other and adjacent Powers, and even the conquerors cannot hold possession of the territory; but they assume, in her name, to set up a sort of sovereignty, and to send representatives to our Government.

If this be so, William Walker does not deserve half the reprehension; but it is not a case of his enterprise. It is not a case of Commodore Paulding. I do not care whether Congress vote him a medal or not. I shall vote him no medal; that is very certain. I do not care to pass on the particular question whether he did or did not transcend his instructions. These are questions of an hour; but the great question that lies behind, is a question which touches the right of every American; ay, that touches the integrity and salvation of the Government, if the President of the United States has this mighty power. If, within our limits and jurisdiction, he can do nothing that is not set down in our statute-books; but the moment he goes out on the high seas, or the moment he goes into some foreign country, the consent of that country can arm him with a new and despotic authority, it is high time that we had found some limits to an executive power as extraordinary and as absolute as this. Consent of Nicaragua! Suppose Great Britain consents, to-day, that our President may transport the militia there, will that make it legal? Would that excuse him from impeachment, if the Grand Jury at the other end of the Capitol should bring him to our bar? He has no more power to take the Navy than to take the militia. Suppose Russia consents that the President may take the militia of the State of Wisconsin to the Crimea, for the purpose of bringing back any American he may find lurking there in suspicious attitude, or suspicious enterprises, will that authorize him to do it?

Sir, this is the answer to it all. The power of the President over the Navy, under that law, and under that section, is the same exactly as his power over the Army and over the militia. If he can take the Navy, he can take the Army and the militia. If he can go to the coast of Nicaragua, he can touch the shore of Nicaragua. If he can touch the shore, he can go into the interior. If he can direct his officer to point his guns, he can direct the officer to fire, and return a fire; and thus you have authorized the President, by this doctrine, to go abroad and make war on his own account, and that under a law which, in the jealous language of our ancestors, was careful in conferring on the President power to use military force.

As the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] well said, when this subject was under debate before, our ancestors for many reasons would not allow the President to use the Army or Navy even to execute the laws of the United States within our own limits. They would only intrust him with the militia. It was not until 1804, I think, that he was authorized to call in the Army and the Navy; and he is authorized to use them now to the same extent in those places where the writs and warrants of the United States run, in those places which are so peculiarly our own, that if a foreign nation makes a capture there it is a violation of our sovereignty. Within that dominion where we have a right to arrest offenders by civil process, there, as on the land, he can use the land and the naval forces and the militia for the purpose of making arrests, and preserving the public peace. That is the whole of the law. If the President wants more power, if the case requires more law, I am ready to receive the application with the utmost patience, and with the utmost confidence in the President himself; but I say again, when power is to be drawn by construction, it ought to attract the attention of Congress and of the country. That is the insidious approach through which arbitrary power comes on every people. It is generally to be justified by the bad conduct or the bad character of the person to whom it is applied. We are told that anything is justifiable against pirates and filibusters; and having adopted that principle, having relaxed our vigilance as guardians of public liberty, we are then to have the precedent set by which in future time perhaps other Presidents, not like this one, may go on to execute arbitrary authority over his fellow-citizens on the high seas, and in other countries.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President—

Mr. CLAY. I will suggest to the Senator from Maryland, if he proposes to continue the discussion at this time, that other Senators on this side of the Chamber desire to say something on it, and that we may be detained here to a very late hour, if we continue the debate now. I ask him if he would prefer speaking this evening? If not, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. PEARCE. I will consent to that.

Mr. MASON. Allow me one instant. I intended, if I could be fortunate enough to get the floor, without the slightest discourtesy to the Senator who introduced this resolution, to have moved that it should be laid on the table, for the reason that this whole subject has very recently, within the last week, been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and I feel a strong assurance that that committee will be prepared to report at the next meeting of the Senate. The whole question will then be before the Senate in a considered form. Unless it is objected to, I will now move to lay the resolution on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MASON. Of course I will not interfere with the Senator from Maryland, if he desires to speak on the subject.

Mr. PEARCE. I give way for an adjournment.

Mr. GREEN. I desire an executive session.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. GREEN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 21, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Jabez Fox.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

QUALIFICATION OF A MEMBER.

Hon. DANIEL W. GOOCH, a Representative elect from the seventh congressional district of Massachusetts, in the place of Nathaniel P. Banks, resigned, appeared and was qualified by taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

MEMBERS OF COMMITTEES EXCUSED.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a matter personal to myself, which will occupy but a minute. I am constrained to ask the House to excuse me from serving upon the special committee raised under the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] to investigate the disbursement of a New England manufacturing company to influence the legislation of the last Congress on the tariff. I am already on one of the most laborious committees in the House; and for other reasons, of a personal nature, I think it utterly impossible to render any service to that committee at the present time. Therefore, I hope the House will excuse me.

Mr. DURFEE. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not be excused from service upon that committee. The gentleman will recollect that, in the course of his remarks the other day, in his very earnest manner he accused the gentlemen from New England of having joined hands with the free traders of the South to strike down the interests of Pennsylvania. I will not say, and do not say, that he said they were influenced by the money of Lawrence, Stone & Co., though, from the connection of his remarks, such an inference might be easily inferred. Now, although, after the report of the committee of conference at the last Congress upon the tariff, my vote was recorded against its final passage—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. What is the motion before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to be excused from service on the committee under the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Is the gentleman talking to that, and objecting to it?

Mr. DURFEE. I do object to it. Although after the report of the committee of conference, at the last session, which emasculated the bill so far as the interest of the cotton manufacturers was concerned, my vote was recorded against its final passage, still, as one of the Representatives of New England, I wish to see this matter thoroughly investigated; and for that reason I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not be excused. I want his mind relieved upon the subject. I cannot, and will not credit the reports of corruption on the part of members of Congress.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order. It is that the remarks now being submitted by the gentleman from Rhode Island are not relevant to the question of excusing the gentleman from Pennsylvania from service upon the committee; and I also submit that the question is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no rule which prohibits debate upon this proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There is a rule which prohibits debate upon a motion to be excused from voting.

The SPEAKER. There is such a rule, but no rule prohibiting debate upon a motion to excuse from service upon a committee; but the Chair is of opinion that the remarks of the gentleman from Rhode Island should be confined directly to assigning reasons why the gentleman from Pennsylvania should or should not be excused from service.

Mr. DURFEE. At the request of friends I withdraw my opposition.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I would just like to make this remark to the gentleman from Rhode Island, that if what he supposes to be the case were true, he ought to know that I should be the last man to be on the committee. I want him to have a fair committee.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman has addressed the House once upon this question. I must object. The committees are anxious to make reports.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Oh, well, sir, I have no disposition to trespass further upon the time of the House.

The question was then taken; and Mr. KUNKEL was excused.

Mr. PURVIANCE. I ask the House to excuse me from serving on the special committee to investigate the conduct of the Doorkeeper of the last House. I have reasons for making this request of the House which I have communicated to the chairman of the committee, and which I believe are perfectly satisfactory to him. I hope, therefore, that I may be excused.

The question was taken; and Mr. PURVIANCE was excused.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the committees for reports.

CHARLES J. INGERSOLL.

Mr. PHILLIPS, from the Committee of Elections, reported a bill for the relief of Charles J. Ingersoll; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

A bill making appropriations for the preservation and repairs of fortifications and other works of defense, barracks, and quarters, for the year ending 30th June, 1859;

A bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1859;

A bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1859; and

A bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of Government for the year ending 30th June, 1859.

DEFICIENCY FOR PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to appropriate money to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the paper, printing, binding, and engraving ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What is the amount of the deficiency? I would like the bill to be read if it is not very long.

Mr. PHELPS. I do not propose that the bill shall be acted upon at the present time. It cannot be acted on in the House. It must be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I move that it be referred to that committee, and be printed.

In reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] I will say, that upon inquiry and examination, the Committee of Ways and Means find that there is a large deficiency for the purpose of paying for paper, printing, binding, and engraving which had been ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives for the last two preceding Congresses—amounting to $790,000. But, sir, I do not desire to debate the bill now. I shall endeavor, as soon as this bill and the accompanying papers shall have been printed, to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to its consideration, because there are large amounts now due on account of these expenditures.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would inquire of the gentleman if much of this printing is yet unexecuted?

Mr. PHELPS. I am informed that a portion of it is; but nearly all the works have been printed in part, and the manuscript furnished. At another time I shall be willing to give a full explanation, and to state the reasons that induced the committee, and myself as a member of it, to report this bill. At this time I cannot do it.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE W. BRISCOE.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of George W. Briscoe; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report and accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

JOHN HASTINGS.

Mr. GILLIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill for the relief of John Hastings, collector of the port of Pittsburgh.

Mr. HARLAN. I object.

CAPTAIN JAMES M'INTOSH.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee of Claims, reported back a bill for the relief of James McIntosh, captain in the United States Navy; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

EDWARD D. TIPPETT.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, presented an adverse report in the case of Edward D. Tippet; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

SAFETY OF PASSENGERS ON STEAMERS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It will be recollect that a few days ago the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. TAYLOR] introduced a bill as a substitute for House bill No. 45, for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of steamers. It was understood by him, and by the House, that the same was to be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce. I understand that the Journal does not show that such an order was given. I hope, therefore, that the correction will be made.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps it would be better for the House now to make the order. The Chair was of opinion that the motion to print had prevailed, but the minutes do not show the fact.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I move that it be printed.

It was so ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am also directed by the Committee on Commerce to ask leave to have printed a report to accompany that subject.

It was so ordered.

REFUNDING OF DUTIES.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to refund to Barclay & Livingston, and others, duties on certain goods, destroyed by fire, in the city of New York, on the 19th day of July, 1845; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

MARINE SIGNALS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to provide for the general introduction of a uniform national code of marine signals; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for the first Wednesday in February. It is very important that the subject-matter of this bill should be considered by this House. It has reference to the commercial and marine interests of the Union, and not only to them, but it has reference to the lives of our citizens, and of all employed on the ocean. It is of more importance to the commerce of the country, to the reputation of the country, to humanity towards the citizens of the country, than any other bill that can be presented to this House. It can be made to appear within a small compass of time, when the subject shall regularly come up, that the bill ought to be acted upon and passed by this House in preference to any other bill that will be submitted to its attention. It is under these considerations and with these views that I present this request to the House, and ask that, by unanimous consent, it may be made the special order for some day in the future. I trust there will be no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. I object.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Then I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the report and accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REGISTER OF A VESSEL.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 14) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register or enrollment to the vessel called the James McIndoe, now owned by Thomas Coatsworth, James G. Coatsworth, and William Coatsworth, of Buffalo, New York, and moved that it be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That is just the same case that we had yesterday. There is no evidence to justify this bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The facts are very simple.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I must object to such legislation.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I think, with all due respect to the gentleman from Virginia, that this is entirely proper legislation. The facts are simple, and are contained in a nutshell. This vessel was sold during the last spring under mistake. By mistaken representations, a citizen of the United States purchased a Canadian vessel of about one hundred tons burden—scow-built—and paid $180 duty, supposing he would be then allowed American papers. Such representations were made by an official of the Government. This officer, on discovering his mistake, disclosed it to the purchaser, and the money paid for duty was restored; and now the owners come here to ask that papers may be given.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The House will readily perceive that this special legislation is in derogation of the settled policy of the Government, in refusing papers to ships or vessels of foreign manufacture.

One of the objects of this general legislation is to encourage our own manufactures and our own ship-builders; and I advert to this simply for the purpose of showing that this special legislation, to be secured by the passage of the bill without the usual forms and ceremonies, is full of evil. There may be none in this case, but that is my judgment. I am disposed to gratify the gentleman in this particular case; but the thing is all wrong. We might as well adhere to the general law on the subject, pursue the general policy of the Government, and let the bill undergo the usual inquiries, under the usual precautions which are interposed for the proper legislation of the House. I think the bill is wrong; but as gentlemen wish it, I will withdraw my objection in this case. It will be the last case where I shall withdraw my objection.

Mr. LETCHER. If I recollect rightly, we passed a general law at the last session, giving the Secretary of the Treasury authority to issue these registers.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. That was in respect to the names of vessels; and so much injury has grown out of it that the Senate has already passed a repealing bill, which now lies upon the Speaker's table, for the action of this House. This, however, is in respect to granting American papers to a vessel purchased by an American citizen under mistake. It is within the principle of rectifying by legislation an innocent mistake which is beyond the reach of the law. That is simply the reason why I ask that the bill may be passed; we of the committee being entirely satisfied of the rectitude of the intent of the purchaser, and of the propriety of administering this relief.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I believe that this bill is properly before us. The gentleman from Virginia erroneously supposes that a single objection would be fatal to its consideration. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from the Buffalo district of New York, [Mr. HATCH,] received its first and second reading, and was referred to the Committee on Commerce, from which it was reported back by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE,] chairman of that committee. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill having been engrossed, it was accordingly read a third time and passed.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SELMA.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back Senate bill No. 27, to detach Selma, in the State of Alabama, from the collection district of New Orleans, and making it a port of delivery within the collection district of Mobile.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What is the necessity for that bill? I should like to have some information on the subject.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Selma was by mistake attached to the collection district of New Orleans. It should belong to the collection district of Mobile. The Secretary of the Treasury sent the draft of the bill to the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, stating that it was to correct a clerical error.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CURRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISSUING REGISTERS TO VESSELS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table, and put on its passage, Senate bill No. 32, repealing an act of the last session, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of vessels in certain cases. I will state that, under that act the names of ninety-two vessels have been changed, and thirty-five of them have foundered at sea. I ask, therefore, under the circumstances, the unanimous consent of the House to pass the bill at this time.

Mr. PHELPS. After the morning hour has been consumed in the call of committees for reports, it will then be in order for the gentleman to move to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, and the bill may then come up regularly. For this reason, I object to his motion.

LEWIS FEUCHTWANZER.

On motion of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Lewis Feuchtwanzer, to supply the Government with his composition in place of the new cent, and that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

HENRY LEEF AND JOHN M'KEE.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to indemnify Henry Leef and John McKee for the illegal seizure of a certain bark; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIABILITY OF SHIP-OWNERS.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the liability of ship-owners and for other purposes," approved March 13, 1851.

Mr. WADE said: Congress, by an act passed on the 13th of March, 1851, limited the liabilities of the owners of vessels navigating the ocean. The policy of that act was the encouragement of ship-building, and consequently of the commerce carried on upon the high seas. The same reasons which actuated Congress in the passage of that act, applies with equal force to vessels navigating the northwestern lakes. In 1856 the merchant tonnage of the lakes constituted one fifteenth of the entire merchant tonnage of the United States; and while the annual increase of the entire tonnage of the United States was, in 1856, but eight and a fraction per cent.; yet, the increase of the lake tonnage, at the same time, was at the rate of eighteen and a fraction per cent. Sir, the tonnage capacity of the shipping of the lakes ranges from fifty to three hundred and fifty, and even as high as five hundred and one thousand tons. As early as 1848, a vessel, built at Cleveland, was laden for San Francisco, passed through the Welland canal, doubled Cape Horn, and arrived safely at San Francisco. So, Mr. Speaker, the extent of the coast-line of the northwestern lakes is nearly as great in extent as the Atlantic coast-line of the United States. Many vessels are now being built on the lakes designed for ocean navigation; and, indeed, every reason which actuated Congress to encourage ocean navigation and commerce, applies with equal force to the lakes. The act of 1851 has so far worked well upon the ocean, if its being in force more than six years without complaint, is an evidence of the beneficent working of an act of Congress. Many of the liabilities of the ship-owners, by the common law, are very onerous and well calculated to divert capital into other channels, less beneficial to the general prosperity of the country. Congress designed to remedy this defect of the common law; every principle of justice and equity requires that the same rules should apply to the extensive navigation and commerce of the northwestern lakes. I call the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON called for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is it in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not, pending the call for the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to include Lake Champlain.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection, and I will include that.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman cannot do that.

Mr. WADE. I accept the amendment, and insist upon the previous question.

The SPEAKER. It is not in the power of the gentleman to modify the bill, inasmuch as it is a report from a committee.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I hope the House will vote down the previous question, and we can amend it.

Mr. HATCH. If the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question, I desire to make a few remarks.

Mr. WADE. I withdraw it.

Mr. HATCH. I only desire to say that this bill is one in which all the people engaged in the commerce of the northwestern lakes are deeply interested. The commerce coming to the western lakes is equal to four or five hundred thousand tons. If this matter is of any value to those engaged in foreign commerce, there is no reason or sense why it should not be extended to the inland commerce of the country. The inland commerce of the northwestern lakes is almost equal to all the foreign exports and imports of this country. I desire to say that my constituents, among others who are deeply engaged in the northwestern trade upon those lakes, are anxious for the passage of this bill, and I hope the House will pass it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not know but I would cheerfully support this bill if I understood it; but I have always been taught to believe that general questions should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. We are told by the gentleman from New York, and by the gentleman from Ohio, that this bill is to operate upon one half of the commerce of this Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. One fifteenth.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. More than one fifteenth, I believe; but be that as it may, it is to operate upon a large portion of the commerce of the Union, and it proposes to make fundamental changes in the existing liabilities of ship-owners.

Now, sir, ought such a bill as that to pass into a law, so far as this House is concerned, without full and proper examination? I ask this House, who is there upon this floor, outside of the immediate interests to be affected by it, that understands this subject. We generally refer bills of this character to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, because they affect a large portion of the Union; and I move, therefore, in order to terminate this discussion, that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will do so if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. MORRILL. I will do so.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to appeal to the House, that whatever shape this bill may take, Lake Champlain shall be included. It is notorious that a very large proportion of the commerce upon that lake is foreign commerce, owing to its connection with the St. Lawrence. I hope, therefore, that Lake Champlain will be included in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to move an amendment?

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to move to insert Lake Champlain after the other lakes.

The SPEAKER. That amendment can be offered if the gentleman from Virginia shall withdraw the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman will withdraw that motion, I will renew it after I have submitted my amendment.

Mr. COMINS. I would suggest, that as Lake Champlain was inadvertently omitted by the Committee on Commerce, the omission be supplied by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will withdraw the motion to refer, so as to permit the amendment to be offered. I am willing to afford every facility to gentlemen, but I first want to know what I am doing when I vote or act.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "Michigan," the word "Champlain." I now renew the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and demand the previous question.

Mr. PALMER. I hope that the motion to include Lake Champlain will prevail. Living upon the shores of that lake, I know something of the magnitude of its commerce, and I think it very extraordinary that the committee should have omitted it.

Mr. READY. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. READY. I would inquire whether, if the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it will not be open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. READY. Then the amendment can be made there, as well as here. I hope the question will be taken on the reference, and that there will be an end to this debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask what is the motion pending?

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the motion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] made in pursuance of his promise to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If the previous question be sustained, the House will be brought to vote first on the motion to refer. If that motion does not prevail, the question will be upon the amendment, and then upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. The previous question will then be exhausted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the bill will not be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as that will be killing it.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was not agreed to—ayes 35, noes 84.

Mr. MORRILL's amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I would ask if it is in order to move to amend the bill by adding the Mississippi river?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. LEACH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to insert "Lake St. Clair" after Lake Erie.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is already embraced in the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I want to know if the bill has been engrossed? If not, I object to proceeding with it.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not been ordered to be engrossed yet.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to vote for the bill, but I certainly think the Mississippi river ought to be included; and as it is not, I shall vote against it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object to the third reading of the bill until it shall have been engrossed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects to the third reading of the bill. The bill is not engrossed, and it therefore goes over.

POST ROUTES IN OHIO AND PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. ENGLISH. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to make an adverse report on sundry petitions from Ohio and Pennsylvania, asking for an increase of mail service upon certain routes in those States. The present law authorizes the Post Office Department to grant the relief asked. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania who presented the petitions desires leave to withdraw them for the purpose of reference to the Post Office Department.

I move, sir, that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions, and that they be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ENGLISH. I also move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who presented them, have leave to withdraw the petitions, for the purpose of reference to the Department.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN F. WILLS.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made an adverse report on the petition of John F. Wills, asking pay for certain services as deputy postmaster at Lawrenceburg, Kentucky; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

POSTMASTERS' QUARTERLY RETURNS.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to prevent the inconvenient accumulation in the Post Office Department of postmasters' quarterly returns; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ENGLISH. The object of the bill is simply to prevent the inconvenient accumulation of useless papers in the Post Office Department. It has been drawn up by the head of that Department, and has been considered by the committee. I move that it be engrossed, and read a third time.

The bill enacts that the Postmaster General may, from time to time, dispose of any quarterly returns of mails sent or received, preserving the accounts current, and all vouchers accompanying such accounts; provided that the accounts shall be preserved entire at least two years.

The following letter was read from the Postmaster General:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, January 15, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the accumulation of postmasters' quarterly returns is so great that there is not sufficient room for their proper preservation in the General Post Office building, and that many are consequently exposed in the halls, liable to be injured, if not lost.

Similar exigencies having heretofore occurred, Congress provided relief by authorizing the sale of the older transcripts of accounts of mails sent and received, constituting the bulk of the returns, reserving the accounts current and vouchers; and I would suggest that such authority be now given, not merely with reference to the existing exigency, but that the Postmaster General may, from time to time, dispose of transcripts as may be deemed necessary in future.

I submit, for your consideration, a clause to meet this case, similar to a provision contained in an act of Congress, approved June 22, 1854, entitled "An act regulating the pay of deputy postmasters."—(Statutes at Large, vol. x., p. 259.)

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AARON V. BROWN.

Postmaster General.

Hon. W. H. ENGLISH, Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives.

Mr. ENGLISH moved the previous question on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to the passage of the bill. We are erecting buildings large enough to hold all these papers.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. ENGLISH called for tellers on the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WALDRON and CLEMENS were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 37.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MORGAN. Is the bill engrossed?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I object to it.

Mr. ENGLISH. What is the effect of an objection?

The SPEAKER. It carries the bill over until to-morrow.

Mr. ENGLISH. What will be the effect of a motion to commit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

The SPEAKER. The motion cannot be entertained at this time.

LUCY G. GRAY.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the petition of Lucy G. Gray, and moved that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

COURTS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 22, to alter the time of holding the courts of the United States for the State of South Carolina.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. HOUSTON. This bill does not propose to increase the terms of the courts of the United States in South Carolina. It only proposes a change of the time for holding them, and nothing more. It is recommended by the judge who presides over the court; by the gentleman who represents the district; and meets with the approbation, I understand, of the bar and the people to be affected by it.

Mr. STANTON. I understand that the bill provides that recognizances for the appearance of parties shall be changed? I would like to know the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary as to whether Congress has the power to make such a change.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee on the Judiciary gave no opinion on the last section of the bill. So far as my own opinion is concerned, I take it for granted that there is no doubt about the authority of Congress to require the return of process issued for the present terms of the court at the terms established by the bill.

Mr. MILES. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is one purely of local concern. It affects the convenience of a portion of my immediate constituents. It meets with the entire approval of the judge of the district, who, in fact, framed the bill, and the entire concurrence of his associate justice. It simply consults the convenience of the bar and the judge, and merely changes the time of holding the courts at places already established. It seems to me to be a bill which can scarcely meet with any opposition from any source.

Mr. STANTON. I beg the gentleman from South Carolina to understand that I do not oppose the bill. I merely made an inquiry as a matter of curiosity to obtain the opinion of the committee on a point involved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was accordingly read a third time and passed.

JOHN M'CURDY.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported adversely upon the claim of John McCurdy for a pension for service in the St. Clair war and the war of 1812; which report was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF ALEXANDER STEVENSON.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported back such of the papers in the case of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson as referred to a pension, and moved that they be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

ALEXANDER R. BOTELER AND OTHERS.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made an adverse report in the case of Alexander R. Boteler and others; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. SANDIDGE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bills and reports ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of the representatives of William Smith, deceased, late of Louisiana;

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives or assignees of James Lawrence;

A bill for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of Pierre Broussard, deceased;

A bill for the relief of N. C. Weems, of Louisiana; and

A bill to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs, or their legal representatives, of William Conway, deceased."

FRANCIS WLODECKI.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back a bill for the relief of Francis Wlodecki; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

REGIS LOISEL.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Regis Loisel, or his legal representatives; which was read a first and second time, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

SUTLERS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. QUITMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the sutlers of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL COURT OF INQUIRY.

Mr. BOCOCK, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back a resolution (S. No. 4) to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.'"

Mr. BOCOCK said: This is the bill that I asked the unanimous consent of the House to have passed on Friday last. I then made a brief explanation of it, which I suppose is in the memory of most of the members of the House. Lest, however, it should not be, I beg leave now to recapitulate briefly what I said upon that occasion.

On the 17th of January, 1857, a joint resolution was passed, and was signed by the President, the purport of which was to authorize any officer of the Navy, who felt himself aggrieved by the action of the naval board previously assembled under a former act, to come forward within one year and ask to have his case examined by a court required to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy. Such court was directed to report to the President of the United States; and the report being approved by the President, he was authorized, within a year, to nominate any officer dropped by the action of the former board to be reinstated in the Navy; or if he believed the former board had done injustice to any officer, and this court of inquiry recommended a change in the position of such officer upon the reserved list, the President was authorized to make the change recommended by the court of inquiry.

But the reinstatement provided for in that act of 17th January, 1857, could be made only within one year. That year expired on the 17th of January of the present year—that is, on last Friday. At that time I asked to have this resolution passed, to extend the time to the 16th of April next. The reason why the passage of this resolution is necessary is this: When these courts of inquiry made their reports to the President of the United States, and the President reported to the Senate, the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate, I am led to believe—indeed I feel confident that such is the fact—entered into a particular investigation of the finding of the courts of inquiry in each separate case, for the purpose of making intelligent recommendations to the Senate in relation to the confirmation of the nominations made by the President. The committee had not been able, during the present session, to examine all the recommendations of the courts of inquiry, and desired time to make a thorough and sifting examination of the action of the courts in each case.

I did not know, when I made my statement here a few days since, of another act done by the Senate. I find that since that very report of the committee, in order to have time, and fearing that this resolution might not pass the House, the Senate confirmed, in a batch, all the recommendations made to them, based on the action of the courts, by the President of the United States.

But, sir, those confirmations are not final. In regard to every case, except some two or three, a motion to reconsider was instantly made; and that motion to reconsider is still pending. Now, these gentlemen composing the courts desire that this resolution shall be passed because it will give the confirmation of the Congress of the United States to their acts after a deliberate examination of their reports.

But, sir, there are one or two other points of view in which it is necessary to pass the resolution, especially with an amendment which I intend to read in a few moments. I understand that in regard to some of the cases acted on by the courts, the President of the United States had not made his recommendation to the Senate; and, under the resolution of January 17, 1857, he cannot now make any recommendation on those cases for the action of the Senate. If there be such cases, and I believe there are, it is proper that this resolution should pass in order to allow the President to make the nominations upon the recommendations of those courts of inquiry.

In order to meet those cases, I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer an amendment; and I now ask the Speaker to be so kind as to have the joint resolution read, so that I may explain what that amendment is.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That that portion of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,'" limiting the restoration of officers in certain cases, be extended to the 16th day of April, 1858: Provided, That the time within which examinations by courts of inquiry may be made as prescribed by the first section of said act shall not be extended.

Mr. BOCOCK. It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that not only is the time within which officers can ask to have their cases reexamined limited, but the time within which the courts shall act is also limited.

Well, sir, the Secretary of the Navy, in order to dispatch matters, has had three courts in session, acting as diligently as he could bring them to act. All the officers who intended to do so, had doubtless filed petitions to have their cases reexamined, and yet there are one or two cases on which the action of the court had not been had. In one case, sir, which comes within my knowledge, the officer had filed his petition to have his case reexamined; the court had been impaneled, and was actually in process of examining his case at the time of the expiration of the law. The Speaker and the House will see at once that that case had not been completed, it being under examination by the court of inquiry at the time of the expiration of the law; and yet, unless this joint resolution is passed, with the amendment which I am instructed to offer, that case will fall: the court cannot legally complete its examination. The proviso limits the time in which the examinations shall be made. I propose to amend it by adding to it the following:

Except as to any case pending and undetermined before any court of inquiry under the act of 17th June, 1857, at the expiration thereof.

Mr. EDIE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOCOCK. With pleasure.

Mr. EDIE. I understand the object of the amendment to be merely to extend the time, so as to enable the courts to finish up cases which have been already commenced?

Mr. BOCOCK. That is all, sir.

Mr. EDIE. Then I am satisfied that it is right, and ought to be adopted.

Mr. BOCOCK. It applies only to a case which was in process of examination by a court of inquiry at the expiration of the law. It does not allow any officer to come forward now, who did not choose to do so in the course of the year, and file his complaint and have his case examined. It does not allow the Secretary of the Navy to impanel any new court whatsoever. It merely authorizes a court of inquiry, which was in session, and in process of examining a case at the time of the expiration of the law, to complete the examination; and it authorizes the President and the Senate to act upon such action of a court of inquiry.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to ask the gentleman one question for information. I wish to know if all the officers of the Navy, who were affected by the operation of the first board, have had an opportunity of appearing and demanding a reexamination of their cases in the one year, which was the limit of the law?

Mr. BOCOCK. I presume that every officer who was affected by the action of the first board has had an opportunity to complain. All, certainly, who were within the limits of the United States have had that opportunity. I presume that the purport of the joint resolution of the 17th of January, 1857, has gone wherever we have a sail afloat. I presume that every officer of the Navy who was in any way affected by the action of the former court has had knowledge of that joint resolution, and has had an opportunity to make his complaint known, and to have a court impaneled to examine his case. Why not? If any officer was affected by the action of the former court, he was not in the service of the country; he was here within the limits of the country, or, at least, he had an opportunity to be so; he was not absent by the orders of the Navy Department. This law, like any other law, must have been known by such officer of the Navy. He was allowed a year to make his complaint in, and if he did not make it within that year, it was his fault, and not the fault of the law. I hope the gentleman from Iowa is answered.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOCOCK. With pleasure. I desire to give gentlemen all the information in my power, as I intend to try and have the joint resolution passed to-day.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The question I desire to propound to my colleague is this: is it true that the courts did not pretend to examine the records in cases, but required the judge advocate to make out a synopsis of the cases?

Mr. BOCOCK. I really do not know about that, and I do not think that it is at all relevant to this joint resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. I interposed no objection to the joint resolution. I only wished to know if all the officers had had an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. BOCOCK. I did not object to the gentleman's question. On the contrary, as I intend to call the previous question, I shall be glad, if the House will allow me, to hear any questions from gentlemen in any part of the House, and to give such answers as I may be able to.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would say to my colleague, as to the pertinency of my question, that it might very well bear upon the cases unadjusted and unacted on and be a very good reason why the resolution should be amended. I maintain that if the courts have acted in any case upon a synopsis and not on the record of the case, those affected by the decision have been grossly wronged.

Mr. BOCOCK. I know nothing about that, Mr. Speaker. If any officer has been wronged in such a manner, that officer has an opportunity to make his individual complaint to the Congress of the United States, and I for one would be ready to inquire into it. But, sir, I know nothing about that: this resolution has no reference to any such state of facts. It merely extends the time within which the courts, (within certain limits,) the President, and the Senate shall carry out in good faith the act of 17th January, 1857.

Mr. EUSTIS. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia, whether the object of his amendment is to extend the time so as to admit of an examination of the cases of all officers who have lodged their complaints during the year, or whether the extension of time is confined to those cases in which the examination had been commenced, but had been interrupted by the expiration of the law? In other words, I desire to know whether the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Virginia extends to the cases of all officers who may have lodged their complaints during the year, and who may not have had an opportunity of prosecuting their claims from want of time, or whether it is simply intended to apply to those cases only that were in actual prosecution and pending before the courts at the time the law ceased to operate?

Mr. BOCOCK. I will say to the gentleman, what I have already stated, that a proviso was added to the original resolution refusing to the courts any further time whatsoever to make any examination. I supposed that to be wrong, and the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House supposed it to be wrong, inasmuch as there was one case before the court and unfinished at the time of the expiration of the act. My amendment would enable the court to continue and complete that examination, and would enable the President to act on its decision. It goes no further. I am not aware—and I dare say that such is not the fact—that any other officer who filed his complaint within the year has not had his case examined.

Mr. EUSTIS. I understand the gentleman from Virginia to have offered an amendment which applies to an individual case. The gentleman states that he does not know that there is or that there is not any officer who has not had an opportunity of preferring his complaint. I wish to vote on the subject understandingly. The Navy of the United States has already suffered too much from being interfered with by the legislation of Congress. I want to vote here on principle. If there be any officer who has not had an opportunity, from want of time or otherwise, of presenting his case to one of these courts, I want that opportunity extended; and not to one man, or not in one particular instance—as the gentleman from Virginia has frankly confessed he had in view—but to every officer of the Navy. I consider all entitled to the protection of the courts; and I shall vote against this amendment unless it be so amended as to include all the cases which, from want of time or other good cause, have not had an opportunity of prosecuting their complaints.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I desire to say, in reply to the remarks of my friend from Louisiana, that it seems to me he falls into a very common error. He says he will vote against my amendment unless it goes a great deal further. That is, he will not take that which he admits is good in itself, unless it gives him all the good he desires. Now, going on the supposition that the idea of the gentleman is correct, and that the position which he takes is a correct position, I ask why should he refuse to get what he can, when he cannot get all that he wants?

By the act of 17th January, 1857, one year was allowed to every officer of the Navy who might feel himself aggrieved, to make complaint. Now I cannot conceive any reason why, if a man intended to make complaint, he should not do so within the year; and I ask my friend from Louisiana to give me even a supposed case, in which a man could have felt himself aggrieved, and yet not had an opportunity of making a complaint in the course of the year? And now, sir, for an imaginary grievance, or rather a grievance which can hardly be imagined, the gentleman opposes the amendment which I offer. The gentleman may say: "Is it certain that no officer did complain within the course of the year, and did not have his case examined?" I say, as I said before, that I have not heard of any such case, and do not believe there is any such case in existence.

I believe that the Secretary of the Navy impaneled a court on each case of complaint made in the course of the year. That is my answer to the gentleman from Louisiana. If any gentleman were able to rise here and to say that he knew of a case in which the officer made complaint within the twelve months, and in which the Secretary of the Navy refused to impanel a court, it would be a different thing.

My friend from Louisiana has chosen to say, in the course of his remarks, that the Navy has been greatly interfered with by the action of the Congress of the United States already. I know, Mr. Speaker, that there are too many in Congress apt to think that the Navy has been interfered with, while they ought to think of the rights and the interests of the country that are being interfered with. I think that the Navy is for the good of the country, and that the regulations of the Navy are not merely for the good of the officers. Talk about the Navy being interfered with! How interfered with? By the action of the retiring board? If that be so, Mr. Speaker, I can only say that the officers brought it about by their own action. The retiring board was organized at their own request. Go back for two years, and look at the condition of the Navy, and you will find coming up from one end of it to the other, wherever the officers were, whether in the country or out of the country, from any and from every squadron, the cry to the Congress of the United States to do something for the Navy, to relieve it from the imbecility and the rottenness that then existed. Every one, sir, would tell you at that time, that although he was not the man aimed at, although he held himself to be a good and competent officer, yet there were a great many of them who ought to be put out of the way, so that he might have a chance for promotion.

The Congress of the United States yielded to the complaint. It organized a board. Of the construction of that board I shall not undertake to speak here to-day. Indeed, I think that the whole discussion in regard to this matter is out of place. That board, however, I would say, was composed of the loftiest men in the American Navy. If such men as constituted that board cannot be relied upon to do justice to their brother officers, I ask you where is there, in all this sea of corruption, one sound spot in the Navy on which to commence the process of reform? If Shubrick and Perry, and all these men, are not sound; if they are all corrupt men, I ask you where is there, in the American Navy, one sound spot on which you can commence the process of reform? Perhaps some officers were inconsiderately and improperly affected by the action of the board; and perhaps some may have suffered injustice. That may be so. But many did not. And let me call the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that out of two hundred and one men affected by the action of the naval board, a very large number never did complain, but acquiesced in the judgment and finding of the board.

Mr. EUSTIS. I want to make a few remarks.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I do not want to yield to the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. EUSTIS. The gentleman has made a speech.

Mr. BOCKOCK. It was for that purpose that I took the floor, and I have not got through with it.

My friend from Louisiana said that he did not wish an amendment to the bill looking to a particular case. If it be a particular case, it is only because there is but one case coming in a particular category. The amendment I propose authorizes any court which was in the process of examining a case at the expiration of the act, to complete it. If there was only one case in that condition it is not the fault of the principle, nor any fault of mine. My amendment relates to a class of cases, and does not by name specify any particular case.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of my colleague, I simply desire to make a statement of one or two facts in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana. Although, sir, I have the same object in view which the gentleman from Louisiana seems to have, yet I fear that the amendment itself may be prejudiced by the remarks of that gentleman. The gentleman says that he desires to provide for all of the unfinished cases, and not one only. I tell the gentleman that that is exactly my desire; and it is with that view that I took the liberty, a day or two ago, to bring to the notice of the Naval Committee the very amendment which is now pending.

I have made inquiry, however, Mr. Speaker, and I learn that there is but one solitary case which has not been acted on and completed by the courts of inquiry. And the reason why that case has not been completed is this: the party before the court was Commander Armstrong, a friend and constituent of mine; his application was filed, and the investigation of the case commenced at a period sufficiently early to enable the court to complete the investigation; but, in the progress of the investigation, a member of the court became ill, and he was afterwards detached from the court, and some delay occurred in the appointment of a successor. This is the reason why the only case unfinished by the courts of inquiry was not completed. Now, the gentleman from Louisiana will perceive that I have had exactly the same object he has had, and that the amendment provides for every case, and not for a solitary case. If there be more than one, it will provide for all.

Mr. EUSTIS. If the gentleman will permit me, I will ask him a question. Does this amendment provide for all the cases which were not investigated? or does it only provide for those which were not investigated, and which were pending before the three naval courts of inquiry at the expiration of the law? If the latter, then only three cases are provided for.

Mr. MILLSON. I have already stated to the gentleman that I have been informed that all the cases have been completed but this one.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I will state a further fact, to meet the objection of the gentleman from Louisiana, and to show that he is only complaining of an imaginary ill. There were three courts of inquiry impaneled; but because there was no further business for one of them to act on, that is, because every case which had been brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Navy had been committed to these courts, one of them was disbanded weeks ago. Now, sir, if there had been one case of an officer who complained and had not had his case acted on, the Secretary of the Navy would not have disbanded that court. It was disbanded because there was no further business for it, and no further application to be considered by it.

Mr. EUSTIS. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that, if the evils I complain of are imaginary, it is entirely owing to the want of explanation on the part of the gentleman when I addressed him a question. I did not come here prepared to discuss this question. I had no idea that it was coming up to-day. I asked the gentleman distinctly, after consultation with a gentleman now in my eye, and my question is on record, whether his amendment did not exclude all cases but those before the court at the expiration of the law? I asked whether there were any more cases? I am sure that I do not know whether there are any other cases; and it was with a view to prevent any legislation which might afterwards require correction, that I asked the question. I rose for information. I addressed myself to what I believed to be the proper source of information—the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who was before the House presenting an amendment to a Senate resolution for their adoption; therefore, if I have fallen into any error, or if I have complained of any imaginary evil, I am certainly not to blame. If this discussion has been an idle one; if we have consumed the time of the House to no purpose, I have only to say that, if my question had been answered in the first place in a satisfactory and full manner, the House would have been spared this idle discussion, of which the gentleman from Virginia complains.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I have not complained of anything. What I stated was only by way of argument, in order to show the gentleman that there was no such case as he imagined. I had not inquired of the Navy Department specially whether there was any such case. I presumed that there was none; and the fact which I have just alluded to, and which has come to my mind since my first answer to the gentleman, goes far to prove that there is no such case. The fact to which I refer is, that although there were three courts of inquiry, one of them was disbanded weeks ago, because there was nothing for it to do.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. As the gentleman from Virginia says that he will call the previous question, I appeal to him for two or three minutes of his time, merely to make a statement as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The object of the resolution is simply to give to the President of the United States three months' time to examine the action of these naval courts. It does not provide for anything but that. It enables the President to examine with care the proceedings of these naval courts. Their reports were sent in at so late a day that it was impossible for him to consider them all within the time fixed by the law. Therefore it is indispensably necessary that further time should be given to the President to examine them. It is simply a question of time.

A word as to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia. There may be, as we have been told, one, or two, or three cases which had not been disposed of at the expiration of the time fixed in the law. These cases ought to be completed. The gentlemen who present their complaints ought to have an opportunity to have them heard and investigated. There are only one or two more cases, and the amendment extends the time for the examination of those cases. Then the duties of the courts ought to be at an end. I

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 24.

do not think, with the gentleman from Louisiana, that time should be given to these courts to examine cases which have not been presented within the year. I thank the gentleman from Virginia for permitting me to make these remarks.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I merely wish, in this connection, to suggest to the gentleman from Virginia an improvement upon the amendment which he has offered; and I will point to the amendment I propose by a statement of these facts. At the time this resolution passed the Senate, the act referred to was in full force, and all the proceedings had under that act were valid and legal; and all the proceedings since had under the act would have been valid and legal had this resolution passed at the time proposed by the gentleman from Virginia—last Friday. But since then, the proceedings which have been had have been had without legal authority, the act under which they were had having expired. Now, unless some act be passed by this House, conjointly with the Senate, there will be no validity in those acts had since that time. I hardly think that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia reaches sufficiently far to reinstate those acts had by the courts; and therefore I suggest, in addition to the amendment already proposed, to follow it with this amendment:

That all the acts of the courts in said act named, after the limitation therein stated, be, and the same are hereby, legalized.

There is one further consideration in reference to this act which we had better dwell upon at this period of time. The resolution proposes, together with the assistance of the amendment, that all proceedings under the act shall, or may be, continued until some day in April next, with the exception of the examination and procedure to be had by these courts of inquiry. Now, sir, there is named in that act certain preliminary acts to be had by the officers who propose an advantage from that examination; and, by the words of this resolution, those preliminary acts are authorized to be had until a certain day in April, while we, by our resolution, affirm that consequent acts thereof, which give vitality and force to those preliminary acts, shall not be had. I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia, that perhaps it would be well to make a provision in this resolution in that respect, so as to limit the extension of these acts, and all proceedings not necessarily connected with preliminaries for examination before these courts, by adopting this amendment: "That all acts had since the limitation of the act, are now hereby authorized as legal."

Mr. BOCOCK. In reference to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York, I do not see that there is any particular objection to it; nor do I see that it is particularly necessary. Upon an examination of the joint resolution, and upon a good deal of consideration and advisement, I came to the conclusion that the passage of this joint resolution would itself extend the operation of the act; that the operation of the act would be considered as revised, and everything done under it legalized. Though the law has expired, to extend it to the 16th of April of this year will, in my humble judgment, make legal everything done under it. I do not wish to incur the joint resolution. I am authorized by the committee to report the resolution and the amendment; but I am not authorized to amend the amendment. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from New York; but I am not able to accept it, because the amendment I have proposed is the amendment of the committee, which I am not authorized to modify.

I wish to say, in conclusion, that a great many gentlemen have seemed to misunderstand the purpose of the amendment I have introduced. It does not make the operation of the joint resolution more stringent, or cut off anybody. Whatever effect it has, that effect is to enlarge and liberalize the joint resolution passed by the Senate. It takes away no power, but extends the power to all cases under advisement and consideration at the time of the expiration of the resolution of the 17th of January, 1857. I fear I have already taken up too much of the time of the House.

Mr. SICKLES. I wish to ask the chairman of the Naval Committee whether, in case the President shall deem it right to order a rehearing in one or more of the cases passed upon by the court of inquiry, the resolution about to be passed, taken in connection with the existing laws on the subject, would authorize the court to sit for the purpose of such rehearing?

Mr. WINSLOW. I would say to the gentleman from New York that this resolution does not cover that branch of the subject; but that the Committee on Naval Affairs have before them another joint resolution that would embrace that power.

Mr. BOCOCK. I must say that I do not think this joint resolution will accomplish the purpose which the gentleman from New York has in view. As the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WINSLOW] has said, another joint resolution has passed the Senate, come to this House, and been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Whether the committee will report upon it, I am not authorized to say. However, when they report it back, the subject will be before the House, and the gentleman will have an opportunity to accomplish the purpose he has in view.

I was about to say, that if I have taken up too much of the time of the House, it has grown out of a weakness on my part to accommodate gentlemen by giving them such information as was in my power.

I call the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the previous question.

Mr. BOCOCK. I cannot.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall move to lay the resolution on the table, unless the previous question is withdrawn. Will it be in order to move to recommend the resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the previous question is voted down.

Mr. KEITT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KEITT and SEWARD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 34.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. SEWARD. As that joint resolution will not accomplish the object that the gentleman from Virginia professes to desire, I move that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. Is it in order to move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution to a day certain?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. SEWARD. So I supposed, sir.

The main question was then ordered, being first upon the amendment proposed by Mr. BOCOCK, to add to the proviso to the joint resolution the words:

Except as to any case pending and undetermined before any court of inquiry under the act of January 17, 1857, at the expiration thereof.

Mr. LOVEJOY. If that amendment be adopted, will the resolution have to go back to the Senate, and then be returned to this House?

The SPEAKER. If the Senate concur in the amendment, the resolution will not have to be returned to the House.

The amendment was adopted; and the joint resolution was then ordered to a third reading.

Mr. SEWARD. Before the resolution is passed, I would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that the act he proposes to amend was passed on the 16th of January, 1857, and not on the 17th. He had better correct that error, at least.

Mr. BOCOCK. I was under the impression that the act passed on the 17th. If the date is incorrect, I hope that, by unanimous consent, it will be changed.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I object.

Mr. BOCOCK. Very well, then, let it go as it is.

The joint resolution was then read the third time; and the question being upon its passage—

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BOCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES MAXWELL.

Mr. WINSLOW, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Dr. Charles Maxwell, a surgeon in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ASEL WILKINSON.

Mr. WINSLOW, from the same committee, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Ansel Wilkinson;" which was read a first and second time.

The bill was then read in extenso. It provides that the act granting a pension to Ansel Wilkinson, approved August 13, 1856, be so amended that the word "Ansel" shall read "Asel" wherever the same occurs in said act.

Mr. WINSLOW. I ask the permission of the House that that bill be put upon its passage. I will state the facts. The act which it is proposed to amend, passed the House during the last Congress unanimously. It granted a pension in a case of much merit on the part of the petitioner. But either in the Naval Committee of the House or in that of the Senate, a clerical error was made, and the name was printed "Ansel" instead of "Asel." The object of this bill is merely to correct that error, and I hope the House will indulge me by putting it upon its passage.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WINSLOW moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPTORS OF THE CALEDONIA.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the benefit of the captors of the British brig Caledonia, in the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS PEMBER.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, from the same committee, presented an adverse report on the memorial of Thomas Pember, of Washington; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM HEINE.

Mr. HAWKINS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William Heine, artist of the Japan expedition; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ELIPHALET BROWN, JR.

Mr. MORSE, of New York, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Eliphalet Brown, jr.; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

LOUIS LEPAPE.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, presented an adverse report in the case of Louis Lepape; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL MANDIGO AND OTHERS.

Mr. HICKMAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, presented adverse reports in the cases of Daniel Mandigo, Joseph B. Joyal, and Jacob Jero; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

INVALID PENSION BILLS.

Mr. CHAFFEE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported bills for the relief respectively of Mary Bainbridge, of Elizabeth E. V. Field, of Catherine K. Russell, of Stephen Runnell, of John Richmond, of Charlotte Butler, and of Joseph M. Plummer and Mary R. Plummer, minor children of Captain Sand. M. Plummer; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the reports, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the same committee, reported bills for the relief, respectively, of Samuel Goodrich, jr., and of Henry Taylor; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the reports, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CASE, from the same committee, reported bills for the relief, respectively, of Mary Bennett, of Nancy Serena, of Margaret Whitehead, and of Sylvanus Burnham; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the reports, ordered to be printed.

LAND OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. NICHOLS, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office be printed for the use of said office.

Mr. NICHOLS called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. NICHOLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RITCHIE (the call on committees for reports having been gone through with) moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock) the House adjourned until to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 22, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. C. GRANBERY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SOUND DUES TREATY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, inclosing letters to the chairmen of the Committees of Ways and Means and on Foreign Affairs, calling attention to the necessity of making appropriations for payment of interest on the sum to be paid to Denmark, as stipulated in article six of the convention with Denmark for the discontinuance of the Sound dues.

The communication was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed; and the accompanying letters were respectively referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee of Ways and Means.

REPORT OF TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the report of the corps of topographical engineers on the northern and northwestern lakes and rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined, and found truly enrolled, "An act to detach Selma, in the State of Alabama, from the collection district of New Orleans, and making it a port of delivery within the collection district of Mobile;" when the Speaker signed the same.

The SPEAKER stated the business in order to be the call on the Committee of Claims for reports of bills from the Court of Claims.

BATON ROUGE.

Mr. DAVIDSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the propriety of declaring Baton Rouge, on the Mississippi river, a port of entry; and to report a bill therefor if they consider the public interest subserved thereby.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce two bills, which would have been introduced the other day, under the order of the House, by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FENTON,] whose bills they are, if he had not been detained at home by sickness.

Mr. PHELPS. I do not object, if it is understood that the bills are introduced under the terms of that order—not to be reconsidered.

Mr. GROW. I agree to that.

There being no objection,

Mr. GROW introduced a bill to provide for the settlement of the claims of officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army, and of the widows and children of those who died in the service; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. GROW also introduced a bill concerning invalid pensions, and regulating the time of their commencement; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

UTAH AFFAIRS.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House of Representatives the information which gave rise to the military expeditions ordered to Utah Territory, the instructions to the Army officers leading such expeditions, and all correspondence which has taken place with said Army officers, with Brigham Young and his followers, or with others throwing light upon the question as to how far said Brigham Young and his followers are in a state of rebellion or resistance to the Government of the United States.

Mr. HUGHES. I object.

PRINTING APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, I reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill supplying deficiencies in the appropriations for paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses. I perceive the bill and accompanying papers have been printed, and my purpose in rising is to give notice to the House that early next week I shall press its consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

SAMUEL BROMBERG.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I ask that the papers of Samuel Bromberg be withdrawn from the files of the House, in order that they may be sent to the Senate for submission to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who now have the case under consideration.

It was ordered that leave be granted for that purpose.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. BISHOP. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays. I want to get through our business and leave here.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn over is not debatable.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. A motion to adjourn is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. Neither is a motion to adjourn over debatable.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. All motions are debatable which are not excepted by the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will perceive that if a motion to adjourn over is debatable the House could never adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. They could adjourn, but they could not adjourn over.

The SPEAKER. They could not adjourn, because the rules give this motion precedence over the motion to adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish, simply, to remark that if we adjourn over Fridays and Saturdays, we crowd all the private bills into the last few days of the session, plundering the country, as has always been done.

Mr. BISHOP. That is the reason, I suppose, why the gentleman from Tennessee voted last Friday to adjourn over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the 48th rule:

"A motion to adjourn and a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, shall be always in order; these motions, and the motion to lie on the table, shall be decided without debate."

The question being on the demand for the yeas and nays,

Mr. GIDDINGS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. GIDDINGS and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

The House was divided, and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-seven, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 123; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barksdale, Bishop, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burroughs, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, John Cochrane, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Dimmick, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Florence, Gillis, Good, Goodwin, Lawrence W. Hall, Baskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Miles, Montgomery, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Ritchie, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Underwood, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Whiteley, Wilson, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollicooffer—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Bocoek, Bratton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Cragin, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Giddings, Gooch, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Houston, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Landy, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Ready, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Watkins, White, and John V. Wright—123.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. CHAFFEE stated that his colleague, Mr. DAVES had been called home on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, stated that Mr. SCALES had requested him to state to the House that he was detained in his room by indisposition.

Mr. HUGHES. I withdraw my objection to the introduction of the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ZOLLICOFFER.]

Mr. HARLAN. I renew the objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the papers in the case of Henry King's heirs from the files of the Court of Claims, for the purpose of reference to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims in this House.

Mr. HARLAN. I suppose there will be applications of this kind all around the House, thus consuming the whole day, and therefore I shall object to this, and all others.

The SPEAKER announced that reports of private bills were in order from the committees of the House, commencing with the Committee of Elections.

JOHN HOPPER.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Hopper; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

JOHN A. HOPPER.

Mr. CRAGIN also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of John A. Hopper; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF RICHARD TARRIN.

Mr. SHORTER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Richard Tarrin; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES C. PICKETT.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made an adverse report on the petition of James C. Pickett; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ZINA WILLIAMS.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Zina Williams; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PATENT LAWS.

Mr. EDIE, from the Committee on Patents, made an adverse report upon the petition of citizens of Illinois for a change in the patent laws; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM B. WILLIS.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Printing, made an adverse report on the memorial of William B. Willis and others; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. STANTON moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. BRANCH in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the business first in order was the consideration of the adverse report of the Court of Claims upon the petition of Frederick Griffing.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This is the fourth Friday of the month, and is, of course, under the rules, "objection day." No bill can be debated to-day. But there are a number of reports from the Court of Claims first upon the Calendar; they are adverse reports, and of course no bills accompany them. I suppose, sir, that it would be in order to call those cases upon which the court has reported adversely, and if there be no objection to reporting any case to the House, with the recommendation that the House concur in the report of the court, that course can be pursued.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I object to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee, and for the reason that there are to be found among these cases a great many which are presented as though reported upon adversely, when, in point of fact, it will be found that the reports are not adverse, but adverse merely upon some technical proposition of law, with a recommendation from the court that the claims be allowed by Congress. Some of those cases, which I happen to know of, were referred during the last Congress to a committee, and that committee took up the reports of the court, and returned them to the House, with bills. It would be improper, in that state of the case, as I apprehend, that the course suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, should be taken. I hope, therefore, that the general and sweeping proposition which he has indicated, may not be adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think that the gentleman from Kentucky does not understand me. I only suggested the propriety of reporting to the House such of these cases as shall not be objected to, with a recommendation to concur with the Court of Claims. But I understand that none of these reports have been printed; and, perhaps, it would be better to pass over all of them, as they are not printed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that he is informed that there are on this Calendar but three reports that have been printed, and these are all adverse reports from last Congress.

Mr. LETCHER. I imagine that that is a mistake. I take it that the Court of Claims, in sending reports here, send them printed. I examined one of them this morning, out of curiosity, and found it to be a fact in regard to that. It was claim No. 11 on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that that is one of the cases reported last Congress. The Chair asks permission to state, that this being objection day, when a case is called, and any gentleman objects to confirming the report of the court, the Chair will hold that that case will have to be passed over.

Mr. WARREN. I would suggest to take up the cases as they appear on the Calendar. I object to having them taken up in mass, and hope they will be taken up as they occur.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The proper question, when each of these cases is called, is: "Shall the report of the Court of Claims be confirmed?" I ask for the reading of the ninth section of the act organizing that court.

The section was read. It enacts that the claims reported upon adversely shall be placed upon the Calendar when reported; and if the decision of the court shall be confirmed by Congress, said decision shall be conclusive, and said court shall not, at any subsequent period, consider such claims, unless such reasons shall be presented to said court as by the rules of common law and chancery in suits between individuals, would furnish sufficient ground for granting a new trial.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Under that section of the act, I take it that the proper question is: "Shall the report of the Court of Claims be confirmed?" If any gentleman objects to that, why, of course, the case goes over—this being objection day. After the committee shall have acted in the confirmation of the reports of the Court of Claims, the cases are reported to the House; and after they are acted on there they have to be sent to the Senate for confirmation. The words of the law are "by Congress;" that is, by both Houses. That, I think, is the proper course to take with these cases. When objection is made, they are passed over as any other case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Tennessee to move to confirm the reports of the Court of Claims in the case called. If any gentleman objects to confirming that report, the Chair will hold that all debate is out of order, and will proceed to call the next case on the Calendar.

Mr. WARREN. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to propose to take up all these cases reported adversely, and to concur with the Court of Claims on all of them in a mass.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman misunderstood me. My proposition was, that the first case should be called, and if there were no objection, that it should be reported to the House with a recommendation that the House agree with the recommendation of the Court of Claims; but if any gentleman object to its being concurred in, then the case goes over, and can be discussed in future.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the gentleman now; he is right about that. I am in favor of taking up these cases as they occur, and, if no objection be made, let the report of the Court of Claims be confirmed. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] is right as to the question to be submitted—whether the report of the Court of Claims shall be confirmed or not. The reason that induced me to seek the floor was because I misunderstood the gentleman from Tennessee. I thought he proposed to take these claims all en masse.

Mr. STANTON. What question is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is: Will the committee confirm the report of the Court of Claims in the case of Frederick Griffing? If any gentleman objects to taking up and confirming that report, it will go over.

Mr. STANTON. Is it debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not debatable.

Mr. STANTON. Then I object to any debate in reference to it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will move to postpone all of these cases reported from the Court of Claims—this one and on, seriatim—if I am compelled to take that course. I give as my reason, that I do not think it becomes this House to enter on the question of the confirmation of a series of decisions which, by the law, becomes conclusive on the party, while the House stands confessedly without ever having seen any of the documents connected with the transaction. It is confessed here that the reports have not been printed, and yet we are called upon to confirm decisions which none of us have ever seen.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Kentucky as objecting?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Yes, I object; and move to postpone all of these cases.

Mr. RITCHIE. I would inquire whether the reports of the Court of Claims have not already been before the Committee of Claims, and by that committee reported to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that these adverse reports from the Court of Claims do not, under the rule of the House, go to the Committee of Claims at all, but are placed on the Calendar of the House.

The case next on the Calendar was an adverse report on the petition of Francis Picard, administrator of Pierre Ayott.

Mr. WARREN. By way of disposing of all of these reports from the Court of Claims, I now, in my place, object to the whole of them, for the reason that I think we are acting very unadvisedly, inasmuch as we have not before us the evidence on which the Court of Claims acted. I object, therefore, to the whole of them, in mass or individually.

Mr. GROW. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Arkansas. These cases stand on the Calendar, and may as well be disposed of to-day as at any other time. If not, we will have to go through the whole of them on every private bill objection day, and every other private bill day; they will block up the entire business on the Private Calendar. They might as well, therefore, be disposed of to-day. The proper motion would be to lay these aside, with a recommendation that the decision of the Court of Claims be confirmed.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Arkansas as objecting in the case of Francis Picard?

Mr. WARREN. I do object, unqualifiedly; and, if permitted, I will make this remark—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is out of order; and the Chair holds that objection in mass is out of order.

Mr. WARREN. Well, take them seriatim; and I am ready, in my place, to object to them all.

The CHAIRMAN. The next case is an adverse report from the Court of Claims upon the petition of Francis Picard, administrator of Pierre Ayott.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. WARREN. I object to the case.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I presume the gentleman only objects to reporting the case to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The report has not been printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. But the manuscript report can be read.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the gentleman from Arkansas wants to hear the papers in this case read, so that he can form an opinion as to the correctness of the judgment of the court. That is what we all want.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will excuse the Chair, he will state that he understands the gentleman from Arkansas to object to the consideration of the case. The Chair therefore rules that the case cannot be taken up.

Mr. WARREN. I would like the Chairman and the House to indulge me while I state the grounds of my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is in order only by unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. CLEMENS objected.

The next report on the Calendar was from the Court of Claims upon the petition of George W. Dow and John Ditmas.

Mr. KELSEY objected.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I move that the committee pass over the adverse reports from the Court of Claims and take up for consideration the bill which immediately follows them. From that bill the committee can then go on with a hope of accomplishing something.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. GREENWOOD objected.

Mr. LEITER. I rise to a point of order. When gentlemen are decided out of order I insist that debate shall not be allowed.

Mr. WARREN. I rise to a point of order. I was not permitted to state the reasons for my objection, and as gentlemen cannot be permitted to debate the reports as they come up, and not caring to vote without understanding the question, I object to the report now before the committee.

The next case was an adverse report from the Court of Claims upon the petition of Daniel Vawinkle.

Mr. WARREN objected.

The next case was an adverse report from the Court of Claims upon the petition of Joseph Lorranger.

Mr. WARREN objected.

The next case was an adverse report from the Court of Claims upon the petition of Michael Musy and Andre Galtier.

Mr. KELSEY. Is it in order to move that that case be referred to the Committee of Claims, with instructions that they report a bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not; for it would be in the nature of an objection.

Mr. CLEMENS objected.

The next case was an adverse report from the Court of Claims upon the petition of Henry G. Carson, administrator of Curtis Grubb.

Mr. GROW. As it will take all of the day to go through with these reports from the Court of Claims, I suggest that the Calendar be proceeded with, commencing with the first case immediately after them.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, objected.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is evident that the committee will do nothing; and I therefore move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division, yeas 70, nays 62.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BRANCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. HICKMAN moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. GREENWOOD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. I submit that this motion to adjourn over cannot be entertained again; and I hope that the House will settle the question for the present Congress, and establish a practice different from that which prevailed at the last Congress. It is perfectly apparent, if this motion to adjourn over can be repeated on the same day, that nothing can be done on Fridays. I raise the question of order with a view to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, if the Chair entertains the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the objection, and entertains the motion.

Mr. STANTON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and ask for the yeas and nays upon sustaining the appeal.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. STANTON. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. FLORENCE. I withdraw the motion. There seems to be a general desire to test the question, and we may as well meet it squarely.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I renew the motion to lay upon the table. The decision of the Chair is clearly right.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to know what the former usage and what the rule is?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will report the rule.

"A motion to adjourn, and a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, shall be always in order.

These motions, and the motion to lie on the table, shall be decided without debate."

The decision of the Chair is in conformity with the practice of the House certainly for the last ten years, with a single exception during that time, when the Speaker decided that it was in order to repeat the motion, and the House overruled the decision. That has been the uniform practice.

Mr. STANTON. I would ask whether, during the last Congress, it was not decided differently, and that practice adhered to?

The SPEAKER. It was not.

Mr. STANTON. It was at some time, and I supposed it was during the last Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. We have voted once upon this motion to adjourn over, and I ask if it would be in order to move to reconsider that vote and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the motion would not be in order, if the former decision of the Chair be correct.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Does the Chair hold that this question is open to debate? If so, I desire to say a word or two.

The SPEAKER. It is not, because the motion to lay the appeal on the table is not debatable, and if it had not been made, the motion would not be debatable, the rule declaring that it should be decided without debate.

Mr. WARREN. Will it be in order to amend the motion in regard to the time of adjournment? I wish to move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet at ten o'clock on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is to lay the appeal upon the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion that when the House adjourns, it adjourn until Monday next.

Mr. WARREN. I now move my amendment.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. The amendment cannot be in order, as it changes the rule of the House as to the hour of meeting, which cannot be done on a motion to adjourn over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and rules the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas out of order.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 101, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Andrews, Barksdale, Bishop, Blair, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burlingame, Burnett, Burroughs, Campbell, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, John Cochrane, Conins, Corning, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dimmick, Dodd, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eastis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gillis, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Has- kin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Miles, Montgomery, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Peyton, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Russell, Seasing, Aaron Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Underwood, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollicoffer—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Bingham, Bliss, Bockee, Brayton, Bullinton, Burns, Case, Chaffee, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Curry, Curtis, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dowdell, Durfee, Farnsworth, Foster, Gartrell, Giddings, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Houston, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miller, Millson, Morgan, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Savage, Edward Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Soumer, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Tompkins, Trippe, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Watkins, Winslow, and John V. Wright—94.

So the motion was agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. KEITT stated that Mr. GARNETT was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. KEITT. I move that the House adjourn. Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment, that I may make a motion to reconsider.

Mr. KEITT. I withdraw for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish to make a motion to reconsider, if it be in order; but, before I make the motion, I desire to know—a motion to reconsider being made yesterday and laid upon the table—whether it would be in order to move to reconsider the vote laying it upon the table?

The SPEAKER. A second reconsideration cannot be obtained.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then I, of course, will not make my motion.

PATAPSCO RIVER, ETC.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the improvement of the navigation of the Patapsco river, and to render the port of Baltimore accessible to war vessels and steam frigates of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. KEITT. I renew my motion to adjourn. The House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the gentleman from Maine to withdraw his motion, and let us proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. No, sir; I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, (at two o'clock and five minutes, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. No business has been transacted since that motion was negatived.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What became of the motion of the gentleman from Maine?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] made the motion to adjourn after the motion of the gentleman from Maine had been received.

Mr. KEITT. Well, I call for a division on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The call for a division comes too late. The result of the vote has been announced.

Mr. KEITT. I move, then, that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Maine takes precedence of that motion.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the object of the gentleman from Maine is to consider the appropriation bills, I will say to him that my colleague, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, is not in the House.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I know that, sir; I only desired to give the information to the gentleman from Maine and the House.

Mr. KEITT. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I appeal to the gentleman from South Carolina to withdraw his motion, for I know that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] of the Committee on Military Affairs, is exceedingly anxious to get up his bill for the four new regiments. I call upon that gentleman to come forward now. The country is suffering. He told us so three weeks ago, when he wanted to close debate on the President's message. I hope he will come forward now and bring up his bill.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. I call for tellers on that motion.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Messrs. FLORENCE and BILLINGHURST were appointed as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 76, nays 93.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on the motion that there be a call of the House.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the yeas and nays; but subsequently withdrew the demand.

The motion for a call of the House was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to suspend the rules; and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WINSLOW in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill (No. 3) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1859.

Mr. HUGHES. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Mr. Chairman, the President, in his annual message, recommends to us the favorable consideration of the Pacific railroad. He speaks of the advantages of the southern route, but expressly eschews a commitment to any particular route. The Secretary of War commits himself to the southern route. He says the grades are lower, the climate milder, and the distance across the desert region, common to all the routes, is less upon this. He also says the distance from El Paso to the Colorado, besides being the shortest of all yet surveyed, possesses very decided advantages over others, in several important particulars.

Without being opposed to a southern route, or a middle, I am in favor of the northern route, from the head of Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and take this early occasion to say that, in my opinion, no bill can, or ought to pass this Congress that does not provide for this northern route. I am willing to vote for a bill that shall furnish equal facilities for three roads, leaving to the wisdom of capital the choice of lines for investment.

Does the Secretary of War intend to impress Congress and the country with the idea that the Pacific railroad is complete when the four hundred and seventy-two miles between El Paso and the Colorado, are furnished with a track? Why, sir, that link is less than one quarter of the road necessary, and without the balance this link is useless. Perhaps he assumes that the southern Pacific through Texas, a distance of eight hundred miles, is completed. Sir, a most violent assumption. Five years ago a grant of sixteen square miles, and two years since $6,000 in money per mile, was given by Texas in aid of this road, and just now, with all this aid, about twelve miles of the road is completed, and most of that has been done by assignees of the company, and but slightly done, and under the great pressure of a forfeiture of charter, if twenty-five miles is not in running order by next month. What guaranty has the General Government that any road in that latitude, which may receive its favors, will be prosecuted with any better success? Without Government aid, by private capital alone, in these five years, the other States of the Union have built over twelve thousand miles of road, the equivalent of more than one per annum, or six lines of railroad to the Pacific. The chief sustenance of a Pacific railroad is to be drawn from the commerce of the Pacific ocean. To secure that commerce, the road must terminate at a good sea-port—a good harbor. Neither San Diego or San Pedro being such harbor, we must look to San Francisco, Astoria, or Puget Sound—the best of these is Puget Sound. In considering the southern route, San Francisco must be regarded as its western terminus. I propose to speak briefly of this southern route, that has been so carefully nursed by the War Department for the past three or four years, and to contrast it with the northern route, and then to appeal to the wisdom of Congress and the country in behalf of the only route that presents anything inviting to the capital of the country.

In all Government calculations it is assumed that Fulton, on the Arkansas, is the eastern terminus of the southern route.

Mr. CURTIS. If you add the distance from Fulton to the navigable waters of the Mississippi, you may give two hundred miles more.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. It is true, that from Fulton to the Mississippi river is over two hundred miles—about two hundred and fifty.

Mr. COBB. I would state to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CURTIS,] that these two hundred miles of road will be completed very soon.

Mr. CURTIS. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. If it takes five years to build twelve miles in this latitude, as it has in Texas, it is a matter of simple calculation how long it will take to build two hundred and fifty miles.

Passing west we cross the Llano Estacado, an elevated barren table land one hundred and fifty miles across; one hundred and ten of which is at an altitude of four thousand five hundred feet. This is the plain where the Government is sinking money in Artesian wells. To traverse this and other barren plains on this route, and to supply these wells with water, the Government has been importing camels and dromedaries. From this plain to Independence Springs, the altitude varies from four thousand one hundred and fifty to four thousand five hundred feet; thence through Guadalupe Pass, a distance of twenty-four miles, from four thousand five hundred to five thousand seven hundred and sixteen feet. Passing on at high altitudes, we approach Hueco Pass, the summit of which is four thousand eight hundred and eleven feet; and, for a distance of twenty-eight miles, approaching and leaving this pass, the altitude is above four thousand five hundred feet; from thence to Molino, near El Paso, on the Rio Grande, there is a gradual descent to three thousand eight hundred and thirty feet. Between El Paso and Primas village, on the Gila, two hundred and seventy-two miles of the whole distance, exceeds four thousand five hundred feet in elevation; the greatest altitude being five thousand four hundred and seventy-six feet. I next strike the line one hundred and twenty miles west of the Colorado, approaching the San Geronio Pass, on a grade of forty feet per mile for ten miles; then, with a grade of eighty-nine feet per mile for six miles, to the summit of the pass at an altitude of two thousand eight hundred and eight feet, bordered by mountains nine thousand feet high. It then descends to San Barnardo, a distance of twenty-five miles, at a grade of eighty feet per mile, with one third of a mile at one hundred and twenty-seven feet grade. Thence, seventy-eight miles to San Fernando Pass, which is approached by more than four miles on an ascending grade of one hundred and fifty-five feet to the mile, tunneled one third of a mile at an elevation of one thousand seven hundred and forty-six feet; and descended from at a grade of one hundred and fifteen feet per mile four miles, with heavy and difficult side-cutting; thence seven miles with an ascending grade of fifty-five feet per mile.

The next remarkable feature is the New Pass of Lieutenant Williamson, in the valley of the Santa Clara, the summit of which is three thousand one hundred and sixty-four feet above the sea—requiring a cut in the summit of fifty feet, with grades for a distance of twenty-nine miles, varying between fifty-five and one hundred and five feet; also requiring two or three tunnels through spurs of the mountain. Indeed, the natural slope on the east is two hundred and forty and two hundred and eighteen feet, the distance of one and one third miles. The next is the Tay-ee-chay-pah Pass (in the Sierra Nevada)—elevation of summit, four thousand and twenty feet; ascending to it from the Tulares valley in fifteen and a half miles, with grades varying from one hundred and fifty-three to one hundred and ninety-two feet, and descending nine miles, at eighty feet per mile. Between Tay-ee-chay-pah Pass and Kern river, ten miles of the distance require a grade of seventy-eight feet per mile. From the crossing of Kern river to San Francisco is two hundred and seventy miles. Of this portion of the route I will not speak, as I have no reliable data. The length of the road from Fulton to San Francisco is computed to be two thousand and fifty-eight miles. Of this distance four hundred and thirty-four miles is ascertained to be at an altitude exceeding four thousand five hundred feet. The sum of ascents and descents on this line is forty-two thousand nine hundred and thirty-four feet. The absence of water; the absence of vegetation; in fact, the absence of soil in five or six hundred miles of this route, render it incapable of settlement, and consequently uninviting to that capital, which is indispensable in the construction of railroads.

I have not yet done with the southern route, but shall have more to say of it before I take my seat. What I have said, and shall say, is in no spirit of animosity to it; but that I feel compelled to make some contrasts, in order to do that justice to the northern route which it has failed to receive at the hands of the War Department.

Mr. Chairman, I shall now proceed to a very brief consideration of the northern route.

The great chain of the northern lakes furnish at hand a water communication more than half way across the continent. The head of Lake Superior is the natural starting point for a railroad.

In a straight line to Puget Sound, the distance is thirteen hundred and eighty miles; by the railroad route explored by Governor Stevens, via Fort Vancouver, nineteen hundred and seventy-five miles; and by the Cœur d'Alene route to Fort Vancouver, eighteen hundred miles.

From Fond du Lac Superior as a starting point, at an elevation of six hundred and thirty feet above tide waters, it strikes the Missouri at Fort Union, in latitude 48° north, at an elevation of two thousand feet above the ocean. Guadalupe Pass, on the southern route, is directly south of Fort Union, and in latitude 32°, being eleven hundred and twelve miles south, and is elevated three thousand seven hundred and sixteen feet above Fort Union. Fort Union is seven hundred and twenty-five miles from Lake Superior, and the rise in that distance is thirteen hundred and seventy feet. Extending west, via the valley of the Milk river, to Fort Benton on the Missouri, in latitude 47° north, the elevation is two thousand three hundred and twenty-nine feet, being a further elevation of three hundred and twenty-nine feet in three hundred and seventy-five miles. From thence to the summit of the divide at Lewis and Clark's Pass, Cadotte's Pass, and Lieutenant Mullen's Pass, (sometimes called Hell Gate Pass,) west of what is known as the "Gate of the Mountain," a distance of one hundred and twenty miles, we attain an elevation ranging, according to different measurements, between five thousand five hundred and thirty-seven feet and six thousand two hundred and twenty-three feet. Lewis and Clark's Pass can be passed by a tunnel two and a half miles in length, one thousand feet below the summit; Cadotte's Pass the same; and Mullen's Pass between the sources of the Little Prickly Pear and the Little Blackfoot rivers, with a cut of one hundred feet, not exceeding one half mile in length. It is safe to assume, from a careful examination of all the reports of explorations of this dividing ridge between the head waters of the Missouri and the Columbia, that the railroad track will not be elevated above five thousand feet, and at that elevation not exceeding two and a half miles.

Here is what Lieutenant Mullen says of the Pass I have designated as his:

"On the seventh night from Fort Benton, I encamped at the foot of the mountains on the east, forming the dividing ridge of the Missouri and Columbia waters. The day following (March 25, 1854) I crossed the mountain with no difficulty whatever; found no snow upon its summit, and the mountain itself nothing more than a low prairie ridge. The ascent and descent are so exceedingly gradual, that not only was it not necessary to lock the wheels of the wagon in descending, but it was driven with the animals trotting. (He was traveling with a four mule team.) One could scarcely have believed that there existed such a beautiful and easy pass in the mountains. For a railroad it would involve a cut of one hundred feet deep and half a mile long, which was the measured distance from base to base." *
"From the mountains to the Bitter Root valley you have a gently sloping valley the whole distance."

Of Cadotte's Pass, Lieutenant Saxton thus speaks in his journal:

"September 7, 1853.—Crossed the last dividing ridge of the mountains, and are encamped upon a small creek upon the eastern side, one of the head branches of the Missouri. The ridge which divides the waters flowing into the Atlantic from those flowing into the Pacific, at the place where we crossed, is but a high hill, and it is not more than a mile in a straight line between the sources of the Columbia and the Missouri. Nature seems to have intended it for one of the great highways across the continent.

"The mountains at this point, offer no obstacle to the construction of a railroad from this place to the Flathead village. With the exception of one mountain, easily to be avoided, a finer region through which to build a road can nowhere be found."

It is highly probable that a more thorough examination of this dividing ridge will discover more favorable passes than any yet known. The eastern approaches to the most difficult of these passes does not exceed sixty feet per mile gradients; nor the western, forty feet; and these high grades extend but a few miles from the summit.

Here, in a distance of twelve hundred and twenty miles from the head of Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountain Pass, the rise is only four thousand four hundred feet, or three and one half feet per mile. But in the eleven hundred miles to Fort Benton, the rise is only sixteen hundred and fifty-nine feet, or one foot and a half per mile. From Fort Benton to the summit, one hundred and twenty-three miles, the rise is two thousand six hundred and seventy-one feet, or twenty-two feet per mile.

On the mountain slopes there is an abundance of timber, just where it is most needed.

From Lewis and Clark's Pass, as well as from Cadotte's Pass, the route westward is down the valley of the Blackfoot river, to Hell Gate, in the valley of the Bitter Root river; and the route westward from Mullen's Pass is down the valley of the Little Blackfoot and Hell Gate river, also to Hell Gate, which is in latitude 47°, and longitude 114°; thence down the valley of the Bitter Root to the mouth of the Regis Borgia creek, and up this creek, westward, through the pass in the Cœur d'Alene mountains; thence in a southwesterly direction, through the great basin of the Columbia, between Clark's forks and Snake river, over an open prairie country, to Fort Wallah-Wallah. From this point there are two routes to Seattle, on Puget Sound—one, by way of the Columbia river, to Fort Vancouver, and then north, on the west side of the Cascade range of mountains; the other in a northwest direction, known as the Yakima route. Governor Stevens favors this latter route; saying it will shorten the distance eighty-four miles, and cost $5,000,000 less than the Columbia valley route, and is practicable.

There are no grades west of the divide exceeding fifty feet per mile. Perhaps a few short tunnels through bluff points projecting to the rivers, similar to those on the Hudson river railroad, may be required. The sum of ascents and descents on this line is nineteen thousand one hundred feet.

If, on a working survey of the line, tunneling shall be found advisable, to shorten distance, this discovery should not be considered a very serious obstacle, as, with the present knowledge in railroad construction, rock tunneling can be pushed forward at the rate of two lineal yards per day, without machinery; and with machinery, at double that rapidity; and by either method, the cost will be within half a million dollars per mile.

Mr. Chairman, I have said enough upon the profile of the northern route. Now, sir, I propose to speak of it with reference to its soil, climate, and capabilities for sustaining a population. As to that part of it which crosses Minnesota, from Lake Superior to the Bois des Sioux, a distance of two hundred and twenty-six miles, let the three hundred thousand inhabitants of Minnesota answer. From the Bois des Sioux, four hundred and seven miles west, to the mouth of White Earth river, the western boundary of the old Territory of Minnesota, where the Missouri makes its great bend from an eastern to a southern direction, the first sixty miles furnishes plenty of wood and timber, and the balance of the way is in the main an open prairie country, good soil for farming, with occasional groves and belts of wood, and the whole way interspersed with creeks, rivulets, and lakes, besides the Rivière à Jacques, Chayenne, and Mouse rivers.

From White Earth river to Fort Union is eighty-four miles, and from thence to Fort Benton three hundred and seventy-five miles. About one hundred and thirty miles above Fort Union, the railroad line leaves the valley of the Missouri, and takes to the valley of Milk river, and keeps in this valley to the Bear's Paw mountains, nearly opposite Fort Benton. Here the land is better than in the valley of the Missouri, which, below Fort Benton, passes through the Mauvaises Terres, a tract of "bad land;" but the district through which the Milk river runs, as well as the country a little way back from the Missouri, abounds in grass—is recognized by all who have seen it as prairie land—a name never applied to any but fertile land. It abounds in grass; is the favorite resort of the buffalo, those engineers by instinct, whose survey lines will never lead us into barren places; to follow which is wiser than to follow the line of the theodolite, when it would take us over desert wastes and impracticable mountain barriers.

"The soil is excellent from the Mississippi river to the Bois des Sioux, in the Mouse river valley, and in the valleys of the several streams flowing into the Missouri. Much of the land is good on Milk river, and on the banks of the Missouri itself. It is excellent in the valleys of the Marias, Teton, Medicine, Dearborn, and the several tributaries at the forks of the Missouri. It is also excellent on the Missouri in the vicinity of Fort Benton, on the Highwood creek, on the Judith river, on the Muscle Shell, and on Smith's river. The valleys of the Hell Gate, Blackfoot, St. Mary's, Jocko, and the several tributaries flowing into the Flathead lake, furnish excellent soil. The soil is good on the several prairies on Clark's fork, in the vicinity of the Cœur d'Alene lake, the several tributaries flowing into that lake, and good for the most part on the banks of the Spokane, and on the western slope of the Cœur d'Alene mountains; and it is good, also, much of the distance on the railroad route over the Great Plain of the Columbia, and on the Wallah-Wallah river and its tributaries. In the immediate vicinity of Fort Wallah-Wallah the soil is poor. Below Fort Wallah-Wallah, on both banks of the Columbia, the soil for the most part is good, and the grazing excellent. Below the Cascades the soil is rich, and is so for the most part to the mouth of the Cowlitz, and thence to Puget Sound. On the southern shore of Puget Sound a portion of the prairies is gravelly, although the great portion furnishes fair arable land.

"In the Yakima valley there is some good land, and by irrigation a considerable quantity of land could be made available for crops. Crossing the mountains by the Snoqualine Pass, the soil improves, and for some forty miles before reaching the Sound, the quality is excellent. This is especially the case back of Seattle.

"The grazing is good on the whole route, and between the Bois des Sioux and the Mouse River valley, and between this valley and the Big Muddy river. Between the several river valleys from the Big Muddy to the Medicine river, there are many small streams, and valleys furnishing excellent farming locations.

"The timber is abundant as far as the Bois des Sioux, and on the route thence to the Grand Coteau, heading the Mouse river valley, the road can be supplied from the Shayenne, the Minnawaken lake, the coulees, and main valley of the Mouse river, and various lakes not far from the line of the route. From the Grand Coteau to the Big Muddy river, there is little or no timber, and the supply must be furnished from the Missouri and Yellowstone. The same from the Big Muddy to Milk river. From the mouth of Milk river to the mountains, temporary arrangements can be made with the cotton-wood, to be replaced, on a through communication being established, by the excellent pines of the Bear's Paw, the Three Buttes, and the Rocky Mountains, though it will be practicable, from the Missouri, to extend the track along Milk river, by the red cedar and the pines of the Missouri and Yellowstone, and, by the use of a branch road, to open a new section where the route passes between the Bear's Paw and the Three Buttes. The supply from the mountains to beyond the crossing of the Spokane is inexhaustible; thence, for some one hundred miles, to the crossing of the Columbia, there is a scarcity of timber; but inexhaustible supplies can be floated down the Columbia. From the crossing of the Columbia, down its valley to the Cowlitz, and thence to the Sound, the supply is inexhaustible; though from the crossing to the Dalles, the reliance must be on the woods of the Columbia, above the mouth of the Wenatchapan; by the route of the Yakima and the Snoqualine Pass, there will be ample supplies of timber. Not much is found the first ninety-four miles; but the route being in the valley of the Yakima, there will be no difficulty in rafting down to points where timber is wanted, from its head waters.

"In the timbered region are found pine, larch, spruce, cedar, and fir. East of the Bois des Sioux the growth is principally oak, elm, ash, &c.

"There will be no difficulty as to water. It will be deficient at points on the broad plateau between the Milk and Missouri rivers, but by aqueducts it can easily be supplied. The lakes on the Grand Coteau will also furnish the means of supplying any deficiency from the Grand Coteau to a point south of the Minnawaken lake. But our observations go to show that there need be little apprehension of a deficiency here. On the great plain of the Columbia, I apprehend no deficiency in the supply of water; the whole country abounds in lakes and small streams.

"Our observations and inquiries go to show that the average depth of snow cast of the mountains to the Missouri does not exceed one foot. Two feet is an extraordinary depth, and the most experienced voyageurs in that country have never been detained a single day, in traveling, by snow. The most they have been compelled to do was to lie by till the storm was over.

"In the Rocky Mountains, and on the line of Clark's Fork, the snow is hardly ever deep enough to prevent the Indians traveling with their families on horseback all through the winter; one foot is a common depth, and three feet is a very extraordinary depth, in the Rocky Mountains. Last winter the average on the several passes was less than one foot. The winter before—the winter of greatest snow for many years, as shown by the unprecedented rise of the rivers in the following spring—the depth was three feet.

"On the plain of the Columbia, in the lower Columbia valley, and on the route thence to the Sound, the snow is inconsiderable."—Governor Stevens's Summary.

To go more into detail on this subject of snows, as it seems to be one of the great "bugbears" to frighten away support of the northern route, I offer the testimony of Lieutenant Grover, who crossed the mountain range in the winter of 1854. He left Fort Benton on the 2d of January, 1854; up to that date, but little snow had fallen in that section of the country, and that little did not remain. The weather had been generally mild. He started with a dog train, taking with him pack mules, until he should meet the snow. On the 3d it snowed, and on the morning of the 4th three inches of snow was found on the ground. On the 7th the appearances were so favorable for snow that he sent back his mules; but he found he was too hasty, as a southwest breeze sprang up and took off nearly all the snow. He says a southwest wind in that country is sure to bring with it fair mild weather continuously, and that it is the prevailing winter wind. Hence he accounts for the moderate amount of snow. On the 10th, after traveling on bare ground, he encamped on Dearborn river and found snow; on the 12th, he crossed the divide in snow a foot deep and but little drifted. On his further progress west, through the Rocky Mountain range, this officer found but little or no snow in the valleys or mountain passes.

Two months later, in March, Lieutenant Mullen went from Fort Owen to Fort Benton, a distance of two hundred and ninety-four miles, and back in the same month, and found only ten inches of snow, and this depth but part of the way.

The greatest depth of snow is found in the Cascade range. In January, 1854, Captain McClelland undertook to explore the Snoqualme Pass; but meeting with some Indians, who represented the snow to be twenty-five feet deep on the summit, he gave up the enterprise and returned. I suppose it is upon the strength of this report that the late Secretary of War, in reporting upon Governor Stevens's reconnaissance, says:

"The evidence respecting the amount of snow found on the summit of the pass at the close of winter, makes it probable that it is then twenty feet deep there."

But, fortunately, it so happens that at this very time, January, 1854, while Captain McClelland was attempting the passage from the west, A. W. Tinkham made the passage from the east, crossing the summit of the pass on the 21st of January, and he says:

"For about six miles on the summit snow was found to be six feet deep, with an occasional depth of seven, as also of four." * * * "The whole breadth of snow over twelve inches deep was some sixty miles in extent; of this about forty-five miles were two feet and upwards; about twenty miles were four feet and upwards; and six miles were six feet and upwards."

And he further says:

"The snows present little obstruction to removal in comparison with the compact drifted snows of the Atlantic States." * * * "I see no well-grounded reason to apprehend that the regular running of railway trains would be hindered in the winter from the snow in the Yakima Pass."

He found large camps of Indians in their winter quarters near this pass, grazing large bands of horses and cattle, without the expectation that the snow would drive them thence, or destroy their horses and cattle.

The testimony of Mr. Rice and Mr. Sibley, old settlers in Minnesota, and Mr. Culbertson, of Fort Benton, as to snows in the coteau of the Missouri, do not make it over one foot deep, and that in many winters it will not exceed six inches. To the same result I can add my own testimony as to the snows of Wisconsin, from ten years' residence in that State, except that in the northern portion of my State, where there is more snow in consequence of the evaporation from Lake Superior.

To show that such is not the exception to, but is the general character of, the winter climate, not only of Wisconsin, but of the whole interior portion of the continent, extending to and embracing the Rocky Mountains as high up as the sources of the Missouri, it is only necessary to refer to the laws which govern the fall of snow and rain.

An evaporating surface and a high tension of the atmosphere are essential to the production of rain or snow in large quantities. Hence, in passing from the equatorial to the polar regions, the quantity of rain and snow which annually falls is found to decrease. And the same result follows in respect to places in the same latitude, in passing from the sea-coast to the interior. The density of the atmosphere as well as its temperature, has much to do with its capacity for retaining moisture. In ascending from the level of the ocean towards the interior, both the density and temperature are diminished; the vapors, suspended and condensed, fall near the coast in rains or snows, leaving the winds to pass on to the interior, deprived of moisture sufficient to supply any considerable amount of snow or rain. The greatest amount of our snows in the Northwest fall at the commencement of cold weather and during the month of December. From that time on, the weather is generally clear and cold, with a dry and bracing atmosphere, yielding neither snow nor rain.

Such is the condition of the interior of our continent, the vapors arising from the Atlantic, as they pass over the continent, are condensed and fall in snow or rain before they get beyond the Alleghany range. After winter has fairly set in the evaporating surfaces of the interior are frozen over, excepting the great lakes; hence, in the vicinity of those large bodies of water we find the greatest depth of snow during the winter, but it does not extend to any great distance from them, as the quantity of vapor arising from their surfaces is insufficient to furnish a supply to extend over a large tract of country.

It is for these reasons that the interior has less snow than the sea-board and lake shores.

The vapors arising from the Pacific ocean are condensed by the Coast and Cascade ranges of mountains, and fall in snows and rains, and before the winds reach the interior they are deprived of the principal part of their moisture, and may be designated dry winds. Humidity has never been charged upon the atmosphere of the Northwest. Our dry, clear, pure, atmosphere insures health and the greatest amount of physical energy in man. Comfort and business are therefore not so much affected by the cold in our dry northern latitude; and we bear with at least twenty degrees more cold than you can in this latitude, and are less inconvenienced by it, in any possible point of view.

If I have not said enough to dispose of these "bugbears," the deep snows, the intense cold, and the barren plains, let me call the attention of the committee to the railroad experience of Canada, Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine, where the snows are deeper and more compact than they are west of Lake Superior. If still I fail to satisfy railroad gentlemen, let me cite them to the experience of Russia, with her railroad from Moscow in latitude 56°, to St. Petersburg, in latitude 60°.

Will the committee yet believe that this latitude is not capable of sustaining an agricultural population, either on account of cold or sterility? Ask the million of inhabitants in Wisconsin and Minnesota, if their country is too cold or too sterile for agriculture. Why, sir, those States at the present time constitute the granary of the nation. Ask the Selkirk and Saskatchewan settlements in the British provinces, and they will make you as good report per acre, on agriculture, as New York or New England can.

I will take this occasion to speak of a peculiarity in the configuration of the great American plain between the western States and the Rocky Mountains. Between the thirty-second and thirty-third parallel the general altitude is about four thousand three hundred feet; in the upper half of the valley of the Gila, over five thousand feet. Fort Massachusetts, in latitude 37° 30', is eight thousand four hundred feet above the sea. Fort Laramie, in latitude 42° 15', is four thousand five hundred feet. The South Pass, in latitude 42° 30', is seven thousand five hundred feet. Fort Benton two thousand three hundred and twenty-nine feet, and Fort Union two thousand and nineteen feet—both in latitude 48°; and the Saskatchewan country one thousand feet. This declination in the altitude as you go north is the key to unlock the secret of the mild climate and fertile soil along the northern railroad line. Sir, altitude as well as latitude is to be considered in locating railroad lines.

Another marked feature of this northern line, signaling it as the line to be preferred, is the aid it derives from water communication on the Columbia and the Missouri, whether to facilitate construction, or in part to dispense with railroad construction. From the mouth of the Columbia up to the Peluse, its tributary, we have two hundred and sixty-nine miles of navigation; thence, due east, over the divide to Fort Benton, the head of navigation on the Missouri, four hundred and fifty miles of railroad, over a route no more difficult than is the New York and Erie or the Pennsylvania Central; thence down the Missouri, nearly due east, three hundred and seventy-seven miles to Fort Union, we have good navigation at all seasons of the year (except when frozen) for boats drawing from twenty to thirty inches water, or capable of carrying three hundred tons burden. Here, from Fort Benton to the Columbia, in the language of the present Secretary of War, we have a shorter route than from "El Paso to the Colorado;" and what is better, the ends of this route are not stuck in the sand, but the rivers give us outlets. From Fort Union to Lake Superior, again, nearly due east, is seven hundred and seventeen miles. So that in reality this northern line of communication is complete when we build one thousand one hundred and sixty-seven miles railroad.

Mr. Chairman, the late Secretary of War, in reporting to this House upon Governor Stevens's explorations, says that these explorations show that the unculivable regions on this route, as in that of the Arkansas, begins with the ninety-ninth meridian. That point, sir, is about ninety miles west of Minnesota; from thence to the Pacific, he deduces, from these explorations, that the country is one of general sterility, with some exceptions in the mountain valleys. He also reports that the sum of the areas of cultivable soil in the Rocky Mountain region does not exceed, if it equals, one thousand square miles.

Governor Stevens reports ten thousand square miles of arable, tillable land already prepared for occupation and settlement, in the mountain range between Fort Benton and the Bitter Root range of mountains. And, sir, as I read his reports and the reports of his officers, I do not understand that there is any land between Fort Benton and the ninety-ninth meridian, that deserves the term arid or sterile, but I do understand from his explorations that nearly this entire coteau is capable of sustaining an agricultural population. It is the favorite grazing ground for the buffalo, and, sir, they do not seek their pasturage in arid and sterile places. More careful and extended explorations by Governor Stevens have satisfied him that his estimate of ten thousand square miles was an under-estimate.

In addition to this area of farming land, the Governor says there is a tract of land between the Peluse river and the Bitter Root mountains, in extent equal to the State of Connecticut, of as rich land as the farmer ever put plow into. The Governor's estimate of cost of road, was also materially increased by the War Department.

One cannot read the first volume of the Pacific railroad surveys, without concluding that the War Department has unfairly and unjustly dealt with the labors of Governor Stevens and his party. Here is presented this remarkable spectacle, of a Department of the Government detailing its own officers to conduct explorations, the object of which was to obtain information of unknown and unexplored regions, and then deliberately attempting to discredit, before Congress and the country, the results obtained, by substituting its own judgment, in opposition to ascertained facts. It looks very much as if the War Department had determined in advance, irrespective of the results to be obtained by the surveys and explorations, that this northern route should not be encouraged.

Three hundred and forty thousand dollars have been appropriated directly for explorations of railroad routes to the Pacific. Only $55,000 of this had been devoted to the northern line, when the War Department stopped further work there, by refusing pay. The balance of these appropriations has been expended South. The one or two hundred thousand dollars for Artesian wells, without water, on the southern line, is to be added, besides the $10,000,000 for the Gadsden purchase, which was bought for railroad track. The explorations are to make eight large quarto volumes; the number of volumes published, and to be published, is about one hundred and twelve thousand, at a cost to the Government of about five hundred and sixty thousand dollars. The first volume is devoted to the northern route—the other seven to the central and southern. The first volume is without illustration of any kind; does not even contain the report of the geologist attached to Governor Stevens's party, which, as I am informed, the late Secretary of War refused to publish for want of means. Of the remaining seven volumes, four are already published, and are most beautifully illustrated, presenting a complete panorama of the natural scenery, the geology, botany, zoology, ornithology, and everything else that could adorn and help to make the books a center-table ornament; and, it is to be presumed, that the three volumes yet to come, are to be of similar character. Assuming that one eighth of the cost of publication is to be charged to the northern route, it then turns out that, out of $11,000,000 expended to find a railroad track to the Pacific, $125,000 is to be put to the account of the northern route.

But this is not the end of these explorations. I am informed, that at the present time Lieutenant Ives is exploring the Colorado, at the expense of this railroad fund.

On the 6th June, 1853, Governor Stevens and his party started their explorations from St. Paul. Not reaching the mountain districts until cold weather had set in, the explorations were vigorously carried on by his efficient aids, Captain McClellan, Lieutenant Donelson, Mr. Tinkham,

Mr. Lander, Lieutenant Mullen, Mr. James Doty, and Lieutenant Grover, through the entire winter season, in an uninhabited region. Of course their labors were attended with great difficulties, and the results obtained were meager, compared with the extensive field of operations before them. The Governor had made every preparation for an extensive and thorough summer reconnaissance, and had made his estimates accordingly, and reported preparations to the War Department, asking the coöperation of that Department; when, just as the season of operations was opening, on the 13th April, 1854, the Secretary of War stops the supplies—says he will estimate for arrears, but says nothing of future operations, although well advised how little opportunity had been afforded the party of fulfilling the intentions of Congress. Notwithstanding Congress appropriated $150,000 August 5, 1854, for continuing the explorations, no orders were sent to Governor Stevens to resume labors.

Mr. Chairman, there never can be but one New York upon the American shore of the Atlantic; and she must ever be none other than New York. She will ever be as she is, the commercial metropolis of America, until rivaled by that queen city of the world, yet to be born, whose seat is to be at Puget Sound, on the eastern shore of the majestic Pacific. How plainly has nature marked out the forty-seventh parallel on the American continent for a great national and international thoroughfare! I say nature has marked it out, first, because, revolving around this imaginary line as a center, as well upon the eastern as the western hemisphere, is to be found the hardiest, most enterprising, most numerous, as well as most highly civilized, of the human family. It is the center of population of the northern temperate zone. Here originate the demands of commerce; and from here commerce derives its vitality. And it is upon this line that nature assures to all the wealth that floats upon the seas a safe and speedy passage. No crossing of the equinoxial; no doubling of the capes; no simoons or trade-wind; but an open sea, with fair sailing, and an equable climate.

I say nature has marked it out, secondly, with the St. Lawrence and its great lakes stretching half-way across the continent, the Columbia and the Missouri striving to complete the connection. The old Rocky Mountain itself, in aid of this great thoroughfare, lowers its crest between the sources of the Columbia and the Missouri, so as to furnish a facile transit. We have but to set the iron-horse at work from Fond du Lac Superior to the Great Bend of the Missouri, a short day's journey of seven hundred miles; and again, from the navigable waters of the Missouri to the head of navigation on the Columbia, a half day's journey of four hundred and fifty miles; and, presto, the commerce of the world wheels into line, and America becomes the mistress of the sea, and ruler among the nations.

How degenerate has become the statesmanship of the age! The sagacity of a Jefferson saw, in the sources of the Missouri, in connection with the Oregon, now Columbia, a line of commerce as valuable as that which led into the Gulf of Mexico. It was not alone to control the outlet of the Father of Waters that he desired Louisiana, for no sooner had he made the acquisition than he demanded and obtained of Congress authority to explore the sources of the Missouri and the Columbia, and the mountain passes, and sent out those intrepid men, Lewis and Clarke, the results of whose labors have been published to the world. But Jefferson went out of power, and war came on; and that which was a cynosure to Jefferson was lost sight of by those who followed him.

Benton, though living, is of the generation of statesmen passed away. His public life laps into that of Jefferson, and, with qualities not second to him, he too takes up this grand national idea. It is so directly to my purpose that I will quote what he said in a speech in the Senate, in 1846:

"This is the North American road to India, all ready now for use, except the short link from the Columbia to the Great Falls of the Missouri. This little intervention of dry ground between Canton and New York will prove to be no obstacle either in summer or in winter—all the rest now ready, made ready by nature. Arrived at the Great Falls of the Missouri, the East India merchant may look back and say, 'My voyage is finished!' He may look forward and say, 'A thousand markets lie before me, of all which I may take my choice.' A downward navigation of two thousand five hundred miles carries him to St. Louis, the center of the valley of the Mississippi, and the focus to which converge all the steamboats, now thousands, hereafter to be myriads, from all the extended circumference of that vast valley. Long before he reaches St. Louis, he is running the double line of American towns and villages, seated on either bank of the river.

"The Missouri river is said to be the best steamboat river upon the face of the earth—the longest, retaining its water best at all seasons, and periodically flooded at a known day—free from rocks, and, for nearly two thousand miles, free from sunken trees; for it is on approaching the heavy forest lands of the lower Missouri that this obstruction occurs; all above is clear of this danger. The river is large from the falls down; the mountain streams, almost innumerable, pouring down such ample contributions. Coal lines its banks; fertile land abounds. A continuous voyage, without shifting an ounce of his cargo, will carry him from the Great Falls to Pittsburg; a single transshipment, and three days will take him to the Atlantic coast—omnipotent steam flying him from Canton to Philadelphia in the marvelous space of some forty-odd days! I only mention one line and one city as a sample of the rest. What is said of Pittsburg and Philadelphia may be equally said of all the western river towns toward the heads of navigation, and of all the Atlantic, Gulf, or lake cities with which they communicate. Some sixty days, the usual run of a bill of exchange, will reach the most remote; so that a merchant may give a sixty-days' bill in his own country, after this route is in operation, and pay it at maturity with silks and teas which were in Canton on the day of its date.

"The North American road to India will be established by the people, if not by the Government. The rich commerce of the East will find a new route to the New World, followed by the wealth and power which has always attended it."

Thus spoke Benton, and much more to the purpose, in 1846. Since then, a faithless Administration has bartered away, for less than a mess of pottage, untold mineral, agricultural, and commercial wealth, just where our nation most needed it for the seat of future empire—Vancouver's Island and other territory, up to 54° 40'. Great Britain knew its value, and firmly insisted upon having it; and it is a shame to be compelled to say that our Government basely and trucklingly gave it away. The ripened judgment of the country is yet to be pronounced upon that act.

When Benton advocated the union of the Columbia and the Missouri, and thus the Atlantic and the Pacific, he did not urge, as I now do, the continuance of the route, so as directly to connect with the St. Lawrence, and thence by the Erie canal with New York. Nor was the country checkered over with its net work of railroads, numbering thirty thousand miles, as it now is. For a moment consider only the four hundred and fifty miles of road completed west of Fort Union, and what advantages are instantly presented? Iowa, what are your advantages? Do you border upon the Missouri? Missouri, what are your advantages? Have you a St. Louis, the central emporium of the Union, with railroads and rivers radiating all ways? Kentucky and Tennessee, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Mississippi, have you any interest in this route? With east and west railroads across Iowa, how is it with you, Minnesota and Wisconsin, Illinois and Michigan, can you avail yourselves of this thoroughfare, even without the connection with Lake Superior? New England and New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey, Indiana and Ohio, will you be benefited by it? Have you railroads pointing westward? Have you interests in common with this line?

How is it with Canada? Can she reach the Pacific this way—will she contribute capital to help to build this great national road, that must and will be international in the very uses and purposes of it. Yes, yes; the North, the enterprise, the industry, the capital of the North are here represented on this floor. All are interested in this northern route, and it will be built. It will be but an extension of the northern line of commerce and system of railroads already stretching half way across the continent. Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New York, Canada, Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa, have railroad interests which would be strengthened and enriched by building this northern road to an extent to warrant their building it. The commercial interests of the great lakes will contribute to it. Let Congress but provide the law and it matters not whether we appropriate land or money, the road will be built. It is inevitable—a part of our manifest destiny—unless this Administration shall give away the mouth of the Columbia, and what little there is remaining to us of Puget Sound, in order to prevent its being built.

I should not omit to mention an objection which the late Secretary of War urged to this northern route, that "its proximity to a powerful foreign sovereignty is a serious objection to it as a military road." This objection, Mr. Chairman, comes from a soldier who has borne himself chivalrously in the service of his country. This objection must have had something to do with, must have been conducive to, the purchasing of Arizona, that we might have a military road near a weak sovereignty. That such an objection should come from a brave soldier, is indeed surprising. Where would this line of reasoning lead us to? It would keep us from building fortifications upon our frontiers, and at our sea-ports, lest they might be destroyed, or our soldiers exposed to danger. In time of war, it would make us retire our Army to the interior for safety. It would make our citizens timid about investing and settling at Detroit and Buffalo, Sackett's Harbor and Champlain.

Mr. Chairman, it is time to have done with such objections. The best protection to a nation is not in stone and earth; but, sir, in human breast-works. Start this railroad from the head of Lake Superior westward, and push it forward with all possible speed, and then it will not be able to keep pace with the advancing tide of population; and before your road can be completed, there will be ample force in live settlers all the way across our northern frontier, to protect it and the country against that powerful foreign sovereignty. The character of the country even invites this population without railroads; and within the last twelve years it has advanced westward from Lake Michigan, six hundred and fifty miles, pouring into Wisconsin and Minnesota alone, in that time, at the rate of seventy thousand per annum. Iowa has also received her fifty thousand annually. Compare this with the increase of population on the southern line of road, and what results do you arrive at? Not all the golden inducements of California can make her keep pace with the latitude of 47° north. Texas, New Mexico, and California combined, do not equal Wisconsin and Minnesota in population. Nor is the population of Oregon and Washington inconsiderable; besides, the great body of the population of California is in its north half. The interests of the people of California and Oregon are identical; and those hoary sentinels, the Coast and Sierra Nevada Mountains, now, and for ages to come, direct the traveler to and from the valley of the Columbia. The Sacramento, too, by its golden current, lights him the same way.

But, Mr. Chairman, the statesmen of these degenerate days would make us disregard the self-evident laws and bountiful provisions of nature; would make us stultify ourselves to the laws of climate, and ignore the laws of emigration; they would have us neglect natural to construct artificial channels for commerce; they would have us avoid direct and choose indirect lines; they would have us abandon fertility and be content with sterility; to gratify the caprice of the few they would have us sacrifice the interests of the many; and while they would have us doubly fortify ourselves against the weak, would have us totally neglect defenses against the strong. All this is in harmonious keeping with that policy of the ruling dynasty which gives away, without a struggle, at the North, while it deluges the land in blood, and oft and again depletes the Treasury, to make acquisitions at the South.

Sir, it is a most unnatural forcing of things, to undertake to build this southern road. It is bent out of the way of everybody who wants to use it. It is projected through a country where there is no capital to build it; and where, from the lethargic and prostrating influences of the climate, at least three men will be required to perform one man's labor; and when built, from the character of the country, there can be no local business for it, and, for through business, will not accommodate or be convenient to one tenth of those who need the road for use. The climate will be too hot for the transportation of American products; and for international purposes, it will increase the distance from Japan to New York over five hundred miles. In short, it will possess no advantage over the present isthmus route. Fulton is now called its eastern terminus.

Fulton is on the Red river, about ninety miles above the "Raft." How are you to get to or from Fulton eastward? I suppose you intend to build to Memphis, about two hundred and fifty miles. Thence you have a road, I believe, to Charleston, South Carolina. This, then, is to be the great southern road—Charleston, in reality, its Atlantic terminus—Charleston, already designated as the place of holding the next national Democratic convention; South Carolina, the sleepless advocate of State rights; always opposed to internal improvements, steadily and uniformly, in both branches of Congress, voting against all such unconstitutional doctrines; her commercial emporium, Charleston, is to be the happy recipient of the benefits of the great Pacific railroad, herself voting against it, upon constitutional grounds, and northern votes conferring upon her this douceur. Yet, so far as we can glean from the Government reports, that Department of it having the Pacific railroad especially in charge, strongly favors this Charleston route.

The political isothermal of the present and past Administration has been extremely southern; and they have seemed disinclined to depart from it, even in railroad matters. This suggests to me that the real isothermal line of the northern route should not be overlooked. We will take the winter line, from the crossing of the divide of the Rocky Mountains at Mullen's Pass—eastward it extends, through Fort Kearny, Fort Leavenworth, Springfield, Toledo, Dunkirk, and Long Island Sound. The summer line extends through Fort Union, Milwaukee, Detroit, Buffalo, Albany, and Long Island Sound. The line indicating the mean, or average temperature, extends through Fort Des Moines, Chicago, Monroe, Elmira, Poughkeepsie, and Nantucket. These facts being established by scientific observations, let it not be said that the northern road is impracticable on account of the cold.

Thomas Jefferson is the originator of the project of a commercial communication, within our own territory, between the Atlantic and Pacific; but railroads being of modern invention, did not enter into his plan. As early as 1834, Dr. Hartwell Carver, of western New York, spoke and wrote in advocacy of a railroad to the Pacific. After him Asa Whitney became an earnest advocate of the project—devoted to it years of untiring labor; petitioned Congress; went abroad for information; explored routes—but favoring only one, and that the northern, now advocated by me. Committee after committee, in both branches of Congress, reported favorably. A majority of the States of the Union memorialized Congress in behalf of this northern route; and among those States are to be found Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, Maryland, and Kentucky. Then, sir, we had no settlements upon the Pacific.

Mr. WARREN. Will the gentleman yield the floor, that I may ask him a question?

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I will do so.

Mr. WARREN. No proposition has been or will be submitted to this Congress, in which I feel a more abiding interest, than in this Pacific railroad. I desire, now, to ask the gentleman whether, in the event that the committee raised shall report that the southern route is the most practicable and the cheapest, he would support it as he would support the northern route which he recommends himself? Now, I am prepared to support any Pacific road, believing it to be a great national project; and I ask the gentleman whether he will be equally liberal, and support any route that may be reported by the committee, in the event that it be determined by that committee, and proven to be the cheapest and most practicable?

Mr. BILLINGHURST. No, sir; because it is the most inconvenient, and will accommodate the least number of the inhabitants of the country. It is not in the line of commercial intercourse, and will not accommodate the commercial interests of the nation. One other reason why I would not support a southern route is, that for several years past a great deal of talk has been heard in the Union of a southern confederacy; and I will not, while that talk is rife, cast a vote for a railroad for the benefit of that confederacy, until we know whether it is to be held in the Union or not.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would also ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether he would go for any other railroad, or the particular one to which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WARREN] refers, if that route should be found to be the shortest from the great center of population—say the city of New York?

Mr. BILLINGHURST. No; not for that reason. I believe that, as statesmen, we should avail ourselves of the natural channels of commerce. The St. Lawrence has already furnished a channel half way across the continent. Following that line directly west we strike the Missouri, and have three hundred and seventy miles of direct water communication; and, skipping over a few hundred miles, you have two hundred and sixty miles of communication on the Columbia. And I put it to the gentleman whether railroads can come into competition with water communications, as commercial instrumentalities?

Mr. WARREN. I regret very much that northern gentlemen do not understand the state of politics that exists in the South. There is no such thing as a southern confederacy there. We in the South are national men. I want the gentleman from Wisconsin to understand that I did not mean to defeat his project, but simply to test the fact whether he was of the same school of politics as southern men are. Southern gentlemen are prepared to vote for a Pacific railroad (those who vote for it at all) regardless of the point as to what particular State or town it passes through. And I asked the gentleman whether, in the event of the committee already raised reporting that the southern route is the nearest and most practicable, and the cheapest route, he would vote for it, telling him at the same time that I, as a southern man, born in the South, reared in the South, attached to southern institutions and southern principles, would vote for any Pacific railroad to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific, and to bring the different portions of this great nation directly into a community of feeling. I would do it on this principle: because it would enable northern and southern gentlemen to understand each other, and to understand the peculiar institutions of their different sections, in order that southern and northern gentlemen may appreciate each other and each other's principles. I take this occasion to say that we have no such thing as a southern confederacy, and we would hate to be driven to such an extremity.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Who has the floor, the gentleman from Wisconsin, or the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman from Wisconsin yielded to me the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas was upon the floor in order.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I will answer the gentleman. I do not hold him responsible for these disunion sentiments. Not at all; but when he denies that he is in favor of a southern confederacy, I say that southern gentlemen may not be in favor of a southern confederacy exactly, because I think they intend to have a consolidated Government. There is no confederacy about it, but a regal empire or something resembling it.

When interrupted, I was speaking of the Pacific settlements ten years ago. Now we have a population of six hundred thousand there, and very valuable inhabitants they are, too; for they chiefly supply our coffers. What was then a question of expediency has now become a matter of duty. If we hesitate longer we shall be derelict in that which would confer more wealth and power upon our nation than all else within the power of Congress.

Mr. GARTRELL obtained the floor; but yielded to Mr. WARREN, who moved that the committee rise.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I appeal to the committee to report this bill to the House. There are other bills on which gentlemen can make their speeches as well as this. This is only the regular appropriation bill for invalid pensions. With the leave of the gentleman from Georgia, I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. LETCHER. Gentlemen will have plenty of chances next week upon other bills.

Mr. WARREN. I insist on my motion that the committee rise.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 52.

Mr. PHILLIPS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CRAIG, of North Carolina, and DEAN were appointed.

The motion was agreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 66, noes 58.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WINSLOW reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the invalid pension appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

VACANCIES ON COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER announced Mr. PURVIANCE as a member of the special committee on the alleged disbursements of Lawrence, Stone & Co., for the purpose of influencing legislation, in place of Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, excused; and Mr. DAWES as a member of the special committee on the conduct and accounts of the late Doorkeeper, in place of Mr. PURVIANCE, excused.

CLOSING DEBATE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the invalid pension appropriation bill be closed on Tuesday next, at one o'clock; and on that motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call for tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PARROTT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce, for reference merely, a bill to ascertain and adjust the titles to certain lands in Kansas Territory.

Mr. PHELPS. The previous question has been demanded, I believe, and a motion to adjourn is pending. I have no objection to the gentleman from Kansas introducing his bill; but I desire to have the question of closing debate on this little pension bill settled.

The House was then divided upon the question of adjournment—68 voting in the affirmative, and 77 in the negative.

Mr. BUFFINTON demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUFFINTON. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BENNETT. I object.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 66, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingham, Bingham, Blair, Bocock, Brayton, Bryan, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Curtis, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Howard, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Lovejoy, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Robbins, Royce, Judson W. Sherman, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Ellihu B. Washburne, and Israel Washburn—66.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Avery, Barksdale, Bowie, Buffinton, Burnett, John B. Clark, Clay, Cockeill, Coming, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Curry, Darnell, Davis of Iowa, Dowdell, Faulkner, Florence, Foster, Garrett, Giddings, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Hatch, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Ready, Reagan, Roberts, Ruffin, Russell, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Warren, White, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—69.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. Has the previous question upon the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania been seconded?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. STANTON. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call for tellers.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HUGHES. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn until Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The House has already fixed a day, and the motion is not in order.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at three o'clock and forty minutes) adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 25, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. T. N. HASKELL.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement showing the number of troops stationed in Kansas at the end of each quarter since the 1st day of January, 1855; which, on motion of Mr. STUART, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. STUART presented a petition of commissioned officers of the Rifle Company of Michigan militia, called into the service of the United States, to aid in maintaining the neutrality laws during the disturbances on the Canadian frontier in 1838, praying to be allowed extra pay and bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of ship-owners, merchants, and others at Detroit, Michigan, praying for the enactment of a law to regulate and establish a system of lights to be carried by sailing vessels navigating the lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FOOT presented the petition of Sarah W. Halsey, widow of Silas Halsey, an officer of the Army who died of disease contracted in the service, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Elijah R. Huff and others, praying for the establishment of a mail route between St. Joseph's, Missouri, and Marysville, in Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ALLEN presented seven petitions of officers of the Rhode Island militia, praying that further provisions by law be made for equipping the militia of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms, or lots of limited size, and granted, free of cost, to actual settlers not possessed of other lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KENNEDY presented the petition of Major J. L. Donaldson, assistant quartermaster in the Army, praying to be released from liability for public money stolen from his possession; which, with his papers on file, were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also presented the petition of Thomas Phoenix, Jr., praying to be allowed extra compensation for the time he was employed as a paymaster's clerk in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. IVERSON. I present a memorial of officers of the Army, praying that the regiments of cavalry may be consolidated into one corps. I am opposed to the prayer of the memorial; but, out of respect to the officers, I present it; and move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRODERICK presented a memorial of merchants and importers of San Francisco, California, praying that the duties paid by them on goods destroyed by fire in 1850 and 1851 may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the petition of Eunice Brown, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS. I present a memorial from a number of officers of the United States Army, praying for an amalgamation of all the mounted corps under one name, as cavalry or dragoons. They also annex to their memorial something like a petition for redress of grievances, setting forth the fact that junior officers have been promoted over seniors in new regiments. I think this is a complaint without a grievance, unless the Executive is limited in the filling of original appointments to the rule of seniority. However, I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BIGLER. I am requested to present a memorial, and I beg leave to say a few words in explanation of its contents. It comes from certain of our fellow citizens who, during the years 1835 and 1856, emigrated to the county of Richardson, in the Territory of Nebraska, and now find themselves involved in serious difficulty there, growing out of the execution of an Indian treaty. In 1830 a treaty was made at Prairie du Chien, with the Iowas, Sacs and Foxes, and certain other tribes of Indians, to the effect that a strip of land on the Missouri river, lying between the Great and Little Omaha, extending back a distance of ten miles, should be reserved for the half-breeds of those several tribes. In 1837 a survey was made, agreeably to the terms of the treaty, and in 1855 the lands adjacent were surveyed by the United States Government and sectioned. These memorialists, as they had a right to do under the laws of Congress, took possession of those lands, filed their certificates, declaring their intention to preempt as prescribed by law. During the last season, it was discovered by the Indians or their agents, that there was an error in the original survey, and that instead of extending back ten miles on the Great Omaha, the survey extended but eight miles. They insisted on a resurvey, which the Department very properly granted. That resurvey has been made, and returned to the office; the effect of which is, that it extends two miles over the public lands now occupied by citizens who went from the States of Kentucky, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and elsewhere. They went there in good faith; they have made valuable improvements. The Government is bound to execute this treaty with the Indians; but by carrying it out, these citizens who have gone there will be deprived of their homes and property. For redress of these grievances, they memorialize Congress. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That the memorial of J. E. Martin, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Thomas R. Carman, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Charles G. Ridgely, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Sarah Smith Stafford, daughter of James B. Stafford, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

OBITUARY ADDRESSES.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing cause to be printed and bound in pamphlet form, in such manner as may seem to them appropriate, for the use of the Senate, ten thousand copies of the addresses made by the members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives, on the occasion of the death of the Hon. James Bell, late Senator from New Hampshire; the Hon. A. P. Butler, late Senator from South Carolina; and the Hon. Thomas J. Rusk, late Senator from Texas.

FOLDING ROOM.

Mr. BRIGHT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be authorized to appoint one of the present messengers an assistant to the superintendent of the folding room, at the same salary as the assistant of the postmaster of the Senate, to commence the 1st of July, 1857.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STUART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 84) to provide for the better regulation of "night signals" on board "sail vessels" navigating the northwestern lakes and their tributaries, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SLIDELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 12) to authorize the Secretary of War to modify a contract made with Righter & Crain for the removal of obstructions in Southwest Pass and Pass à l'Outre, at the mouth of the Mississippi river; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Commerce, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of providing for the appointment of steamboat inspectors in the collection district of Florida, and to whom were referred a petition of citizens of Franklin county, Florida, and the presentment of the grand jury of the United States district court for the northern district of Florida on the subject, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That for reasons expressed in a communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, it is inexpedient to make the appointments suggested in the resolution.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 23) for the relief of Robert Dickson, of the Kentucky volunteers, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of Agatha O'Brien, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia; which was agreed to.

ARREST OF WILLIAM WALKER.

Mr. MASON. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a message of the President, with reference to the arrest of William Walker, and others who were with him, on the coast of Nicaragua, to make a report. It was the wish of the committee that I should ask the Senate to allow me to avail myself of a parliamentary privilege, as I understand, to read the report when it is presented; and it would seem the more proper, as the subject is now pending before the Senate in debate. It will not occupy more than fifteen or twenty minutes. I should think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It becomes the duty of the Chair to announce that the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. MASON. I ask to be allowed to read the report. It will not occupy more than fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. That is about all the time we have for the consideration of the special order. At one o'clock the special order terminates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order now to be taken up does not terminate at one o'clock. By unanimous consent, the Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. MASON proceeded to read the report of the committee, which concludes with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That no further provisions of law are necessary to confer authority on the President to cause arrests and seizures to be made on the high seas, for offenses committed against the act entitled, "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," approved April 20, 1818.

Resolved, That the place where William Walker and his followers were arrested, being without the jurisdiction of the United States, their arrest was without warrant of law. But, in view of the circumstances attending it, and its results, in taking away from the territory of a State in amity with the United States, American citizens who were there with hostile intent, it may not call for further censure than as it might hereafter be drawn into precedent, if suffered to pass without remark.

The committee also report a bill (S. No. 85) supplementary to the act entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," approved April 20, 1818; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I desire, as one member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to state that, so far as the report gives a construction to the neutrality laws different from the one which I felt it my duty to express the other day, I do not assent to it.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, as a member of the committee from whom, through its able and learned chairman, this report emanates, I desire to express here, as I did in the committee, my concurrence in the general principles and propositions which it lays down. I concur in the accuracy of its recital of the facts and circumstances attending Walker's expedition, and the means used by our executive government in the attempt to prevent the carrying on of that expedition. I concur with the committee in regarding that enterprise as an unlawful one, begun and set on foot within the jurisdiction of the United States, to be carried on against a foreign, but friendly Power. I also concur with the committee in their report that the President of the United States has ample power, under the eighth section of the law of 1818, to arrest the carrying on of such expeditions upon the high seas. With the committee, I regard this not only as an unlawful expedition on the part of Walker, but in violation of the laws of the United States, and in defiance of the authority of this Government. I further concur with the report of the committee in commending the expressed determination of the President of the United States, by the use of all the power and means at his command, to execute and enforce the neutrality laws of our country, and to suppress these hostile expeditions against foreign and friendly Powers.

But in so far, however, as this report, either in express terms, or by implication, imputes blame to Commodore Paulding, in taking Walker and his men from the barren sand bar called Punta Arenas, within the jurisdiction and territory of Nicaragua, I am constrained to express my entire dissent from it. In so far as, in terms, or by implication, it condemns, or censures, or disapproves the conduct of that officer in that regard, I am unable to give it my concurrence. In so far as it asserts or assumes that Commodore Paulding has violated the neutrality of Nicaragua, or infringed any rule or principle of international law, or any law upon your statute-books, or transcended the instructions of his Government, either in their letter or in their spirit rightly, and fairly construed, I am unable to yield it my assent.

But, sir, I have not risen to enter into the discussion of this subject at the present time. If the debate on this question is to proceed to-day, I am aware that the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] is entitled to the floor. I have, however, felt it due to myself, whilst concurring, as I do, in most of the positions of this report, to enter my dissent to it so far forth as it disapproves of the conduct of Commodore Paulding in arresting Walker and his men within the jurisdiction and territory of Nicaragua. Under the circumstances under which it was done, I yield to that act my approval and commendation.

Mr. MASON. I do not recollect the day, but I think there is a day on which the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to give a medal to Commodore Paulding was fixed as the special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was the special order for to-day at one o'clock, but is superseded by the other special order set apart for half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. MASON. I move that the resolutions and bill accompanying the report be made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, and be printed, together with the report.

Mr. GWIN. I hope no special order will be made. There are several now. Will this special order supersede those which have been made heretofore for a day next week; for instance, Monday next?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. GWIN. If it does, I shall object to it, because an important subject has been made the special order for next Monday. If all these special orders shall supersede that, or come up before it, I shall certainly object.

Mr. MASON. As I understand the rules of the Senate, when the hour for a special order arrives, the Chair will call up that order according to its precedence; but, by a vote of the Senate, they can postpone one special order for the purpose of taking up another. They will not interfere with each other in that way, but they are subject to be controlled by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. The Pacific railroad bill was made the special order for the first Monday of February, which is next Monday, and I wish to know whether, by making other special orders for days which intervene between that and this period, they will set that aside when it comes up? If not, I have not a word to say.

Mr. PEARCE. I rise to say that I concur with the motion just made by the Senator from Virginia. I believe that, at the adjournment of the Senate on Thursday, I was entitled to the floor on the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin, but I would prefer to submit the remarks which I desire to make on that subject to the Senate upon the consideration of the resolutions and report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which open up rather a larger field.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Maryland that he would not now be entitled to the floor. That resolution was made the special order for to-day at one o'clock; but subsequently the Senate made another special order for half past twelve o'clock, which the Chair called at that hour, but by unanimous consent of the Senate it was postponed to hear the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HARLAN. Last Wednesday the motion of the Senator from Illinois to refer a portion of the President's message to the Committee on Territories was made the special order for to-day at one o'clock, and I supposed that no member of the Senate intended to set that aside by having other special orders made for half past twelve o'clock. I therefore ask the Senate that that subject may now be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a motion now before the body.

Mr. MASON. My motion is to print the report, bill, and resolutions, and make them the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock. I do not mean to press it on the Senate, but it has already been prefaced by the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator will separate his motion in regard to printing, and then move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow at one o'clock, and let it come up at that period, but not as a special order.

Mr. MASON. I have no desire to press it at all. I ask that it be made the special order for—

Mr. GWIN. To-morrow week.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. MASON. I will say Tuesday, the 9th of February.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the special order is taken up, I ask leave to submit a paper and have it printed. At the last meeting of the Senate, the Committee on the Judiciary made a report in regard to the contested seats of the Senators from Indiana. I ask leave to present the views of the minority of the committee, that they may lie on the table and be printed, and taken up when that subject comes before the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. I have not the slightest objection to the presentation or printing of the views of the minority of the committee, which is always by courtesy admitted, and I cannot object to it. I will state further that this is a question of privilege, and I had intended to call it up to-day, without reference to special orders. The majority of the committee have reported a resolution not affecting at all the right to the seats, but simply giving authority to take testimony, and it is important that it should be disposed of. In the event of the honorable Senator from Vermont, who I understand is not now in his seat, who intends to oppose the resolution of the committee, being well enough to return to the Senate to-morrow, I shall call this resolution up at the first opportunity, as a question of privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has heard no objection to receiving the report of the minority. It is moved that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 207) to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Ansel Wilkinson," approved August 13, 1856; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 27) to detach Selma, in the State of Alabama, from the collection district of New Orleans, and make it a port of delivery, within the collection district of Mobile; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for the special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to state the special order. The business before the Senate is the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask, as a question of order, whether the one o'clock special order is not the one before the Senate? The motion to refer a portion of the President's message was made the special order for one o'clock to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was made the special order for one o'clock; but at a subsequent period the bill which has been announced was made the special order for half past twelve o'clock, and superseded the other.

Mr. SEWARD. I beg leave to submit to the consideration of the President that the special order for half past twelve o'clock could not have been intended to supersede an order for one o'clock; and that when the hour of one o'clock arrives, the order assigned for that hour is the proper subject for consideration. So it strikes me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is obliged to construe the rule differently, and understands that the practice of the Senate has been different.

Mr. DAVIS. When the hour for the consideration of the special order at half past twelve o'clock arrived, the Senator from New York will recollect that it was allowed to go over, under the supposition that we should afterwards have that amount of time. I think, if no opposition is made to the bill, and I certainly do not wish to make a speech on it, it will not require ten minutes to pass it. I hope the bill will be taken up. It is a measure of public importance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair called up the special order at half past twelve o'clock, and all subsequent proceedings were by unanimous consent. That special order is still before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. As this is a pretty important matter, if the Chair will indulge me, I wish to state what I understand the practice of the Senate to have been, as far as I recollect. Where there has been a special order for one o'clock, and then somebody else moves a special order in the morning hour, it is always understood that when the morning hour is past, and one o'clock arrives, the general special order is taken up. If the bill of the Senator from Mississippi had been taken up at half past twelve o'clock, and its consideration had been proceeded with until one o'clock, then it would have been the duty of the Chair to call up the special order fixed for one o'clock, on which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] has the floor, it being the oldest and first assigned and having priority. This instead of being an order to supersede was made in subserviency to the first order, just for the morning hour, and if it had been taken up it would only have had thirty minutes' consideration. My impression is, and I think the Chair will find by asking the older members of the Senate, that that has been the uniform practice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair founds his opinion on the following rule:

"Special orders shall not lose their position on account of intervening adjournments; nor shall they lose their relative position on the Calendar, except by vote of the Senate, until finally disposed of."

This order took its position on the Calendar, according to the hour directed by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. The Chair will indulge me a moment. I think that relates to the dates when the special orders were made, and not to the time for which they were made. The special order made on the first day of the month is not to be superseded by another special order, made on the second or third, and they take precedence according to the dates on which they are made, and not the time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will take pleasure in conforming his decision to the expressed wish of the Senate; but was informed that the decision he has given was the practice of the Senate, and was correct.

Mr. STUART. I hope there will not be an attempt to settle this question upon this bill. I intend, with the leave of the Senate, to bring it up when special orders of equal importance stand before the Senate. This decision grows out of what I believe to be an erroneous opinion delivered by a former Presiding Officer of the Senate; but at this time I do not desire to take it up, because there is too much importance attached to the bill of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill. I will make no further statement than may be required by the Senate to explain it. I do not see why it should consume thirty minutes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no sort of objection, on my own part, to the Senator's proceeding to make an explanation and giving his views with reference to the bill. I know nothing as to the question which is introduced here; for I am not familiar with the rule. I will say to him, however, that he can hardly expect to finish it in the short time he has suggested, because, it being a proposition for an increase of the Army, under existing circumstances he must naturally expect that it will be looked into somewhat before the proposition is acceded to. I will say to him that the bill meets me with entire surprise; for I did not know it was presented until I saw it lying on my table this morning. It has just been printed, and we have nothing as yet, that I have seen, from the Secretary of War, except the message; and I have had no opportunity to look at the accompanying documents, or form any sort of conclusion as to the necessity for the proposed increase. I hope, therefore, that even if the Senator goes on to make his statement, he will hardly insist that the consideration of the subject should be at once followed up, because I am confident that gentlemen on this side of the Chamber must be unprepared to do what they design to do; and that is to look into this matter before it is finally acted upon.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator has given me a very strong reason for insisting on the bill. It is quite apparent that the Senate are not going to pay any attention to it until it is taken up. The Senator treats it as a bill to be referred. It is on its third reading. The bill has been heretofore in the Senate; it has been reported after a long investigation by the committee, and if the Senator has not read the documents, it is to be feared he is not going to read them in time for this measure. He is certainly aware that both the President and Secretary of War have urged an increase of the Army. They have urged it in a manner different from that which the committee report, but the necessities for an increase remain the same. The mode in which this bill is presented I hoped would have secured an early passage, and would have saved us from that delay which I anticipated from a different proposition. It is so simple in itself; it is so necessary for the public interests of the country, that I not only hope for the most prompt consideration, but that the bill will pass with the least possible opposition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not prepared to say whether, after a proper discussion and investigation, I shall be opposed to the bill or not. In reply, however, to what the honorable Senator has said, he will allow me to say that the bill has been printed and laid upon our tables for the first time this morning.

Mr. DAVIS. The bill has been read through.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly it has been read; but, like other matters of the kind, the reading passed without much examination.

Mr. HALE. It was read by its title.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has been read by its title alone; and I see it was only reported on the 21st of January. How long has it been before us? It is very easy to say that it is a simple proposition. Any proposition to raise an amount of troops, or to increase the amount of troops, is simple, in one sense of the word; but it involves a great many very important considerations. It is not enough to reply that it is very easy for the Senate to understand that this proposes to increase the Army, and that the President has recommended it, and that the Secretary of War has recommended it. I am not disposed to increase the Army simply for the reason that the President and Secretary of War think it necessary. Recent events—at any rate, the conduct of the expedition which has been organized by the Secretary of War, has not been such, I think, as to impress the country with a very great idea of his military skill, or lead them to attach a very great degree of importance to his recommendations. What I desire is an opportunity to see the documents accompanying the message in relation to the increase of the Army, and in relation to the employment of the Army, and to become acquainted with the facts myself; in order that I may form some kind of an opinion of my own on the facts and circumstances, whether it is advisable to increase the Army or not. At present, I am not satisfied. I say frankly that my impressions are decidedly against it, and if called upon to vote now, I should vote against it, from anything I have heard, and anything I know.

All I desire is simply time to look into the matter. It is not enough to say that this subject has been before Congress for a certain period of time. The necessary information has not been before Congress, unless we are bound to take the word of the executive government for any proposition to increase the Army, and the word of the honorable chairman of the committee, and on his opinion I should rely as much as on the opinion of any man, but that is not enough for me in acting on a matter of this sort. It is not so much the amount of the proposed increase, as the question whether there should be any increase at all under existing circumstances. I am not prepared to discuss the question, as I said before, but I wish that the matter may not be hurried.

Mr. DAVIS. It is a question of time. I certainly would not press a single Senator to the consideration of a subject unless there was some public reason for it. But if we are to delay the increase until so late a period that the men cannot be recruited and put in the field for the necessary service, it would be as well not to grant it at all. If the increase is not to be granted at all, it is due to the Executive government that they should know it at the earliest moment, and make their disposition accordingly. I say it is a question of time, and that the time is brief enough between this and the period at which these troops ought to take the field. If we are going to increase the Army at all, we ought to grant the increase now.

I will not follow the Senator in his criticism on the Secretary of War. I am not sufficiently informed of the manner in which the details of the expedition to which he referred have been carried out, to enable me to do so; but if there has been a want of capacity, a want of intelligence, or a want of energy, it only adds another to the arguments why this increase should be made. We know, the country knows, that a small body of troops are now lying in the mountains, that they are there bound by winter, and that there they must remain till spring; and we have every reason to believe that extensive combinations among the Indians of the whole mountain country exist at this moment, instigated by evil white persons; and if we are to sit here and discuss this question until the period is past when it is possible to recruit the force, then I say it is far better that we should give notice at this moment, in order that the Executive may understand with what means he will have to act that he may concentrate what forces he has, and dispose of them so as to be used to the best advantage.

Moreover, I would say, as the question of the expedition to Utah has been touched, that I hold that the country is indebted to the Administration for having selected the man who is at the head of the expedition; who, as a soldier, has not his superior in the Army or out of it; and whose judgment, whose art, whose knowledge is equal to this or any other emergency; a man of such decision, such resolution that his country's honor can never be tarnished in his hands; a man of such calmness, such kindness, that a deluded people can never suffer by harshness from him.

The present proposition, after being elaborated long and industriously, was reduced to a form which really seems to me to leave very little room for opposition, unless it be that we have soldiers enough or too many, or unless it be that soldiers shall not be required to perform this service. If that be the opposition, it can be made as well without studying the documents as with. In the voluminous reports which attended the President's message, and the report of the Secretary of War and of the Department of the Interior, the necessities growing out of the exposed condition of our frontier inhabitants will show that additional force is necessary. Now is the time when it must be raised, if it is to operate in the season of the next spring and summer, and it is therefore that I press it.

I will here say that the consideration, the discussion in the committee, has been prolonged for the purpose of giving to it the most perfect form when it should be reported to the Senate. It would have been easier for me to draw the bill if I chose to adopt the recommendations of the Executive Departments in the beginning. It would then have been before the Senate for that long period during which it has been under consideration and minute examination in the Committee on Military Affairs. I hope that other members of the committee, whose opinion may perhaps weigh more heavily with the Senate, will state the facts in relation to the investigation and the reasons which now exist for the prompt consideration of this measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a question of order pending before the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to call the attention of the Senate back to that point of order. It is very seldom that I speak in this House on a question of time or order; because I have always found that more time is wasted in settling the right time, and more disorder created by endeavoring to bring the Senate to considerations of questions of order than is saved by such efforts.

Now, the simple question is, whether the order which was made at an early day, assigning the subject of the President's message in regard to Kansas for consideration at one o'clock to-day, has been superseded by the order which has been obtained by the honorable Senator from Mississippi? All my recollections of the Senate, and they relate now to a considerable period, supply me with this fact—that when a great public subject, a subject of great public importance, was brought before the Senate, and a debate instituted upon it, it was customary for the Senate to allow the postponement of that subject to a day certain, and to assign the floor to any honorable member who might be so fortunate as to obtain it on a claim made, and that when that day comes, whether the Senator represented one side of the question or the other, whether he rose on one side of the Chamber or the other, the courtesy of the Senate always assigned to him the floor which he asked, unless upon considerations of public importance with regard to the public business addressed to the Senate, the Senate by a deliberate vote overruled that question; which I have never known done, I think, without the consent of the Senator entitled to the floor.

Now what is the case here? On Thursday last, after this order had been made for one o'clock to-day, the honorable Senator from Mississippi asked for a special order for half past twelve o'clock to-day; and when that hour arrived the order was called, and he remained in his seat and waived insisting on his order, because it would interrupt a very interesting report by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator mistakes the fact.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, I beg to be corrected, then.

Mr. DAVIS. I gave way on a statement that after the reading of the report, this bill would come up.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not know, if you please, Mr. President, who it was that could have pledged the Senate that this special order should come up and supersede the other special order. Certainly the honorable Senator who was entitled to the floor at one o'clock, did not compromise himself in that way, nor was any such arrangement known or understood on this side of the Chamber.

I see no particular necessity for our being embarrassed by this matter, so as to reverse our former practice. I have no such feelings of opposition towards the policy which is set forth in this bill, as to be prepared to oppose it. On the other hand, all my dispositions incline me to favor and support it, but at the same time I must desire to know whether there is any understanding among us about the rights and privileges we have of obtaining the floor on the day assigned to us. If it be the pleasure of the Senate to take up the question and decide on considerations of public policy that it is so important to consider this bill, that they will postpone the special order, I can have nothing to say; but until that is done, I beg leave to submit for the consideration of the Senate, and ask their advice to the Chair, whether we are insisting on anything that is unreasonable, or anything which has not heretofore always been considered in accordance with the practice of the Senate. If it be so, then I beg leave to ask the honorable Senator from Mississippi to name an early day or an early hour for the consideration of his bill, and he shall have my hearty support and cooperation in giving it precedence.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no wish to press any measure of mine to a point of discourtesy to any one. I certainly considered, when I was told to allow the reading of that report to progress, and that at the close of it this measure would come up, that there was no opposition to taking it up. I think that discourtesy, to use no other term, is rather towards myself, in the matter of this bill, than from me towards anybody else. I have no objection to a postponement, if such be the pleasure of the Senate. If the discussion of that mighty question, whether so much of the President's message as relates to the Territories shall be referred to the Committee on Territories, be more important than to provide for an increase of our Army at the present time, let it go on; but I venture to say there is not a member of the Senate who is prepared now, or at any future time, to vote against the reference of that portion of the President's message to the Committee on Territories. Then, what is the value of the discussion? If the Senate, for that or any other reason, desire to consider the other question, be it so.

Mr. SEWARD. Postpone the bill until tomorrow, at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS. I really do not know that I shall have any better assurance of fairer treatment tomorrow than to-day. The Senator says it was not understood on his side of the Chamber. It was understood on no side; but it was given from the Chair, which everybody was bound to hear. The Senate can do as it pleases about the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the question of order, and submit it to the sense of the Senate. The special order now under consideration was set for half past twelve o'clock. At a preceding period, another special order had been set for one o'clock, and would have come up to-day regularly at one o'clock, but for the special order assigned for half past twelve o'clock. When the hour of half past twelve o'clock arrived, the Chair called up the special order. By the unanimous consent of the Senate, expressed through the Chair, it was allowed to go over informally for a few minutes, until the report from the Committee on Foreign Relations could be read; but it was in order before the Senate, and those proceedings were by unanimous consent. The Chair called it up as soon as that particular business had been disposed of. In the mean time, the hour of one o'clock had arrived; and the question is made whether the order assigned for one o'clock, having been assigned by the Senate on a day previous to that upon which it assigned this order for half past twelve o'clock, whether, when the hour of one o'clock arrives, the first assigned order must not come up. The Chair will take the sense of the Senate after the reading of two rules:

"When the hour shall have arrived for the consideration of a special order, it shall be the duty of the Chair to take up such special order, and the Senate shall proceed to consider it, unless it be postponed by a vote of the Senate."

"When two or more subjects shall have been specially assigned for consideration, they shall take precedence according to the order of time at which they were severally assigned, and such order shall at no time be lost or changed, except by the direction of the Senate."

"Special orders shall not lose their position on account of intervening adjournments; nor shall they lose their relative position on the Calendar except by vote of the Senate until finally disposed of."

Mr. SEWARD. It gives precedence to the first in date.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will simply add that the Calendar, as presented to him, gave the special order set for half past twelve o'clock before the other, and he acted as he was told by the Secretary had been the practice of the Senate. As an original question he does not feel sure that his decision is correct.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think it is wholly unnecessary to submit the question to the Senate unless somebody appeals from the decision of the Chair. I believe there is no difficulty about the rule or practice of the Senate. The decision of the Chair is perfectly correct, and I think according to uniform usage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, on the suggestions of Senators, will, unless the suggestions be withdrawn, take the sense of the Senate on the question of order.

Mr. IVERSON. This question of order is not without its embarrassments. I will state what is my remembrance of the action of the Senate during the last Congress. When two orders were set for the same day, one for half past twelve o'clock and one for one o'clock, if the Senate took up the order for half past twelve o'clock, and proceeded to its consideration, when the hour of one arrived, which was set for the other order, if the Senate had not got through the first order, the second order was superseded. The Senate goes on with the discussion and action upon the first order until it gets through, and then the next order at one o'clock comes up in its place. If the half past twelve order be not taken up at the time it is set, and the half hour expires and it runs beyond the time for which the other order was set, then as between the two, the one first set chronologically is the one in order, and then the order for half past twelve o'clock is superseded by the one for one o'clock.

I would, however, suggest whether we may not get rid of this difficulty by a very simple process; and that is, if the Senator from Mississippi will waive his right to go on with the half past twelve o'clock order, and take up the one o'clock order and postpone it to three o'clock, with a view of taking up the military bill. That will give an hour and a half for its consideration, and then at three o'clock the Senator from Iowa can take up the order on which he has the floor, and he can have the whole afternoon to explain his views. I think that will accommodate all parties. I move, with a view to get rid of the difficulty, that we take up the special order assigned for one o'clock, being a motion to refer a portion of the President's message to the Committee on Territories, with a view to postpone it to half past two or three o'clock as may be desired.

Mr. WILSON. When the bill which came from the committee of which I am a member, was presented, it was moved by the chairman that it be assigned for this day at one o'clock. It was then suggested that a special assignment had been made, on which the Senator from Iowa had the floor. The chairman of the committee then moved that it be specially assigned for this day at half past twelve o'clock, not, I suppose, for the purpose of taking the floor from the Senator from Iowa, but for the purpose of giving the half hour of the morning to the consideration of this bill. This has been waived again to-day, and it is now before us. I do not think there is any great necessity for haste in the consideration of this bill. It has been in the committee for weeks; it has been discussed in all forms; it has been reported; and it has been laid upon the tables of Senators to-day in a printed form. Senators tell us they want time for consideration. They ought to have that time. Now, I would suggest, and will make a motion to carry out the suggestion, that this bill be postponed until to-morrow, and that the hour of half past twelve o'clock be assigned for its consideration. The Senator from Iowa can then proceed with his speech to-day, and the bill will go over until to-morrow, and Senators will have time to examine the measure. I move to postpone the bill until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair considers this special order before the Senate; and, therefore, the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is in order, and the motion of the Senator from Georgia is not in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I will accept the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the motion made by Mr. DOUGLAS, to refer so much of the President's message as relates to Kansas to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, this preliminary discussion places me in an attitude which is unpleasant to myself. It was fully understood, as I supposed, that the Senator from Mississippi modified his motion to make his bill a special order at one o'clock, so as to read half past twelve o'clock to-day, that the previous special order might not be interfered with. This discussion, however, with the disposition of the Senator to insist on the prior special order, coupled with his sarcastic remark that this subject, "this mighty theme of the reference of the President's message to the Committee on Territories, was not so all-important as to require the attention of the Senate," presents it in another light. I am perfectly willing that his position, with his own explanation thus made, shall go to the country. I enter on this discussion on my responsibility as a Senator, equal, in point of rights, with the Senator from Mississippi, or any other Senator on this floor; being responsible to the people of Iowa alone for the manner of its use. I felt no special interest in the question of order raised; for I might have submitted the remarks I intend to make on the bill proposed by the honorable Senator from Mississippi with as much pertinency as are a large majority of speeches made in the Senate to the actual question pending; for I suppose that the passage of the bill which he has presented is desired to enable the President of the United States to enforce the Lecompton constitution. The increase of the Army can be called for at this time, as it seems to me, for no other reason; and I may have occasion to elaborate this view before I take my seat.

I listened with some degree of interest, Mr. President, to the discussion of this part of the President's message on the other side of this Chamber, growing out of the fact principally of the harmonious profession of attachment, by both factions of the Democracy, to the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. The President and the southern Democracy, as here represented, profess to be guided by the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill—that is, "non-intervention by Congress in the affairs of the Territories;" and the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] professes equal devotion to this principle—that the people of the Territories, like the States, "shall be left perfectly free to manage their own affairs in their own way." And yet, sir, in practice, there is a vast difference in the result of the measures proposed.

To follow the advice of the President and those who agree with him, will secure the organization of a slave State on free soil; to adopt the policy proposed by the Senator from Illinois, will exclude slavery from this domain as effectually as if Congress should reenact "that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall ever exist north of 36° 30' north latitude;" for it is now known to us all that an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to slavery; and there is no practical difference between excluding it directly, by an act of Congress, and excluding it indirectly, by a submission of the question to the people, when we all know, when everybody knows, when the whole world knows, that they will abolish it without ceremony.

The President and his supporters do not deny the right of the people of the Territory to require the submission of their constitution to the electors at the polls for approval or disapproval, or its propriety as a general rule of policy. But they deny its expediency in the present instance, or its possibility, without an infraction of the doctrine of "non-intervention by Congress." They claim that, to require the people to vote for or against their fundamental law, by an act of Congress, would be as distasteful to freemen as would be a denial of that right.

And if we admit the truth of the President's assumptions, his conclusions are irresistible. If his premises are true, his position is impregnable; for it is true, sir, that, if the people of a State or Territory are left perfectly free to give expression to their own will in their own way, they may act in mass convention as a vast deliberative body—may originate and mature measures of public policy, or they may act through their representatives. In this country the latter is the usual practice.

The people of the States, in the modification of their constitutions, and of the Territories in originating them, have uniformly acted through delegates. Sometimes they have reserved the right of approval or disapproval at the polls of the whole instrument when completed. Sometimes, however, they have clothed their delegates with plenary powers. In the latter cases, the conventions have frequently submitted either the whole instrument, or some of its specific features, about which they may have been in doubt in regard to the popular will.

In the enactment of statute laws, the people act through their representatives in the State Legislatures, and also in the Congress of the United States.

In the interpretation and application of the laws, the people act through their representatives on the tribunals of justice. Writs issued by these courts are, I believe, always in the name and by the authority "of the people," "of the State," or "of the Commonwealth," or of the United States, and not in the name or by the authority of the court itself.

In the administration of the Government—in the enforcement of the laws, State and national, the people act through their representatives, in the presidential office, and through the Governors of the States; all of whom are supposed to be guided by the will of the people, expressed in legal form.

The entire frame-work of our Government rests on the idea of obedience to the will of the people, expressed through their representatives, in all of its departments—legislative, executive and judicial. And the practical departures are very few.

What the people do in mass meeting is usually informal and illegal. Large bodies of men, entertaining similar views, convene for the purpose of adopting resolutions and confirming a platform, the whole purport of which is to indorse the official conduct of their legal representatives, or to instruct them in relation to their future official duty.

It is true also, Mr. President, that many of the most respectable courts of the country have decided that when the Legislature of a State, on its own responsibility, submits a law to a vote of the people for their approval or disapproval, such submission must either be treated as a surplage, or regarded as vitiating the whole act, even though it may have been approved by the people at the polls; and this, on the ground that legislative discretion does not rest in the people at the polls, but that it rests in their representatives in legislative bodies legally convened. Hence, if the people of Kansas did in fact authorize the creation of a constitution for a State government, through a convention of delegates, chosen by them for that purpose, without requiring its submission for approval at the polls, they are bound by its action. The act of the convention is their act. "Facit per alium, facit per se." A convention thus appointed possesses plenary powers. And to suppose the instrument to be void, when thus made, because the convention failed to do that which the people had not required it to do, is an absurdity that would not be maintained by a lawyer of respectability for a single moment.

This leads us to an examination of the supposed act of the people of Kansas authorizing and creating this convention. And this is necessarily preceded by the question of legal authority on the part of the people of the Territory, unauthorized by Congress, to make a constitution for a State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union. I do not inquire by what instrumentality it should be made; whether by the whole people in mass meeting; whether by all the electors in one body, or by delegates of the people appointed by the electors. Have the people the power to make a constitution by any instrumentality whatever? This depends, I humbly conceive, on the truth or fallacy of the doctrines of squatter sovereignty itself; for, if you have conferred on the people the right to make all needful laws on all rightful subjects of legislation, or if this right exists uncreated in the people of a Territory, then they may enact a law authorizing the creation of a constitution for a State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union as a member of this Confederacy.

Here is the first point of divergence that I have noticed between the two factions of the Democratic party as represented on this floor, and as they now exist in the country at large. The honorable Senator from Illinois claims, very singularly as it seems to me, that the people of Kansas had no power, no legal right, to initiate measures preparatory to the formation of a State government. That I may do him no injustice, I desire to read from his speech delivered on this floor. In that speech he said:

"A Territorial Legislature possesses whatever power its organic act gives it, and no more. The organic act of Arkansas provided that the legislative power should be vested in the Territorial Legislature, the same as the organic act of Kansas provides that the legislative power and authority shall be vested in the Legislature. But what is the extent of that legislative power? It is to legislate for that Territory under the organic act, and in obedience to it."

He supports this opinion by reference to the official opinion of Attorney General Butler, in which he said, in relation to a similar act, contemplated on the part of the people of Arkansas:

"It is not in the power of the General Assembly of Arkansas to pass any law for the purpose of electing members to form a constitution and State government, or to do any other act, directly or indirectly, to create such new government. Every such law, even though it were approved by the Governor of the Territory, would be null and void. If passed by them, notwithstanding his veto, by a vote of two thirds of each branch, it would still be equally void."

"For the reasons above stated, I am, therefore, of opinion that the inhabitants of that Territory have not at present, and that they cannot acquire otherwise than by an act of Congress, the right to form such a government."

These quotations doubtless express the opinion of the Attorney General. But they should be coupled with the fact that the people of Arkansas had no power, under their organic act, to pass laws and give them validity, unless approved by Congress; that their legislative enactments were void from the beginning, without this approval. The honorable Senator from Illinois is at fault when he says the people of Arkansas possessed the same power under their organic act claimed for the people of Kansas under the Kansas-Nebraska bill. This will appear by reference to these laws. I read from the Statutes at Large, third volume, page 494:

"Whenever the General Assembly shall be organized, all the legislative power of the Territory shall be vested in, and be exercised by, the said General Assembly."

"That so much of the act of Congress of the 4th June, 1812, entitled, 'An act providing for the government of the Territory of Missouri,' as relates to the organization of a General Assembly therein, prescribes the powers and privileges thereof, the mode of election, and period of service of the members thereof, and defines the qualifications and privileges of the electors and elected, shall be in full force and operation in the Arkansas Territory," &c.

Then, what were the powers and privileges and restrictions conferred on the people of the Territory of Missouri; which act was, by this provision, extended to the Territory of Arkansas? I read from the second volume of the Statutes at Large, page 744:

"The General Assembly shall have power to make laws in all cases, both civil and criminal, for the good government of the people of the said Territory, not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States."

"All bills passed by a majority in the House of Representatives, and by a majority in the Legislative Council, shall be referred to the Governor for his assent; but no bill or legislative act whatever shall be of any force without his approbation."

Here, then, is a marked distinction between the provision of the organic act for the people of Arkansas and that of the people of Kansas. But this organic law for Missouri proceeds to provide that—

"So much of an act entitled 'An act further providing for the government of the Territory of Louisiana,' approved on the 3d day of March, 1805, and so much of an act entitled 'An act for erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof,' approved the 25th of March, 1804, as is repugnant to this act, shall, from and after the first Monday in December next, be repealed."

Those not repugnant, are, it would seem, continued in force.

In the act for the government of Louisiana, approved March 3d, 1805, I find this provision:

"The Governor shall publish throughout the said Territory all the laws which may be made as aforesaid, and shall from time to time report the same to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress; which, if disapproved by Congress, shall thenceforth cease and be of no effect."

I have not examined the provisions of the organic acts of all the Territories which have hitherto been admitted into the Union as States, and those that now exist, with reference to this discussion; but two years since, I did make a thorough examination of all of them; and except the Kansas-Nebraska act, I found no law for the organization of a single Territory, which did not directly or indirectly reserve in Congress the right of approval or disapproval of all laws passed by the Territorial Legislatures. At the date of the opinion of Attorney General Butler, complete and full power, it was conceded by all, existed in Congress to govern all our Territories. Congress had claimed and exercised it from the beginning. It was so held by commentators on the Constitution. It was so held uniformly by the courts, State and national. The generic principle of plenary power in Congress to control territorial legislation, would include the specific legislation under discussion. With this power conceded in Congress to revise territorial laws, the people of the Territories could not, in the opinion of the Attorney General, by any act of theirs, originate laws that would substitute a State government for a territorial form of government. But I beg the Senate to remember that in the year 1854, an act of Congress was passed with strangely differing features from previous acts of Congress, for the government of the Territories.

In this act of 1854, in a declaratory clause, it is claimed to be its "true intent and meaning not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject," not to a law of Congress, but "subject only to the Constitution of the United States." If, in that phraseology, "to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," is embraced the power to make laws, constitutional and statute, then the policy of this Government in relation to its Territories was changed; its original policy was subverted; and I deny the honorable Senator from Illinois the privilege of going back one day behind the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act for precedents to sustain his present position. The old territorial policy of this Government was then set aside; a new hobby was created; if you please, a new Bucephalus was harnessed; and as he now vaults over his own shadow, the Senator from Illinois, like another Alexander, may be able to mount and rein his head toward the sun. We shall see.

But, sir, if Congress did, in that act, confer on the people of the Territory of Kansas power to make all needful laws on every fit subject of legislation, the power to pass the laws referred to in this part of the President's message was included. The only question that will arise, then, for us to settle, is, whether this be a fit subject for legislation.

That this is a rightful subject of legislation none can deny; for it has been the subject of legislation by Congress "time out of mind." And the ultimate formation of a State government is always contemplated when a Territory is organized. A territorial government is intended to be but a temporary organization of the people within its limits, and is expected to give place to a more perfect and desirable form of government as soon as the people are found to be in a condition to assume its responsibilities, and to bear its burdens. This transition from a territorial to a State government must be effected either by revolution or under the forms of law. If, then, revolution and anarchy are not preferable to a peaceful and legal transition, this is a proper subject of legislation. And if the people of a Territory may legislate on all fit subjects of legislation, they may on this.

But conceding the question of legal power, did the people of Kansas exercise it in the case under discussion? Did they, by their own volition, authorize the creation of the Lecompton constitution.

This, I believe, is conceded by both factions of the Democracy. It is assumed by the President in his message, and not denied by the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Douglas.] It is said that the people of Kansas, through their Territorial Legislature, enacted a law, authorizing the election of delegates to frame a constitution; that the election was held, and the convention organized, under the provisions of this act; and that the Lecompton constitution is the fruit of their deliberations. This law has been recognized by the authorities in Kansas, and by the President of the United States. It is claimed to be the legal expression of the will of the people; and, it must be confessed, possesses every element of legal vitality common to any and all of the territorial laws of Kansas; and, as such, received the hearty indorsement of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Douglas,] in his Springfield speech.

But did the people of Kansas, in the enactment of this territorial law, authorizing the election of delegates to frame a State constitution, or otherwise, reserve the right to ratify or reject it by a vote of electors at the polls?

Here is the principal point of divergence between the supporters of the President's views and those who oppose them on the other side of the Chamber. The first assume that plenary powers were conferred by the people of Kansas on their delegates, in the enactment of this territorial law; that the right to approve or reject the constitution to be framed was not reserved. And hence the people have agreed, in advance, to abide by the acts of their delegates. Here, however, the Senator from Illinois joins issue; and to his reasoning in support of his position I invite the attention of the Senate and the country.

He does not claim that this right of ratification is reserved by the people in the territorial law authorizing the election of delegates; but that the Kansas-Nebraska bill is susceptible of no other legitimate interpretation; that it provides in a declaratory clause "that it is the true intent and meaning of this act neither to legislate slavery into this Territory, nor to legislate it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way."

This regulation "of their own domestic institutions" is supposed to include the power to create a constitution and enact laws. How else are they to be regulated, if not by constitutional and legal provisions? But I humbly submit that it does not seem to me to require, necessarily, the submission of either to the approval of the electors at the polls. It does not say so in so many words. It does not say that "the people thereof are to be left perfectly free to regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way by a vote at the polls." Nor is such submission necessarily implied; for we have shown that, in a free exercise of their own will, the people may choose to act by representatives—may choose to clothe them with plenary powers. Nor is such a necessity consistent with the language used. The language used is, "but to leave the people perfectly free to regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way." Then they must be left free to choose the means by which this is to be done; and they may choose delegates, and clothe them with plenary powers for this purpose.

But, yielding that the interpretation of the Kansas-Nebraska act claimed by the Senator is the only fair one, it does not even tend to establish the conclusion sought. It would, on that hypothesis, be conclusive as to the will of Congress, and, if you choose, of the will of the people of the organized States, expressed in legal form by their representatives in Congress, but not of the people of a Territory outside of these States. The Kansas-Nebraska bill was enacted into a law on the supposition that the will of Congress might be different from the will of the people of the Territory—that it might be even in conflict with it, and in antagonism with their best interests; and hence the necessity of the Kansas bill to set them free—to emancipate them—to enable them to differ with Congress. Hence we are not to inquire what was the will of Congress as expressed on this or any other fit subject of legislation; but what did the people of Kansas decree? They put forth the creative act when they authorized the election of delegates. What was their decision?

But it is argued again that this power of final ratification must have been reserved by the people, because the President assumed that the constitution would be submitted, as is clearly set forth in his instructions to Governor Walker; because Governor Walker, in his inaugural address, and numerous speeches, pledged himself that it should be submitted; and because Mr. Calhoun, and others, during their candidacy for seats in this convention, were "pledged in writing" to exert their utmost influence to secure this result.

But this "inaugural address" of Governor Walker was not even an official paper. It was not required of him in the discharge of any official duty. It was simply a fugitive letter, written for the newspapers, and of no more validity than his stump speeches.

But clothe this letter, and these stump speeches, and this pledge "in writing" of General Calhoun, with all the pomp and circumstance of official acts, and they will not tend to sustain the conclusion. The President's instructions, the Governor's newspaper correspondence, and stump speeches, and Calhoun's pledges in writing, may be conclusive as to their purposes; but they do not even tend to prove that the people of Kansas had reserved the right to vote for and against the adoption of the Lecompton constitution. You must look for an expression of the will of the people in their own official acts. When impartially considered, these considerations prove the converse. Whence the necessity of promises and pledges to submit the constitution to a vote of the people, if the people had in fact reserved the right to ratify or reject it at the polls? Pledges to secure this for the people imply that the people had parted with it, or lost the power to exercise it, and that this right was to be created anew.

It is contended, however, that under all of these circumstances, the people of Kansas did expect and had a right to expect, that this instrument would be submitted to them for approval. But this is a mere assumption without the slightest support in facts as they really existed. The people did not expect the submission of the Lecompton constitution to a fair vote of the electors at the polls; and hence these pledges of the President, and of the Governor, and of Calhoun and his accomplices, to delude them into the recognition of its legality, by voting under the territorial law authorizing its formation. And the people had no right to expect its submission, these solemn pledges notwithstanding. For no previous pledges of this Government and its officials in Kansas to secure the free-State men in the enjoyment of their just rights, had ever been redeemed. To confide in the pledges of their officials, they had learned by sad experience, was to lean on a broken reed, by which they had been uniformly pierced; and the result has not disappointed their expectation.

But the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] in his able speech made in the Senate a few days since, argued, if I understood him correctly, that the Lecompton constitution should be repudiated by Congress, in consequence of the gross frauds perpetrated in the execution of the census and registry laws preceding the election of delegates, by which a fair expression of the will of the people at that election was defeated. That I may do him no injustice I quote from his speech, his quotation from Governor Walker's letter to the President of the United States:

"That convention had vital, not technical defects in the very substance of its organization under the territorial law, which could only be cured, in my judgment, as set forth in my inaugural and other addresses, by the submission of the constitution for ratification or rejection by the people.

"On reference to the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken and the voters registered; and when this was completed, the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. This result was superinduced by the fact that the Territorial Legislature appointed all the sheriffs and probate judges in all these counties, to whom was assigned the duty by law of making this census and registry. These officers were political partisans, dissenting from the views and opinions of the people of these counties, as proved by the election in October last. These officers, from want of funds, as they allege, neglected or refused to take any census or make any registry in these counties, and therefore they were entirely disfranchised, and could not and did not give a single vote at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention."

Again:

"Nor could it be said these counties acquiesced; for wherever they endeavored, by a subsequent census or registry of their own, to supply this defect, occasioned by the previous neglect of the territorial officers, the delegates thus chosen were rejected by the convention. I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four there was no census. In fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry, and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention, in any one of these counties. Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters of Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent. These nineteen counties in which there was no census constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory, and these fifteen counties in which there was no registry gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Lecompton constitution on the 7th of November last."

From this statement of the Governor, indorsed by the honorable Senator, it appears that in half of the counties no census was taken, and that, in the apportionment of delegates based on the census, the people of these counties were absolutely excluded from a representation, so that the legal right to vote would have been unavailing; that, in fifteen of these counties, the names of voters were not registered, and on that account the electors were incapable of voting; that this legal inability was placed beyond cavil by the unceremonious exclusion of delegates from seats in this convention elected, in a few of these proscribed districts, in the absence of a census and registry; that a majority of the electors in the Territory were thus deprived of the elective franchise; that this did not result from neglect or indifference on the part of the people, but from the culpable, not to say criminal, refusal of the officers of the Territory to carry out the provisions of the law; and, consequently, that this convention represented a minority only of the people.

And the Senator strongly intimates, what the whole country knows, and what I, in my place here, on my responsibility as a Senator, distinctly charge, that this criminal neglect was by design, and for the purpose of excluding a fair expression of the will of the people; and that the officers of this Government, including the President, with a full knowledge of all the facts, have openly participated in the consummation of this open and flagrant robbing of the people of their dearest rights as American citizens—the right to select their own rulers and to make their own laws; and that the acquiescence of the people has been coerced by the President by the use of Federal bayonets. To suppose the contrary would be to deny the President and his officers ordinary intelligence.

The question then arises, whether the people of that Territory can be robbed of their original, their necessary right in the Territory, under the Kansas-Nebraska bill, to give expression to their will in the election of their delegates by a fraudulent execution of the territorial laws; that which was known at the time to be fraudulent; and which facts were fully known and understood, it is believed, by the President of the United States, when he quartered troops around the room in which these delegates convened, for the purpose of protecting them from the very result so graphically indicated the other day by the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. BRODERICK,] when he said, that if the people of that Territory, being thus intentionally robbed of their rights as American citizens, had risen in their might and flogged these delegates from the Territory, he would have approved the act, and more, he would have applauded them had they maimed them and sent them away in disgrace.

I agree with the honorable Senator from Michigan, and those who act with him, (and there are millions that do in the country at large,) that this Lecompton constitution has not been framed in pursuance of a fair expression of the will of the people; that it is the result of open and palpable robbery and physical coercion that never could have been successfully carried out unaided by this Government. But do they conclude that, on this account, the Lecompton constitution is void? If so, what do they say of the whole body of the Kansas laws?—are they void, or are they valid?

Nothing has transpired in connection with the creation of this Lecompton constitution that more than equals the enormities perpetrated at the first territorial elections. Do you tell me that at the election of delegates to this convention, the majority of the electors were unblushingly robbed of the legal power to vote? I reply that, at the election of the first Territorial Legislature, the legal voters were driven from the polls by intimidation and violence, whenever the success of this legal robbery required it; that a thousand armed strangers surrounded and held the polls at Lawrence alone; and it is now claimed that every precinct, save one, was similarly violated. Do you tell me that this convention has been preserved from violence and dispersion by an outraged people only by the troops of the Federal Government? I reply that the Territorial Legislature was maintained in power by the same means. Do you tell me that this constitution contains provisions repugnant to the will of the people? I reply that the laws of the Territorial Legislature were not only repugnant to the will of the people, but denounced by the present Secretary of State, then a Senator on this floor, and other distinguished Senators, as a disgrace to the age in which we live. Do you tell me that the provisions of this constitution can never be enforced among an unwilling people, only at the cost of violence and bloodshed? I reply that the whole body of the Kansas laws have been enforced at this fearful cost from the beginning up to the present hour. The people of Kansas have been compelled to submit to laws which they never made, and to officers whom they never elected. This grinding tyranny has been open, continuous, unmitigated, and unblushing, from the commencement to the present. The Lecompton outrage is no more flagrant than those by which it was preceded. The last crop of fruit is no more bitter than the first. If the latter must be treated as void ab initio, in consequence of these terrible political wrongs, why not the first? If the Lecompton constitution may be set aside on this account, why not the whole body of the Kansas laws?

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] need not repeat his former apology for their continuation, made when he was in doubt as to the violence connected with their origin. He need not tell the country "that, under these laws, contracts had been made, marriages contracted and solemnized, births registered, and estates distributed;" that he would not vitiate all these by the repeal of these laws, and thus produce anarchy and confusion with legal adultery and bastardy; for, when uninfluenced by the heat of debate, and free from party zeal, he will not pretend for a moment that contracts made under a valid law can be vitiated by its repeal; and if these laws were like the Lecompton constitution, void from the beginning, the sooner they are swept from the statute-books the better; for in that case no legal right could accrue under them. Hence I entreat Senators not to spend their precious time in clipping the leaves of this upus which is poisoning the whole atmosphere with its malaria; but to heave it out by the roots, and cast it body and branches into the furnace; for the Lecompton constitution cannot be repudiated on any principle not equally applicable to the entire Kansas code. If Congress can intervene now, it could and ought to have intervened then; and thus return to the doctrine of the fathers of the Republic—that it is the duty of Congress, as the representative of the whole country, to guard and protect, by legal enactments, the rights of the people of the United States residing in the Territories.

I agree with the Senator from Illinois and the northern Democracy, that this constitution should be repudiated by Congress; but I regret that this is not asked on the true ground—the constitutional duty of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the Territories; because it places the northern Democracy in an attitude of humiliation. The whole burden of their complaint against the President and his southern supporters, is the refusal to submit the Lecompton constitution to a vote of the people. Had this been done, we are told that the Democracy, North and South, would have been a unit. And the President is admonished, in threatening language, that if the harmony of the party is to be destroyed by a refusal to carry out his own instructions and the pledges of the leaders of the party, let the responsibility be on his own head.

But what is the extent of the boon attempted to be wrested from the unwilling hand of the President, for the people of Kansas, by the northern Democracy? A negative right only! The right to withhold their assent from constitutions and laws! The naked right of denial! At the polls the people can do nothing more. They cannot there deliberate, modify, and mature measures of policy.

It is not a bold and manly contest like that of the Commons of England with the Crown for constitutional liberty; but it is a contest with the President and his supporters for the power to veto laws enacted by usurpers and tyrants. By their arguments we are carried back thousands of years in the history of free Governments, to the period when the plebeian orders were engaged in a similar contest with those of senatorial rank, in imperial Rome. In that contest the plebeians did indeed achieve a great triumph when they acquired the right, in the person of their tribunes, to sit at the feet of Senators, and write "veto" on Roman laws. This was certainly one step towards their emancipation. But does this, in the opinion of the northern Democracy, fill the whole measure of the liberty of American freemen? to choose between the law proposed, and no law? to decide between the constitution submitted and no constitution? I had supposed that in this country the people possessed the right, in the persons of their representatives, to march boldly into the "Senate Chamber" itself, and there take seats side by side with the Ciceros and Cæsars of that assembly; that they had the right not only to object to the passage of a bad law, but had the right boldly to step forward and make their own laws. Yet the whole northern Democracy, led by the honorable Senator from Illinois, the honorable Senator from Michigan, and others, stand here begging the President and Congress to allow the people of Kansas to veto a constitution dictated to her—not the right by their legally constituted delegates, fairly elected, to make a constitution.

Here, then, the Democracy and the Republicans differ. If you have clothed the people of Kansas with power to make all proper laws on all needful subjects of legislation, I for one claim that they shall have the right to make them—not a naked right to veto laws dictated by another body; that they shall not be reduced to the naked and narrow privilege of accepting a constitution proposed by dictation; of accepting laws proposed by an illegal body; of accepting officers nominated by those without the power to nominate. I claim for them all the rights of American citizens, which include the right both to make their laws and to elect their rulers.

But even this pitiful privilege of opposing a law after it had been dictated for their acceptance is denied the people of Kansas on this floor, and is denied them in the President's message; he, as we must all believe, having a full knowledge of all the facts, to which I have attempted to direct the attention of the Senate. They are to be denied that privilege, as I shall now claim, because it comes in direct conflict with the real meaning and original intent of the Kansas bill; that true meaning and intent being, when correctly understood, to compel the people of Kansas, by strategy or by force, to submit to the organization of a slave State; and to that particular feature of the case I ask leave to direct the attention of the Senate and country.

That it was the original design of the southern Democracy to organize a slave State in the Territory of Kansas is clear to my mind, from the facts to which I shall now allude. The first is the organization of two territorial governments by the same act of Congress, and that in the absence of a population requiring it. For it was stated only a few days since, by the honorable gentleman from Illinois, in his great speech on this subject, that at the time of the passage of this bill there were not one hundred American citizens within the limits of both the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas. Then I inquire whence the necessity for the organization of two territorial governments by the same act of Congress? This never had happened previously in the legislative history of this country. No Senator can point me to a precedent. These two governments within the same territory were organized at a time when, in the opinion of the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. Houston,] and the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Bell,] there was no necessity for one, with the enormous additional expense of about one hundred thousand dollars annually. These Territories are not separated from each other by a range of mountains, not by an impassable desert, not by a morass, not by a lake or by a river, not even by a range of hills. The division of these two Territories was first drawn by your astronomer on the heavens, by the position of the stars, and dropped down on the bosom of that beautiful prairie country. Why was this? Can it be explained on any other hypothesis than a design to favor the organization of a government adapted to the wishes of the people of one part of this Confederacy? This inference is strengthened by the position of that line, south of a projection of the northern line of the State of Missouri, rendering it improbable, as it was then believed, that emigrants would find their way south of that line. This inference is strengthened also by the language of a letter which I ask the Secretary to read, addressed by the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] to the editor of The South.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

"At the time the law passed organizing the territorial government, there were few with whom I conversed who did not believe that the future State would take its place with those recognizing and cherishing the condition of African slavery. There was at that time certainly every reason to believe why this should be so, and none why it should not. The State of Missouri, bordering its eastern frontier, was a slaveholding State, holding at that time nearly a hundred thousand slaves, and these were chiefly held in border counties.

"The State of Arkansas, adjacent to the Territory on the south, was likewise a slaveholding State. The soil and climate of Kansas were well adapted to those valuable products, chiefly hemp and tobacco, which gave value to slave labor in Missouri. The proximity of its population, with the attractions of new, fertile, and cheap land, I believed would lead the slaveholders in Missouri to diffuse themselves speedily over Kansas, and the prohibitory line of 36° 30' being obliterated, there was no reason why they should not. I had no fear of fair competition in such appropriation of the new Territory, from any quarter. Unfair competition I did not look to.

"What may yet be the result as to the condition of Kansas, notwithstanding the extraordinary and unscrupulous efforts of northern Abolitionists to force a population there, I cannot undertake to say. Nor will I allude in this place to the new and unexpected aspect, now exhibited, of affairs in that Territory, with so much propriety reprehended in the columns of the South. Whatever may be the information of others, I certainly am not sufficiently informed of the existing state of things in Kansas, to form a clear opinion one way or the other; yet I will venture to say this much, that if African slavery be ultimately excluded from Kansas, it will be effected by the numerical force of organized majorities, operating against the usual laws which govern emigration; and will present a new and most instructive lesson to the southern States."

Mr. HARLAN. We learn, Mr. President, from the letter of the honorable Senator, what were the expectations of the Democratic party in the passage of this bill: that following the natural laws of emigration, the people of the free States would flow down from New England, New York, and the northwestern States, and settle in Nebraska, and that perchance that might become a free State; but that emigration from Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri, would flow through the latter State and up the Missouri river and occupy the Territory of Kansas, and thus control its political institutions. This explains the anomalous organization of two territorial governments with their peculiar boundaries at the same time in advance of a population requiring it. This also explains the subsequent acts of the President of the United States, and the inaction of Congress, when that Territory was invaded and overpowered by armed bands of men from the southern States. This explains the persistence of the President and his supporters in maintaining in power these usurpers—the sanction and enforcement of its pretended laws, and the arrest and punishment of many of its best and most patriotic citizens, under a charge of constructive treason.

This explains the appointment to office of the worst men that ever disgraced its soil; and the removal from office of its Governors, whenever they manifested a disposition to show the free-State men even-handed justice. Thus, the first Governor, and the second Governor, and the third Governor, fell by the executive guillotine! As soon as it was understood that Governor Walker, whose official conduct has been criticised here and in the executive mansion, had pledged himself to the people of that Territory that they should be permitted to enjoy the naked right of objecting to a constitution framed by a body of men whom he has since declared to have been illegally chosen, in violation of every principle of justice, for promising to exert the utmost of his influence to secure them at least a hearing at the polls, he was denounced by the Democracy of no less than two of the sovereign States of this Union. When it was known that he had rejected a copy of a Cincinnati Directory, returned as a poll-book from one of the precincts of Johnson county, it was well understood all over the country that his doom was sealed; because the rejection of that pretended return gave the free-State men a majority of the members of the Legislature. Can any one account for the mysterious removal of Secretary Stanton on any other ground? Senators here will not require me to state the reasons assigned on this floor for that removal. Removed for what? What has he done? Does the country at large know why he was removed? There was a reason; and it is known to Senators here, and none others.

Whenever the officials of that Territory have been disposed to show even-handed justice to the free-State men it has uniformly occasioned their official death, without one solitary exception. This can be accounted for only by the admission that it was the original design and intention to organize a slave State in that Territory; to secure it through what is denominated the natural laws of emigration, if it could be thus effected, and if not, then by strategy, and if not in this way, then by open force, to be used by the President in the appointments of the Army. Hence it is that the people of that Territory have been deprived of the right of voting, of exercising this mere negative power of refusing their assent to the Lecompton constitution. And, although the northern Democracy are now on their knees begging the privilege for their brethren in Kansas to vote for or against their fundamental laws, they are destined to experience the deep humiliation of a denial.

But this is not the end of the humiliation the northern Democracy are destined to suffer—and that right speedily—at the hand of their southern allies. They will be required to yield their interpretation of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, in its whole length and breadth.

The Democracy of the North claim it to be the true intent and meaning of the Kansas bill that the people of the Territories may either exclude or establish slavery at their own discretion. Not so with the Democracy of the South. They claim that the title to slave property must be placed on the same footing with the title to every other species of property. They claim it to have been thus decided by the judges of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case; in which Justice Daniels says:

"That the only private property which the Constitution has specifically recognized, and has imposed it as a direct obligation, both on the States and the Federal Government, to protect and enforce, is the property of the master in his slave; no other right of property is placed by the Constitution upon the same high grounds, nor shielded by a similar guarantee."

They do not admit that the people of the Territory can at any time vote slavery from its limits, either preceding or at the time of the formation of a State constitution. They claim that the title to slave property is like the title to all other property—that for this the same footing shall be yielded that free-State men claim for their property. Again, they claim that it is a violation of their constitutional right not to allow them an equal enjoyment of the public domain, purchased with the common blood and treasure of the nation. Grant the latter proposition, and slavery will be carried by it into Iowa as readily as into the Territories. By this assumption, you carry slavery into Illinois, you carry it into Minnesota, you carry it into Wisconsin, you take it into every State of this Union in which there is one foot of the public domain. The principle will hold good for an acre that will hold good for fifty million of acres. Hence if it is a violation of the constitutional rights of our southern brethren to deny them the privilege of going with their slaves into the Territories, it is an equal violation of their rights to exclude their property from the States in which may be found public domain which has been procured by the use of the common blood and treasure of the nation. If the reason is good for a Territory it is good for a State.

But again, concede the truth of the second proposition, and slave property may be carried into all the remaining States of the Union with impunity. What then is the nature of the title by which other private property is held?

In this country it is held to be an original right. It is not created by legislative enactments. It is a right that necessarily attaches to our humanity. It has its foundation, we are told by legal casuists, in an intrinsic faculty of the mind, sometimes denominated the possessory principle, or the universal desire to acquire and possess, which is manifested in childhood, in youth, in mature manhood, and old age; among the savage, the civilized, and the enlightened; among heathens and Christians; in every country and every age of the world. Its gratification is admitted, by the common sense of mankind, to be innocent and laudable. Hence the provision in the constitutions of all the States of this Union, and of the United States itself, for the protection of the inviolability of contracts, by which property is acquired and held, and against its subversion even for the public use without just compensation. These provisions are usually found in the bill of rights, and are simply declaratory. They do not assume to originate the right to the enjoyment of private property, but declare it as an original principle existing anterior to the enactment of laws and the establishment of constitutional forms of government. And it was an alleged violation of this right to private property that originated our struggle for independence; it was for its protection that the revolutionary war was fought. The phraseology of the times was, "that taxation and representation were inseparable;" that is, that private property should not be taken from the citizen without his consent.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 27, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 25.

If this be the admitted law of title to private property, then my title to my horse cannot be vitiated by the votes of my neighbors and countrymen. It cannot be changed by majorities. If their necessities are sufficient to justify the violence, on the principle of the right of self-preservation, they may take him by coercion; not by any right, but from necessity; and in that case, must return a just compensation.

This principle is clearly announced in the Le-compton constitution. It is declared in that instrument that—

“The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction; and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase, is the same, and is as inviolable, as the right of the owner of any property whatever.”

Is that assented to by statesmen from the southern States, or do they deny it? The argument is rung in our ears day by day, not only on the floor of Congress, but by the newspaper press throughout the South, that the title to slave property is like the title to all other property—that it is superior to constitutions and laws; because, as they would lead us to believe, it has its foundation in a constitutional principle—not in a constitutional enactment—because it has its foundation in a principle of the human mind itself.

Hence, if the right to property in slaves is placed on the same basis with the title to other property, it cannot be vitiated by votes or by legislation. In that case, slavery is not a question of mere indifference, to be determined by accidental majorities, like different systems of common schools, revenue laws, or banking. The right becomes original, elementary, and inviolable.

If this be true, as claimed by the southern Democracy, by what authority do you discriminate against it in the Kansas-Nebraska bill? Whence your authority for saying that it is the true intent of this bill neither to legislate slavery into the Territory, or to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people perfectly free to do this or that? You do not thus provide in relation to any other kind of property; then why do you assert the right of the people to confiscate or annihilate title to property in slaves, and thus destroy the equality of the States by discriminating against the property of the South? If the law of title to slave property, as claimed by southern statesmen, is correct, then the alleged principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill are wrong, and its discrimination unjust. If slavery is right, all the votes of all the squatter sovereigns on earth cannot make it wrong; and if wrong, they can never make it right.

This principle of the inviolability of private property has been recognized by the philosopher and the historian, as well as by your constitutional law-makers in every State of this Union, as well as by your revolutionary fathers in the commencement of the struggle for independence; and on which, in fact, the revolutionary war was fought to a successful conclusion. The right of private property attaches to man; it is part of his mind; it is involved in the idea of his personal manhood; it is recognized as a principle that may be protected by laws and constitutions, and which cannot be annihilated by either. If this be true, and the title to slave property must be placed on the same footing with the title to every other species of property, then that title becomes sacred and inviolable everywhere; not only in the slave States, but in the Territories, and in every State of this Union. Admit the truth of the premises and the conclusion is irresistible. If it be true that the title to private property cannot be violated without an act of tyranny practiced by the Government on its people, and that the title to slave property must be placed and maintained on the same basis, then it becomes inviolable, and can be maintained everywhere. This doctrine of the northern Democracy (for they seem to have acceded to it in this discussion) carries slavery with it everywhere with the approval of that party, north and south, and with the dissent only of the Republicans of this country, so far as they seem willing to give expression to an opinion. Here, then, the northern Democracy and the Republicans of this country differ as widely as the poles. The Republicans maintain that there can be no such thing as property held or enjoyed by a human being so as to vitiate or annihilate the rights of persons, and that the rights of property are valid only so far as they can be held and enjoyed consistently with the enjoyment of the rights of person. Hence they come to the conclusion that no vote, either by large or small communities, can make slavery right or wrong. If slavery is in itself wrong; if the title be a bad title, no number of votes can ever make it good, because its rightfulness or wrongfulness depends on an original principle, a constitutional right, which cannot be thus created or thus annihilated. It thus occupies the same basis side by side with the right of life. Who pretends that if one man sacrifices, without cause, the life of another, and all his neighbors, by their votes, approve the act, it will change the legal character of the murder? It only makes the participants parties to the crime. If they lend their assent in advance, they are particeps criminis in advance. If they lend their sanction after its commission, they are parties to the crime after the act. If slavery is right, no people have a right to annihilate it by a vote; if it is wrong, it cannot be made right by a vote. Such an assumption was turned into ridicule three thousand years ago by the Greek general, who, when told by his countrymen that they had just had an election, at which they had created ten generals, responded: “why did not the people at the same time vote their donkeys into horses, and enrich the State?” It involves an absurdity on its very face.

I may be inquired of here whether I admit that there can be such a thing as property in a slave, in a slave State? I answer that it may be asserted and maintained, but not by virtue of any constitutional right, or of any provision within the Constitution of the United States. The majority have the physical power to subject the minority to their control. The stronger race have the physical power to reduce the weaker to subjugation, and they may be organized and existing as a political sovereignty, so that no one outside of that organization can have a right to interfere, and no one within its limits have the power to make a successful resistance. Slavery exists in the slave States by virtue of the law of force, set up and maintained by majorities over minorities, by the dominant race over the weaker, in violation of the rights of person of the weaker race. I dissent, to some extent, from the casual statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. Hale,] that there is even a qualified right of property in man.

You may have a right to his labor. The labor of men may be bought and sold, hence it may be the rightful subject of property. I may rightfully buy the lawyer's learning, the physician's skill, the soldier's courage, the author's genius, the laborer's strength of muscle. I may buy even the wisdom of your statesmen, but it can be held and enjoyed only in harmony with the personal rights of each. Whatever I may buy and hold consistent with the enjoyment of personal rights on the part of the person who sells his labor, is the fit and legal subject of property, and nothing more. The Constitution nowhere recognizes property in man, but everywhere alludes to the African as a person. In the first article you will find the following provision:

“Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and including Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons.”

Here Africans are claimed to be persons. They are claimed even by the authority of the slaveholding States to be persons, for they have representation in the other branch of Congress, based alone on their character as persons. The next provision alluding to this subject is:

“No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up, on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.”

To whom the labor may be due; that is, to whom it may be owing; for whom, by a direct or implied contract, the individual has agreed to perform labor. This class of people are alluded to only as persons capable of making contracts for labor, and from whom labor may be due, from whom it may be owing on contract, either express or implied. The only other clause in the Constitution alluding to this class of people, is found in the ninth section of the same article:

“The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing, shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each.”—

What? Each individual piece of property? No; for “each person.” Then this class of people, thus held to service in the States tolerating slavery, is alluded to by the Constitution in each and every provision as persons, and not as property; and thus harmonizes completely and fully with the view of the case I have endeavored to present. If they are persons and not simply property, in such a sense as to violate their rights of persons, then to reduce them to the condition of property is a violation of a principle as old and as sacred as the right to property itself. A man's right to the use of himself, to the use of his own will and his own body and his own intellect and his own conscience and his own moral emotions, is as old as the right to property; and by the common consent to mankind even more sacred, because wherever these two come in necessary conflict, the right to property must give way before the right of person.

But the most alarming feature of this claim is that the law of force set up in some of the States of the Union, over which subject the Congress of the United States has no control, thus becomes the law of the land. Yes, if the people within but one State of the Union set up and maintain the law of the stronger, and under it claim the right to hold in subjugation the weaker race, or the minority, it is claimed here that that law of power, without foundation either in the principles or the language of the Constitution, instantly becomes the law of the whole country, or at least the law of the whole country outside of the organized States. If every State of the Union on that principle were to abolish slavery, with the exception of the small State of Florida alone, with a population, I believe, of less than two hundred thousand, and the strong race there should reduce their brethren of the weaker race to the condition of property, the very moment they overturned this constitutional principle within their limits, it is overturned wherever the flag of this Union floats; because the law of force, the law of power, by which Napoleon carries on his Government; the law of power, by which tyrants always rule; has been set up in a Republic and enforced by the strong hand of a majority—of the hand of the dominant race; though but one State of this Union, it thence necessarily becomes the law of the country, the law of the United States within all her territories, to the exclusion of the use of the very same law by the people of these respective localities. Why it is claimed now that the law of force cannot be used in Kansas against slavery. It can be set up in Kansas by being used and established in Florida, or in Maryland, or in Virginia, or in any State of this Union two thousand miles away; but the law of force within the limits of the Territory itself cannot be set up, it is claimed, without a violation of the principles of the Constitution. The law of force has become the law of the land; it attaches to all your soil; it goes everywhere. Wherever the stars and stripes of your flag are seen, there the law of force is seen, because some one State of this Union has set it up and maintains it.

It is to this humiliating position that the northern Democracy are now required to bow. They are not only required to stand on their knees and beg the President for the privilege of casting a negative vote in relation to the constitution of a new State, but they are required to submit to the law of force in all the Territories of this Union. And, indeed, if that law of power is set up and maintained in any one State of this Union, by an irresistible deduction, it may go into all the States; if it be property, as such, by virtue of constitutional principles anywhere, it is property everywhere, and may be maintained everywhere.

Here, then, is the difference between the freedom of the North and our brethren of the South. There may be a necessity pressing on them to continue the institutions under which they have lived to maintain their rule over the inferior race. That necessity, however, does not exist in Kansas; it does not exist in any of the Territories of this Union. If with them the law of force must be maintained in consequence of the law of necessity growing out of the circumstances by which they are surrounded, it ought not to be claimed by them that we are compelled to receive and sustain the same law when we are not pressed by the same necessity. There is no necessity for the freemen of the North to hold men, women, and children as property. They have been able, thus far, to manage all their domestic affairs without buying and selling their people. If that necessity exists within the limits of one of the States of this Union, let the people thereof be the judge; let them control its destiny; but where that necessity does not exist, we maintain that the law of force shall not be set up and maintained.

This brings me to the final point to which I shall allude in this discussion. I allude to the circumstances by which I am now surrounded. I know that the views I have expressed are distasteful to a majority of the Senate. Their expression is listened to with reluctance when arising out of questions fairly before the Senate, and made the special order for a particular hour. An adverse public opinion has been set up and maintained by our southern brethren—I will, though with respect, give utterance—at a tyranny of public opinion, so that not one of your officers here in this Chamber dare give utterance to an opinion in opposition to the dominant party, without a sacrifice of his station. Not one of them can do so in the other Chamber. To give utterance to his opinions, inborn in the soul and cultivated in the free States of the North, where he has been reared, would be the price of his position in either branch of Congress. The same is true in every one of the Executive Departments of the Government. All the clerks and all the heads of Departments, from the lowest to the Secretary of State himself, know that the price of giving utterance to the opinions and sentiments of the northern people, would be to sacrifice position.

This is not only true in Congress and the Executive Departments, but it is true in your public buildings; it is true in your public gardens; it is true in your aqueduct; it is true in your navy yard; it is true everywhere within the limits of this District. It is true, also, in relation to the learned professions. Not a lawyer in your city dare give utterance, although he entertain them as candidly and honestly as I do, to the opinions I have expressed, without the sacrifice of his professional standing. No physician dare do so. If a physician be called in to tie up the bleeding head of a wounded Senator, stricken down at his desk for a free utterance of his opinions, he must instantly become security in the criminal court for the assailant, in order to preserve his professional interest. It is true, also, in all the walks of life. Your shop-keepers, your merchants, your artisans, your mechanics, all know that their success in their calling here depends on their silence or their acquiescence in the views of the dominant party here. There is no place in this capital, outside of this Chamber and the other House, where a man can speak freely, and even here, at a terrible peril; even here, at the possible sacrifice of his health and his life. Why is this? Because all these men know that title to slave property will not bear analysis; will not bear the scrutiny of enlightened reason; because they all know that it will go down before the force of an enlightened investigation; because they are conscious of the truths to which I have given utterance: that title to slave property is set up and maintained, alone by virtue of the law of force, by virtue of the law of physical power, and can be maintained in no other way.

I had intended to refer to that feature of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States bearing on this subject, but I have already spoken longer than I intended. Thanking Senators here for their kindness in yielding me the attention I have enjoyed, I yield the floor.

Mr. POLK. I do not rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of making a speech on this subject, but for the purpose of making an explanation, which, I think, is due to the demands of truth and justice. The gentleman who has just addressed the Senate, and at least two or three gentlemen who have spoken on this question, have quoted passages from the letter of resignation of Governor Walker, in regard to the manner in which the Lecompton constitutional convention was selected, with the view of giving the impression that that convention was elected by a minority of the people of Kansas. In order to do this, they referred to that passage of the letter which speaks of nineteen counties out of thirty-four having not had an opportunity of sending delegates to the convention. One gentleman, the Senator from New Hampshire, said that statement had gone without challenge until the present time. Immediately after that letter was written, and as soon as it could travel to the West, there was a statement made of the facts in relation to these nineteen counties, and I have been surprised that that statement has not been copied into any paper, as far as I know, on the sea-board, except one. I think it has been in the Washington Union. I propose to read to the Senate that statement, so that the gentlemen who have spoken on this subject, if they have labored under a wrong impression, may be set right, and especially so that the country may be set right, so far as this statement will go. It was published in the Missouri Republican some weeks ago, and I have it in my hand. It was made under the signature of H. Clay Pate, and it has the concurrence of George W. McKown, ex-member of the Lecompton convention, Francis J. Marshall, Democratic candidate for Governor, William G. Matthias, Democratic candidate for Lieutenant Governor, J. H. Danforth, ex-member of the Lecompton convention, and Blake Little, ex-member of the Lecompton convention. Three of the members of that convention signed the statement, extracts of which I will proceed to read. It is dated the 4th of January, 1858.

"A law was passed taking for its basis the principles of the celebrated Toombs bill, which Senator Douglas, Governor Walker's ally, helped to make, and for which he voted. It provided for the registry of all the legal voters of the Territory by the sheriff of each county and his deputies. The probate judges were required to hold courts or sessions in convenient parts of the counties, and add to the lists returned by the sheriffs any names accidentally or wrongfully omitted. It also provided that, in cases where there was no probate judge, or he would not act, then the sheriff should, and if there was no officer at all to perform the duties specified, then the people might petition the Governor to appoint some one to carry out the law. The Governor says that 'fifteen counties' were entirely disfranchised 'and by no fault of their own.' Let us see: In Franklin county, one of the 'oldest organized,' Esquire Yocum, probate judge, was driven away by the Abolitionists, as was also Richard Coudling, sheriff of said county; each of these officials were threatened with death should they attempt to perform the duties conferred upon them by the registry law. Under the same circumstances, George Wilson, judge of probate for Anderson county, was prevented from executing the law. So with Allen county; Passmore Williams had to leave in order to save his life. J. J. Barker, probate judge of Breckinridge, being a free State man, refused to act. These four were the only organized counties not represented in the convention. Why not represented? It was the fault of those who now claim; and 'on their heads, and theirs alone, will rest the responsibility.'

"It is well to observe that, of the nineteen counties spoken of as not represented, the census was not taken in four, for the reasons stated; the other fifteen were, for civil purposes, attached to organized counties, as follows:

The Senators, especially from the new States, know what is meant by that. Very often a Legislature, as in my own State, will erect a county by statute, and attach it to another county for civil purposes until its population reaches the constitutional limit, that will enable it to come into the State as one of the regular organized counties of the State.

"Two, Richardson and Weller, to Shawnee.
"Three, Madison, Butler, and Wise, to Breckinridge.
"One, Coffee to Anderson.
"One, McGee to Bourbon.
"Six, Greenwood, Hunter, Dorn, Wilson, Woodson, and Gregory, to Allen.
"One, Brown to Doniphan.
"One, Davis to Riley.
"The counties of Brown, Washington, Clay, and Dickinson were organized at the last session of the Legislature; in the last named three, there were no inhabitants.

"The registry law was executed, and voters were registered in the following counties: Johnson, Lykins, Lynn, Bourbon, Douglas, Shawnee, Doniphan, Atchison, Leavenworth, Jefferson, Nemaha, Calhoun, Marshall, and Riley."

In this last category the Senators will recognize the names of the counties to which the others had been attached:

"It will be seen that the only counties really disfranchised were the four in which Abolitionists would permit no registry to be taken; and it is an established fact that many factious people refused to tell their names, and otherwise obstructed the officers—some giving fictitious appellations, and others threatening the lives and property of census takers.

"These officers were 'political partisans,' and they refused or neglected to take any census or make any registry, and, therefore, they were entirely disfranchised, and could not, and did not, give a single vote. Why did they not compel the officers to do their duty? It was possible; but if not, they could have petitioned the Governor for redress. If the people of those counties could and did not vote, it was a 'fault of their own,' and on 'their heads, and theirs alone, will rest the responsibility.'

"The blunders and misstatements of Governor Walker are apparent; it is clear that he might have been better informed than he seems to be, and more cautious than he really was in his letter of resignation.

I present these facts, as I suppose them to be, for the consideration of the Senate, as showing that much is taken for granted in the discussion on the other side in regard to the unfairness of the election for delegates to the Lecompton convention, which the facts do not justify.

Mr. STUART. It is perhaps necessary for me to say a word or two in reply to what has just fallen from the Senator from Missouri, inasmuch as I believe I first brought this point to the attention of the Senate. I stated then, after giving a considerable extract from a letter of Governor Walker, that the same thing, in substance, was stated by Mr. Stanton, then acting-Governor in Kansas, in his message to the extra session of the Legislature. He repeats precisely the same thing in substance. I would be willing to rest the statement of facts there on the statement of Governor Walker, who had been Governor of Kansas since last spring, and whose duty it was to inform himself particularly in regard to the laws and the facts concerning the affairs of that Territory, and the statement of Mr. Secretary Stanton, confirming it in every respect against the stray statement of three or four individuals here published in a newspaper.

But, sir, there is an additional fact stated in that newspaper extract, which goes to show either that those gentlemen did not understand the subject, or did not intend fairly to present it. It is this: That if anybody was aggrieved in that Territory, they could apply to the Governor for redress, in regard to the registration of votes. There is not a single word in the law that authorized the Governor to act at all, and he had no more power to act in that case than I had. Some of the men who signed this paper, are not unknown in the history of this Territory. The man who makes the statement has been a very active partisan in the Territory, and every statement that he makes should be taken with the same allowance that the statement of Jim Lane should, on the other side. They are two men who went to the Territory for mischief, and not for good.

Now, sir, let me ask the question which I asked when the law was passed calling a convention—and I presented the fact to persons high in authority here—why was the law passed requiring a registration of votes for the purpose of electing delegates to a convention? There never was any other registration required at an election in Kansas from the time of its organization down to today. Why was it done? I had not any doubt at the time what it was done for. It was perfectly clear to me that that Legislature had taken the provisions of the Toombs bill, which was to be executed by men appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate of the United States, whose character should be such as to secure an honest exercise of its provisions, and the provisions of that bill were designed for the purpose of excluding all who were not actual inhabitants and residents of the Territory. It was to exclude immigrant voters from any State in the Union. What object had the Legislature in view in the passage of that law? Why introduce upon the theater of legislation in Kansas a new set of provisions in order to elect delegates to a convention? There was but one reason—that under a show of fairness they might defraud the people, and the result justifies the prediction.

There has been a good deal said on this subject, from time to time, and much that ought to be regretted. It is asserted, day after day, that everybody in the Territory had the fullest opportunity to vote, and the responsibility is on their own heads if they did not vote, when, in addition to the fact which I stated the other day, which is sought to be explained by these individuals in this newspaper extract, it is known that individuals who went into that convention claiming seats as delegates were rejected because they had not complied with the provisions of this law, when the officers whose duty it was to execute the law refused to do it.

I am not going into a general discussion of this question at all. I deemed it my duty, after the reading of the extract, to state to the Senate, simultaneously with this pretended explanation, that it was not to be relied upon. The language of the statement itself shows that it is got up more out of personal feeling against Governor Walker than for the purpose of enlightening the country at large. There are terms and expressions used in it of personal disrespect to him which show that fact; and I may end where I began, with asking if the statements of Governor Walker, whose duty it was to know, and who had the opportunity to know; and if the statements of acting Governor Stanton, in his message to the Legislature, are not to be relied on against the newspaper statements of three or four individuals, and those individuals among those who are implicated in what I charge to be this very fraud—members of this very convention who assigned as a reason, in their published debates; why they would not submit it to the people, that if they did so submit it, they knew it would be rejected?

Now, sir, I am not disposed to regard such explanations against the statement of the sworn officers of this Government, and those, too, gentlemen of the respectability and fame of Governor Walker and acting Governor Stanton. I would rather have their statement. At some future day I intend to look into this matter myself. I intend to look at the laws and see about these attachments of counties; and I intend to see, so far as I can learn from the laws of that Territory, whether attaching five or six counties to one for certain purposes was authorized. I would say to the honorable Senator that, in my State, when it was a Territory, they were not thus attached for voting purposes. They were attached for judicial purposes; but every organized county had township officers, and had voting precincts in every township. It was attached to another county simply for judicial purposes; but I do not understand that when one is attached for voting purposes, you go out of the organized county to vote. You vote in your own county, and in your own township. Your votes are sent to the county to which you are attached, and there they are canvassed, and the result is certified by the officers of that county; but you have your local township officers, your local precincts, and you vote within some convenient distance. If you can attach five or six counties to another for voting purposes, these counties, I presume, being twenty or twenty-four miles square, you may send a man a hundred miles to vote, and you might as well deprive him of the privilege entirely. But, sir, as I said, I did not rise for the purpose of going into any general discussion on this subject.

Mr. POLK. It would be more satisfactory to me if the honorable Senator from Michigan had been able to put against the statement which has been read—the extent of the truth of which I am not advised—the law of Kansas Territory rather than the declaration which he quoted in his first speech, contained in the letter of Governor Walker. It will be found—and that was the reason why I read the extract to the Senate—that Governor Walker represents the facts as they are stated in this paper; that is, they all agree that there were nineteen counties in which no vote was taken, as in organized counties; but this statement undertakes to explain how it was that the vote was not taken; that in four of them, it was not by the fault of those who were in favor of the action of the Lecompton convention, but because the officers were opposed to any constitutional convention being held at all; and then that fifteen of them were attached, for election purposes, to other counties. It has been suggested to me by my colleague, and on his recollection I will state the fact, that one of the official papers—I think it is one of Secretary Stanton's—bears out the declaration of the persons who have made this statement, to the effect that numbers of persons refused to give their names for the purpose of registration at all.

Mr. STUART. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. POLK. My colleague refers me to the passage to which I alluded. It is this:

"It is not my purpose to reply to your statement of facts. I cannot do so from any personal knowledge enabling me either to admit or deny them. I may say, however, I have heard statements quite as authentic as your own, and, in some instances, from members of your own party, to the effect that your political friends have very generally, indeed almost universally, refused to participate in the pending proceedings for registering the names of the legal voters. In some instances they have given fictitious names, and in numerous others they have refused to give any names at all. You cannot deny that your party have heretofore resolved not to take part in the registration; and it appears to me that, without indulging ungenerous suspicions of the integrity of officers, you might well attribute any errors and omissions of the sheriffs to the existence of this well-known and controlling fact. I forbear to say anything of the unreasonableness of your requirement that we shall set aside the law in order to accomplish what you have refused to do in obedience to its provisions, but I will be most happy to learn that you, gentlemen, and your party friends generally, have been at work in earnest with a view to enable the probate judges to present a true and perfect list of the legal voters of the Territory. You have had power to correct the lists; if you have failed to do it, the fault will be your own."

That is in the letter of Mr. Secretary Stanton, at that time acting Governor of the Territory, addressed to C. Robinson, William Hutchinson, Edward Clark, and others. I will further add that, whatever may have been true in the State of Michigan, I know it has been true in my own State; and was so no longer ago than the last June election that new counties were organized, and for purposes of voting, voted with the population of another county, not only for State officers, but for the election of a representative to the Legislature. It is a very easy matter to make charges of fraud, and to say that results were produced by fraud and by stratagem; and to base those charges on the declaration of officers if you please, which declarations were not made for the purpose of coming to that result, for it will be found, on looking at the letter of Governor Walker, that he does not state the conclusion directly, as gentlemen infer it, from the facts which he alleges; but he states the facts and says, in stating them, that they constitute not technical, but vital objections to the Lecompton constitution, and the constitution formed by it. I believe that is the utmost strength of language which he uses.

Mr. WILSON. I desire, Mr. President, before this subject passes from the Senate, to say a word or two in explanation of the statements embraced in the paper which the Senator from Missouri has introduced into the Senate. These persons contradict the positive statements of Secretary Stanton, and of Governor Walker, and they contradict, also, the facts which are well known in Kansas, and well known by intelligent men in the country. When the act of the Legislature which was vetoed by Governor Geary, was passed over his head, the friends of free Kansas saw, or thought they saw, in that act, an intention to defraud the people of the Territory. In the first place they saw that the constitution was not to be submitted to the people. Governor Geary had vetoed the bill, because it did not provide for submitting the constitution to the people. A committee of the Legislature in reply to this objection of Governor Geary, told him that they did not intend to submit it to the people, because their southern friends had advised them that by that mode they could secure a slave State. This scheme to cheat the people out of their rights, came from the brains of slave propagandists out of the Territory. Surely we should not be surprised at their support of the swindle now.

The friends of free Kansas saw that they were to be defrauded and cheated out of their rights. They saw that the census was to be taken by men over whom the people had no control; men imposed on them, in whose integrity or honesty they had no confidence; men who were the instruments of the Legislature which had been forced upon them by armed men from western Missouri.

For these reasons they decided that they would not participate in the election of delegates to the convention. Secretary Stanton, who went out before Governor Walker, after he arrived in the Territory, made speeches at Lawrence and several other points, in which he invoked the people to go into the election. The free-State men knew that they could not have fairness, but Governor Robinson and other leading free-State men in the Territory drew up a paper, signed it, presented it to Secretary Stanton, and offered to go into the election provided some mode were adopted for an honest taking of the census and an honest enrollment of the voters. Secretary Stanton to this appeal replied that the matter was beyond his control, that he had no power whatever over it. Well, sir, in one or two counties, the people, in their sovereign capacity, came together and elected delegates to the convention. These delegates went to the convention, but they were promptly voted out.

It is said in this paper that the statements of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton that the census was not taken in half the counties is incorrect. Sir, I was in the Territory during a portion of the months of May and June. I was there when those matters were exciting the deepest and most profound interest among the whole people; and I say here that I know the statements of Secretary Stanton and Governor Walker to be absolutely true. In fifteen counties no census whatever was taken, no enrollment of the votes was had, partly because of the neglect of the officials, and partly because in many of these counties there were no officials to perform this duty. How was it even in the oldest and largest counties? In the town of Topeka, containing nearly four hundred voters, there was no census taken at all. In the town of Lawrence there was a census taken, but only two or three hundred were enrolled, although it contained seven or eight hundred voters. No voting district was opened at Lawrence; and those who wished to vote for delegates had to go to Lecompton, fourteen miles distant, in order to do so. In the city of Leavenworth, the mayor of the city, one of the oldest residents of the place, was not enrolled. Only a very small number of men were enrolled in some of the largest towns of the Territory. In other places, when nobody came to them, some of the active free-State men made up lists for enrollment; but they were not put upon the enrollment by the territorial officials.

Sir, this whole organization, the call of the convention, the studied refusal to provide in advance for submitting the constitution to the people, the mode in which the census was taken, and the enrollment of the voters made, and the basis upon which the delegates were apportioned, were all intended as a fraud upon the people of Kansas. These intentions have been literally carried out. The telegraph to-day, I learn, brings intelligence that the two or three thousand slave-State men in Kansas—there were only seventeen hundred at the election for delegates for the convention, and there are not to-day three thousand of them in the Territory—have carried the Governor and the Legislature. Such towns as Kickapoo, Oxford, Shawnee, Marysville, and the Delaware Crossing, have returned nearly four thousand votes at this election, though they have not, in the aggregate, six hundred voters.

Sir, it is too late in the day to quote this racing hero Pate, or any other of these men, who have, by fraud and violence, aimed to deprive the people of Kansas of their rights. The frauds in that Territory, from March, 1855, to this very hour, have been designed and organized to crush the sentiment of the people, to override the popular judgment, and to force its admission as a slaveholding State into the Union. And now this Lecompton constitution, by the use of executive power and executive patronage, is to be carried through Congress, although the people of Kansas have voted it down by a decisive majority. Congress is now invoked by the Executive to consummate the frauds and trickeries which have been perpetrated by the tools of the slave propagandists.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to say a word or two in connection with this point. At the commencement of this session, I had heard the statement afterwards made by the Senator from Michigan, that, in nineteen of the counties no census was taken; and I think I stated it in the Senate, as the debates will show, as a fatal objection if it were true. When I saw the letter of resignation of Governor Walker I deemed it important for us to be in possession of some definite proof on the subject, for, differing with the Senator from Massachusetts, I put no faith in the telegraphic dispatches, or private letters, or any sort of stories from Kansas. We have heard enough of them for three years, and they do not produce the least credence at all in my mind. Governor Walker does say, in his letter, in the most unqualified manner, that these nineteen counties were disfranchised; and if it is true, it is a very material point. Speaking of the act, he says:

"On reference to the territorial law, under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention."

That is, thirty-four counties are named in the convention act as election districts.

"In each and all of these counties, it was required by law that a census should be taken and the voters registered; and when this was completed the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates, based upon such census; and in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. This result was superinduced by the fact that the Territorial Legislature appointed all the sheriffs and probate judges in all these counties, to whom was assigned the duty by law of making this census and registry. These officers were political partisans, dissenting from the views and opinions of the people of these counties, as proved by the election in October last. These officers, from want of funds, as they allege, neglected or refused to take any census, or make any registry in these counties; and, therefore, they were entirely disfranchised, and could not and did not give a single vote at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention."

That is Governor Walker's statement. As to the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts, it is clearly without foundation. He says that the friends of free Kansas, as he calls them, when they looked at the convention act, saw that the basis of apportionment favored the counties on the Missouri river. There was no basis fixed in the act at all. The apportionment was to be based on the census, when the census should be taken. The Senator from Michigan says Secretary Stanton confirms this statement. When I read the letter of Governor Walker, the Senate will recollect I pressed my resolution for information, and I pressed it in person on the President after this report came in, and he told me that he had no documents from Kansas; that the executive minutes had not been sent here beyond the first six months of the territorial government. The difficulty I have about the matter is, that Secretary Stanton does not confirm Governor Walker, and that is the reason I want to know now what the truth is on this point. Secretary Stanton says in his message:

"The census therein provided for was imperfectly obtained from an unwilling people in nineteen counties of the Territory; while, in the remaining counties, being also nineteen in number, from various causes, no attempt was made to comply with the law. In some instances, people and officers were alike averse to the proceeding; in others, the officers neglected or refused to act; and in some there was but a small population, and no efficient organization, enabling the people to secure a representation in the convention. Under the operation of all these causes combined, a census list was obtained of only nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one legal voters, confined to precisely one half the counties of the Territory, though these, undoubtedly, contained much the larger part of the population."

Governor Walker says it was omitted by the officers exclusively because, as they alleged, they had no funds. Secretary Stanton attributes it to a great variety of causes, and among others the very cause to which the Senator from Missouri has alluded—the fact that in many of these counties there was a sparse population, or no population at all. I do not know how true the statement may be; but I say it is a deliberate statement; it is a positive statement; it gives time, and fact, and circumstance, and it is in the power of the Committee on Territories to ascertain it; and that is what I want to know about this Lecompton convention, and wanted to know from the first about it.

As to the convention act, I say what I have always said: I do not think it is in the power of any legislature to pass a fairer law than that. It is a copy of the Toombs bill with the exception of the five commissioners. Did we not all stand here, the Senator from Michigan with us, in July, 1856, averring that that was a fair bill? And when our own bill is brought back to us we are to pick out some objection. As to the five commissioners that were inserted, I do not see the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] in his seat, but my recollection is that those five commissioners were put in, not as an essential part of the bill, but simply because the Legislature of Kansas was not in session, and it was supposed the Governor, who had just been engaged in these controversies, would not be perfectly impartial. I never thought the five commissioners an essential part of the bill, but I did suppose the census and registration, and the apportionment of delegates upon the census and registration, was the life of the Toombs bill. If it was not, I shall have to learn that bill over again. That confessedly is in this act; and the act does provide, in spite of what the Senator from Michigan has said, that if the offices of sheriff and probate judge become vacant, and it is the same thing if they go away from the county, then the Governor of the Territory shall appoint somebody else.

I want to learn the truth about the Kansas business. I am not going to give my vote on any ex parte statement, one way or the other. The paper read by the Senator from Missouri, though not conclusive as evidence, ought to attract the candid attention of Senators on all sides.

Then the Senator from Michigan objects that the counties stated in the extract were disfranchised from voting at all. They were attached, as I understand that statement, for the purpose of having the census taken, as a portion of the civil purposes of a county organization; that is to say, the sheriff of the old county took the census in all of them, or was called upon to take it; but, for the purposes of election, they are not attached to those counties. They are attached to counties as set forth in the nineteenth section of this act, but the attachment is not the same. I confess that is a material circumstance; and that is the circumstance that has put me in doubt, since I saw the statement to which the Senator from Missouri alludes, that the counties in which the census was alleged to have been taken by the sheriff of another county are not attached to those counties for the purposes of election. I do not know that I could illustrate my meaning, unless I were to see that paper again. I had a copy of it in my possession; but my impression is, that it will be found that a large number of the counties in which the census was taken by the sheriff of an old county, are not attached to that county by the nineteenth section of this act. Then there is a material question; and the sooner we try and get at the real question, and strip it of all these adventitious pretenses, it seems to me the better. It is a question of moment; it is a question which, in my judgment, goes to the whole issue of the legality of the Lecompton convention.

As for those people who had a chance to register themselves and would not do so, but gave false names, I have no sort of compassion for them—none at all. You cannot make men vote, and you cannot make men give their names. It is the old story: "You can lead a horse to the water, but you cannot make him drink." You provide by law that men may vote and be registered; and when they will not do it, I know no remedy in my power. Therefore, as I said on the first day of the session, on the motion to print the President's message, what I have wanted on this subject has been the last thing to be looked at; and that is, to know what truth there is in the assertion that these nineteen counties were disfranchised. If the statement read by the Senator from Missouri should prove to be true, it seems to me that it ends the controversy.

Mr. BIGLER. I shall not go into the details of this discussion. I saw enough of Kansas to satisfy me that it was an easy matter for the most observant man to be mistaken as to the population. Why, sir, if a man were in the upper end of Doniphan and Brown counties during the time of the Iowa land sales, he would have said there was a large population; but a very few days after the sale, the counties were depopulated. I witnessed the same thing in Lykens county, where the people had gone for the purpose of locating the lands, merely to secure their title, and as soon as the sale was over, left the county, and many of them left the Territory.

Now, sir, I have always treated, as I always shall, every statement made by Governor Walker and Mr. Stanton, with that respect to which it is entitled; and, as I said in discussing this question some time since, I would not, because of the conflicting statements, go into a close examination of them; but the pictures cannot be reconciled.

Whilst I estimate one of the signers of that paper very much as the Senator from Michigan has done, I would put him on a footing with Lane, from what I saw of both; yet the facts developed there by the ballot-box show conclusively that the statement with regard to the disfranchisement of nineteen counties must be greatly exaggerated. Of all the extravagant statements I have seen yet, that would be the most extraordinary—that there were inhabitants in all those counties, that it would have been a physical possibility to have had a registry, to have entered voters, and to have held elections in all those nineteen counties.

But to the practical point for which I rose only, and it is this: that whilst we are told that nineteen counties were disfranchised, containing one half the population, we know, by Secretary Stanton's message, that as early as May there were nine thousand two hundred and fifty voters registered; and at the October election, with a greatly increased population, at the end of a bitter partisan contest, and after the Army had voted, and each party charge the other with having polled fraudulent votes, the aggregate little exceeds twelve thousand. How can this be? There was no registry in the way.

Then again, the other day, on a vote for State officers, unembarrassed by any registry, every white male citizen above the age of twenty-one voting, the aggregate vote is about thirteen thousand. How can you reconcile these facts that come to us through the ballot-box, in an official form, with the allegation that more than one half of the people of Kansas have been disfranchised?

The best that can be said with regard to these movements in Kansas, on either side, is bad enough. That the registry was greatly defective, no man doubts. A perfect registry in a country like that would have been a wonder. That in many instances it was not sought to make it right, I have no doubt; but that one half of the people were disfranchised, is clearly and emphatically contradicted by the facts themselves—nine thousand two hundred and fifty votes registered in May, and only a little over twelve thousand voted in October. I was there about that time.

I said, in noticing that peculiar feature of Governor Walker's statement, that I simply was unable to reconcile these facts with his picture. I am the last man to say an unkind thing of him. I never did. I have been his personal friend; but I take this case as it stands, and how am I to conclude that nineteen counties were disfranchised in the face of the facts which I have stated? There is enough to be said about informality and want of authority without coming to that point; but I shall not trouble the Senate further.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President—

Mr. SEWARD. I have a word to say which I think proper and very pertinent to this question. I like to have fair and square accounts all around, and I think it is proper to say, that on conversing with my friend [Mr. HARLAN] who has addressed the Senate in a very able speech, and who is not here now, he was satisfied he had done injustice in the remarks which he made in regard to the manner in which his coming to the floor was regarded to-day. I know perfectly well how that happened. It was a mistake all around. The Secretary misconceived the rule and misled the President. The President then misled the Senator from Mississippi. The mistake was corrected just about as soon as ever any mistake can be corrected in a body of sixty men, and with courtesy the floor was restored to my friend. I like to have all these difficulties out of the way, and now I give up the floor to my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. STUART. With the consent of the Senator from Mississippi, I do not propose to make any enlarged remarks, but to state two points. I think that what has fallen from the Senator from Pennsylvania is entirely consistent with the facts stated by Governor Walker and by Secretary Stanton. They do not say that half the people were disfranchised. They say the people in one half the counties were not registered, and had no opportunity to vote. Secretary Stanton says expressly in his message that the counties wherein the registry was taken, and that did not vote, were counties comprising more than a majority of the voters of the Territory; so that that is all-consistent. My friend from Ohio, it seems to me, has made an extraordinary effort to show that I am mistaken.

Mr. PUGH. You did not read the papers, but I read them.

Mr. STUART. I propose to read the papers, to show that it is not myself, but my honorable friend, who is mistaken. I read from Secretary Stanton's message:

"The law passed at the last session of the Legislative Assembly, providing for the organization of a convention to frame a constitution for the government of Kansas, as one of the States of the Union, was adopted at a period when, unfortunately, the people of the Territory were divided by a bitter hostility, resulting from the previous state of commotion and civil war. In consequence of this embittered feeling, and the mutual distrust naturally thereby engendered, one of the parties, constituting a large majority of the people, refrained almost entirely from any participation in the proceedings instituted under the law aforesaid. The census therein provided for was imperfectly obtained from an unwilling people, in nineteen counties of the Territory; while, in the remaining counties, being also nineteen in number, from various causes, no attempt was made to comply with the law."

That is the statement of Governor Walker to which I alluded, and which I said was substantially confirmed by Secretary Stanton in his message to the Legislature, which I now read. It is true, he goes on to say—and that I never discussed—that:

"In some instances, people and officers were alike averse to the proceeding; in others, the officers neglected or refused to act; and in some there was but a small population, and no efficient organization enabling the people to secure a representation in the convention. Under the operation of all these causes combined, a census list was obtained of only nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one legal voters, confined to precisely one half of the counties of the Territory, though these, undoubtedly, contained much the larger part of the population."

He says all these causes operated, but he does not know to what extent each cause operated. That they all did operate we knew without his statement. It was matter of public notoriety that there was a portion of that people who refused to recognize this Legislature or anything under it. I have stated more than once that I thought they acted very unwisely. I have stated here and elsewhere, that I knew of no better way for the people to help themselves to remedy legal defects in this country, and no other way, than to resort to the ballot-box and vote; but I never heard until lately that when the people resorted to the ballot-box and voted under a constitution, and at the same time voted against the constitution, they were held to have adopted the constitution. That was an argument that never struck me until within the last few days. It was not made here, but was published in the newspapers.

Another fact is stated in this paper certificate which discredited it with me to a great extent, aside from the character which the Senator from Pennsylvania admits attaches to one of these persons. It is this: it says that one of the judges of probate was a free-State man, and refused to act. I do not believe that, and I will tell you why. I have just sent for the laws of this Territory, and I find my recollection is confirmed that the judges of probate and the sheriffs of the counties were appointed by the first Legislature elected in Kansas to hold their office until 1857, and I do not believe that Legislature appointed any free-State men to office.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am surprised at the constant allegations of fraud, and always upon one side. I do not understand the force of such hard terms applied to a people who are so far away, and admitted to have political rights. Then, again, I think it is somewhat like that art which is practiced to prevent exposure by making accusations. Where do these frauds exist? In the organization of societies to violate the first compact that was made in relation to these Territories, when it was agreed that soil and climate should determine their institutions, and that they should be left to the free will of the people themselves; and never was there a baser fraud than to organize, under legislative charters, companies thus to pervert the free will of the people. That stands in the foreground, the first.

Then, sir, in the progress of this discussion we have been told time and again that the reference of the question in relation to slave institutions, was an unimportant one, and yet every speaker who rises hinges on that single point. He divides the people and classifies them into free-State men and pro-slavery men. Every telegraphic dispatch that comes and every report that agitates the public mind, directs itself to that question alone. Twice to-day I have heard that there was great news just come in from Kansas—once privately communicated to me, and once stated upon the floor of the Senate, as the result of the recent election, and they are opposite. One says the free-State men have swept Kansas; another says the pro-slavery men, contrary to every known fact, have carried the election. What boots it to Senators? Are we to sit here waiting, as the tide may come in and flow out, to determine what our action is to be on a great question? Have we no principle? Is truth sunk so low that our vote is to be as the tide shall ebb and flow in our favor? It matters not to me how the election went; it matters not to me who is elected Governor, or who may be in the Legislature; and I shall hang my head in shame when I believe that an American Senate can be actuated by such motives. I shall feel that we have reached that decadence in our institutions which marks a people unfit for the Government under which they live. For if the government be too high for the moral tone of the people, it is as impracticable, it is as certain to fail as if we were to attempt to fetter this free people by the bonds of despotism.

Like my friend from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH,] I have come to the conclusion that no reliance is to be placed on the rumors that reach us. Like him, I have been anxious to get information, and I have set in wonder when philippics are delivered here on questions which have no connection with the subject, to know why it is that this subject is not referred, and the appropriate committee required to gather that information which we need. I have come to the conclusion, sir, in the words of an ancient school of philosophy, that all we know is that nothing can be known in relation to this question of Kansas.

Nor do I think it devolves on the Senate to enter into these local questions of how precincts were established, how elections were held, whether a free-State man, or a pro-slavery man was justice of the peace and inspector of the election. That subject has come to be like the frogs in Egypt; we can turn to no subject, we can discuss nothing here without having that protruded, placed in the foreground, obscuring everything like calm reflection. Whatever be the facts in relation to this question, it belongs to the truth, to the country, to our duty, and to the Government that we should seek to ascertain them, and that on those ascertained facts we should then proceed to act. Violent speeches for and against slavery delivered on the question whether the Committee on Territories shall investigate this subject or not, will lead to no result that I can suppose any man is willing to accept. I wish the time had come when the Senate would choose to take the question whether or not they will refer the message. If not, I hope my colleague will postpone it to the remotest day, I do not care if it be dies non.

Mr. WILSON. I think, Mr. President, that the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi require an immediate and prompt reply. The Senator undertakes to read us lectures, to cast censure upon us because we have been pleased to refer to the frauds which have been perpetrated in the Territory of Kansas during the past three years. The Senator is not pleased with these references. Well, sir, we have referred to these frauds in the past; we will refer to them in the future; and we shall hold the men who have sustained and apologized for them to that moral responsibility before the country to which the people ever hold all men who justify and apologize for unjust deeds. Let me ask the Senator if he does not know that on the 30th of March, 1855, over forty-nine hundred men went from Missouri into Kansas, and voted? That has been proved and spread before the country. There is, there can be, no mistake in regard to the fact. That vote elected the Territorial Legislature, and has controlled for three years the destiny of the Territory. It was one of the most palpable, deliberate, organized frauds ever perpetrated in this or any other land. There is no man here, or elsewhere, hardy enough now to deny that those frauds were perpetrated, and that subsequent frauds have been perpetrated, for the purpose of sustaining and upholding this original fraud. These frauds did not commence on the 30th of March, 1855; they began in October, 1854, within less than five months after the Territory was organized, when several hundred men went from Missouri, and elected Whitfield as Delegate to Congress. That was followed by the fraud of March 30, 1855, which laid Kansas at the feet of the pro-slavery men—men who were sustained by the last Administration, and who are now upheld by the present Administration.

How was it at the last October election, the only contested election that has been held? Were not one thousand six hundred fraudulent votes returned from the town of Oxford, containing only a few legal voters? Was not the Cincinnati Directory put into that election? Were not one thousand three hundred fraudulent votes returned for McGhee county? Were not several hundred fraudulent votes given under the eye of Governor Walker himself, in the town of Kickapoo? Did not Governor Walker go down to Oxford and throw out that fraudulent vote? Did he not correct the McGhee fraud? Did not the Legislature right the Kickapoo frauds? Did not the States of Mississippi and Alabama "howl"—to use the word Mr. Buchanan is said to have used in a letter written to Governor Walker—over this? Did they not denounce Governor Walker for correcting a palpable fraud upon the people of Kansas? Did not that correction of a fraud begin the downfall of Robert J. Walker? He was destroyed for that act by a weak Executive.

Sir, how was it on the 21st of December last? Look at the votes counted for the Lecompton constitution. Kickapoo, with five hundred inhabitants, gave one thousand and seventeen votes; Oxford gave one thousand two hundred and sixty-six votes; Shawnee seven hundred and twenty-nine; Marysville, with not over thirty voters, gave two hundred and thirty-two votes, and Fort Scott three hundred and eighteen—making in these places more than three thousand five hundred votes out of less than six thousand seven hundred in the whole Territory. Three thousand of these votes were fraudulent votes.

Senators do not like references to these frauds; but every intelligent, well-informed man, in or out of Kansas, who chooses to investigate the subject, or who cares anything about the destinies of that Territory, knows that of the six thousand seven hundred votes returned for the constitution on the 21st of December, not three thousand were legal votes.

Kansas has just had another election; and the evidences are thickening upon us. They are coming to us by telegraph; they are coming to us by men from that Territory—men who have been pro-slavery men from the beginning—that frauds have been again perpetrated. Although the free-State men voted down the constitution by a majority of nearly eleven thousand on the 4th of January, and elected their State ticket and Legislative ticket, the counting officer, dictator Calhoun, it is now said, has counted in a pro-slavery Legislature, and a pro-slavery State government. I do not know that this is so; but I know that the men who are in favor of making Kansas a slave State, and who have declared to-day, in the other branch of Congress, that this Union shall be dissolved if Kansas be not admitted under the Lecompton constitution, have received such information. Unvailed trickery has triumphed; and we are now told, that if Kansas is not admitted under the Lecompton swindle, the Union is to be dissolved. The Union dissolved! The men who perpetrated these frauds, or who uphold them, may go out of the Union when they please; but they must leave the land behind them.

I have no wish to say unkind words here; no wish to refer to these frauds, except for the purpose of showing that the popular voice in Kansas is to be crushed; that the object for which these frauds were perpetrated in the commencement, is to be accomplished by admitting Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution; and that we are to have the whole power and patronage of this Administration, held back until now, to force it through both Houses of Congress, to consummate this iniquity upon the people of that Territory.

Now, sir, when any Senator here, or anybody in the country, can show a fraudulent vote given at any time in the Territory of Kansas, by the free-State men, of any locality, I will denounce it; but I tell you you have never shown it, you have never pretended it. I do not believe any such vote has ever been given; and no record can prove it. If such a vote has been given, however, I do not defend or apologize for it. That frauds have been committed; that they have been systematically committed; that they have an object, a purpose, namely, to crush the people of Kansas and to overawe them, I have no doubt; and those frauds have been apologized for and sustained here and elsewhere in the country.

Mr. BIGLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. BIGLER. I have no doubt the Senator from Massachusetts is speaking from the best information he has with reference to the recent election. But I beg to say to him that I have seen a copy of the Herald of Freedom, published at Lawrence on the 16th of January. I had supposed the Senator from Massachusetts was a subscriber to that paper, and a reader of it. I read in it to-day a paragraph with reference to the difficulty which Mr. Henderson has got into there, on the charge of changing election returns, in which the editor states distinctly that the returns for the Delaware Crossing precinct, in Leavenworth county, which involved the ascendancy of parties, had been rejected by Mr. Calhoun, and alleged that in that way Mr. Henderson had been saved from the consequences of his alleged mischief or crime. I certainly am not mistaken in the reading of the article, and it is explicit that a disputed precinct was thrown out by Mr. Calhoun in making up the returns. Doubtless the Senator will see the article by referring to it. I do not say that it is correct or incorrect; but I read it, and I suppose it is quite as good authority as any telegraphic news which can have come to-day.

Mr. WILSON. I will only say that I have read the article to which the Senator alludes, but I do not so understand it. I may be mistaken, however.

Mr. BIGLER. Does not the article state distinctly that Mr. Calhoun did set them aside?

Mr. WILSON. It may be so, but I do not now recollect anything of the kind.

Mr. BIGLER. It is in the same brief paragraph.

Mr. WILSON. If he has done so, he has only rejected frauds, and I rose to speak of frauds.

Mr. BIGLER. I will produce the paper, and give it to the Senator.

Mr. WILSON. I do not deny it, but I have not so read it. In a letter received yesterday from Governor Robinson, he states that it is rumored that five hundred votes were returned from Delaware Crossing; that if this be so, and if they should be counted by Calhoun, Leavenworth county will go pro-slavery, and that may change the result in the Legislature. Governor Robinson expresses the opinion that the free-State men have carried the election, but that it is not certain that certificates will be given to the free-State men; that Calhoun has announced that he shall keep the counting open for additional returns, and no one can tell what he may do.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Massachusetts rose, as he announced, to reply to me, and said he would arraign fraud, and that he would hold those who justify and advocate and apologize for fraud to their moral responsibility. As he uses that language in connection with the announcement that he was replying to me, I must ask him what reference that has to me?

Mr. WILSON. I did not understand the Senator to have justified fraud in Kansas, or elsewhere, but to have condemned the reference to those frauds here.

Mr. DAVIS. There the Senator misunderstood me, or did not quite apprehend what I did say. It was not that fraud should not be held to account here and elsewhere; it was that we should not have Senators proceeding from day to day making allegations without proof—and when I do not believe their statements—in advance of the subject, before we have the information, when there is nothing dependent on their allegations, piling it up day by day in mere declamation. That is all I have to say about it. When the time comes, if the Senator will produce fraud which vitiates anything on which I have to vote, I will readily vote with him. When the time comes to examine whether there has been fraud in anything upon which we have to act, very good; I am prepared to make the inquiry. It is to this mere political declamation that I object, when there is no action.

I stated further that I objected to it, because it did not go back to the foundation; that it took it up just at the point where counteraction commenced. I do not say there is not fraud; but I do say, and it is proper I should say it now, that those persons who went into the Territory and claimed to vote immediately after they got in, were but following the invitation of Congress and acting in accordance with the law which it enacted. When this doctrine of squatter sovereignty (against which, when it was first introduced, I strove with whatever little power I possessed) became the popular theory of the land, legislation received that direction which brought about the exact state of things which justified any number of men to go from any State into a Territory, and vote the hour after they got there; nay, more, it justified them in setting up their claims to take the control of the government, throw off their responsibility to the Federal Government, and assume to dictate the institutions under which they would live.

Something retrograde was made when this Kansas bill was enacted. It is better than some that went before it; but out of that same theory grew, and, I think, legitimately grew, the assertion of this right of everybody to go into the Territory and vote the hour after they got there. There was no time of residence prescribed; there was no proof of intent to remain required. It was the exact carrying out of that thing which we portrayed in 1850, when we argued against it as assuming the right of an emigrant population to halt for the night and establish a government, and declare themselves there sovereign. I do not think that can be alleged as fraud, unless we go back and allege the fraud against Congress, upon the institutions of the country, and the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BROWN. I design to move the postponement of this question until a day subsequent; and as Friday is a leisure day, I propose, if it suit the Senator, to postpone it to that day. I hope, by that time, we shall have the Lecompton constitution here. If we have not, the question can pass over to a subsequent day. I see no practical utility in discussing a question which is not before us.

Mr. PUGH. Why not say Thursday?

Mr. BROWN. Because we have a special order for that day. I propose Friday, because that is a day past which we have been in the habit of adjourning; and if we get the Lecompton constitution, as I am assured we shall, by that time, we may as well occupy it in discussing the question as adjourning over. If we do not get it we can on Thursday adjourn to some subsequent day. I propose to discuss a practical question. If we have the constitution before us, let us discuss the question of admitting Kansas into the Union, and not go on debating a mere question as to whether we shall refer the papers, looking ahead as to what we shall have directly before the Senate. I do not know that we shall have the question before us on that day; but I am assured that we shall, in all probability, have it. Expecting that the constitution will be here by Friday, I move to postpone the further consideration of this question until Friday, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. STUART, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, JANUARY 25, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. P. D. GURLEY, D. D.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the select committee on the Pacific railroad: Messrs. PHELPS, JONES OF TENNESSEE, WASHBURN OF MAINE, MILLSON, CURTIS, CORNING, UNDERWOOD, GROESBECK, GILMER, SINGLETON, FARNSWORTH, PHILLIPS, LEACH, BRYAN, and SCOTT.

HON. O. B. MATTESON.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the consideration of the preamble and resolution in relation to Hon. O. B. MATTE-

SON, submitted by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] and postponed to this day.

Mr. KEITT. In the absence of the gentleman from Illinois, who offered the resolution, I take the liberty, sir, without any consultation with him, of moving its postponement for one month. I do it in consideration of the fact that I understand from good authority that the member alluded to in the resolution is detained at home by the severe illness of his wife.

The motion was agreed to.

CLOSE OF DEBATE ON THE PENSION BILL.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] to close debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the invalid pension bill at one o'clock on Tuesday next, the pending question being upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his motion, and let us vote directly on the main question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio is not in his seat.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I propose to close debate on the pension bill at one o'clock on Tuesday. The deficiency bill for printing will then come up, and there are ten other regular appropriation bills, and another deficiency bill, all of which have been reported or are ready to be reported, so that every gentleman will have ample opportunity of being heard. It is very important that we should pass some of the appropriation bills, and send them to the Senate for action there. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his motion to lay the resolution on the table; or, if he declines to do so, that it will be voted down.

Tellers having been ordered on Friday last on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, Messrs. BILLINGHURST and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 84.

Mr. STANTON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 108; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Coffax, Comins, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Grainger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Mason, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Ready, Ricard, Robbins, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elliott W. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Purviance, Quinlan, Reagan, Reilly, Ritchie, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Trippe, Underwood, Warren, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus W. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—108.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. DOWDELL stated that his colleague, Mr. CONY, was detained from the House in consequence of the sickness of a member of his family.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, stated that he had paired off upon this question with Mr. KEITT, who had left the House for a moment, he [Mr. Davis] being in favor of laying the resolution on the table, and the gentleman from South Carolina against it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr.

DICKINS, their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which he was requested to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 35) for the relief of Michael Kinney, late a private in company I, eighth regiment, United States Army; and

An act (S. No. 61) for the relief of Frederick A. Beelen.

The question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question, on which tellers had been ordered on Friday.

Messrs. BRYAN and LOVEJOY were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 65.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

INVALID PENSION BILL.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WINSLOW in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 3, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending 30th June, 1859.

DOMESTIC SLAVERY IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. GARTRELL. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I desired to obtain the floor for the purpose of presenting some views on the grave and important questions growing out of the illegal arrest of General William Walker and his men, on the soil of Nicaragua. But the debate on that question having been temporarily suspended, and the matter having passed to the appropriate committee for investigation and report, I proceed to the consideration of a subject of graver importance to my immediate constituents, and fraught with more serious considerations to the nation at large. I allude to the subject of domestic slavery in the South, and the necessity for its expansion and its perpetuation in this country.

I am prompted thus early to this course by the extraordinary speech pronounced on this floor a few days ago by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR.] The ostensible and avowed object of that speech was the necessity and propriety of acquiring territory in Central America, wherein to colonize the free people of color now residing in the United States, and such as may hereafter become free; and there to maintain them in the enjoyment of their freedom as a dependency of this Government.

In announcing this novel and impracticable policy, the gentleman took occasion, very gratuitously, to denounce the institution of slavery as "a cancer on the face which, unless removed, would eat into the vitals of the body-politic."

This fanatical idea, stereotyped and repeated by a certain class of politicians in this country, from the time of John Randolph to this hour, was as false at its inception as it is erroneous in its conclusion. I deny it emphatically; and I am here to-day, in the presence of this Congress, to maintain the reverse of the proposition. I hold that the institution of domestic slavery in the South is right, both in principle and practice; that it has ever been, and still is, a blessing to the African race; that it has developed the resources of this great country to an untold extent; and that, by its conservative influences, it has elevated us in the scale of morality, wealth, enterprise, and intelligence, to a point never attained by any other people.

As a southern man, proud of the place of my nativity; as the owner of slaves; as conscientious of my moral obligations, I trust, as any gentleman on this floor, I hesitate not, here or elsewhere, to defend this institution as being strictly in accordance with the principles of right, of Christian duties, and of morality, and as having the highest sanction of laws, both human and divine. I rejoice that the public mind at the South is being awakened to this view of the question. The time for apologies by the South is past. I am here to-day (and the southern people who have this institution in their midst are to-day prepared to do the same) to stand up before the nations of the world and defiantly defend and justify domestic slavery in its greatest length, extent, and breadth.

Sir, the false prophecies of Randolph and others, alluded to by the gentleman, of the evil consequences of this institution on the moral and political interests of the southern people, are fast being obliterated by those unerring teachers, time and experience. Other nations, too, are beginning to see and to acknowledge the error of their misguided philanthropy, and to bow in acknowledgment of not only the justice, but the wisdom of domestic slavery in this country. France and England are beginning to see the error of their misguided philanthropy, and you find them to-day ready to embark in a system of slavery, more barbarous and oppressive than this world has ever seen.

But, Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the committee while I very briefly discuss the moral aspect of this institution. I intend to do so calmly, dispassionately, deliberately. I intend to make no charges against those who array all their influence and power against this institution that are not sustained by facts and by records. I am here to-day as a southern man; and I proclaim now, that this institution is not only sanctioned by the Constitution of your country, under which we all appear here to-day, but is sanctioned by records of the highest character. That that institution has existed from the earliest periods of history, no man of ordinary intelligence will deny. We learn from the Holy Scriptures that Abraham, and many other wise and good men of that day, not only held slaves, but exercised acts of complete ownership over them; and that God himself, after he had rescued the children of Israel from the house of bondage, sanctioned and recognized slavery, both in principle and in practice. In defining the rules for their government and their moral observance, it was prescribed that—

"Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor anything that is thy neighbor's."

Thus, sir, not only sanctioning slavery, but providing for its protection for all time to come. I beg leave most respectfully to commend this commandment to the attention of the gentlemen who sit on the other side of this Hall; and, sir, I trust they will cease to covet our men-servants, and our maid-servants too; and if they do covet them, that at least they will not attempt to deprive us of them by means in violation of the Constitution of our common country.

Besides, this institution is not only recognized by divine authority, but it is perpetuated. I ask the attention of the House to that portion of Holy Writ. I read, sir, from the Bible; from the Book of books. I commend it to the perusal of gentlemen. I have no doubt they are in the habit of reading it; but, upon this question, they seem rather hard of belief. I find in the 25th chapter of Leviticus, a passage which reads as follows:

"44. Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shalt ye buy bondmen and bondmaids."

"45. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land; and they shall be your possession."

"46. And ye shall take them as an inheritance, for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever."

African slaves having been taken from among the heathen, by our ancestors in England and by our forefathers in the North, we, as their descendants, claim them as an inheritance to us and to our children, "to inherit them as a possession," and they shall be our bondmen and bondwomen forever.

Sir, time will not allow me to trace or pursue this branch of the subject further. I desire to read a short extract, which so fully and so truthfully expresses my own sentiments upon this branch of the subject, that I desire to call the attention of the House to it. It is from a speech delivered a few years ago by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, upon my right, [Mr. SMITH.] I desire to read this extract, and have it incorporated into my speech. That distinguished gentleman, upon that occasion, remarked as follows:

"I believe that the institution of slavery is a noble one; that it is necessary for the good, the well-being of the negro race. Looking to history, I go further, and I say, in the presence of this assembly, and under all the imposing circumstances surrounding me, that I believe it is God's institution. Yes, sir, if there is anything in the action of the great Author of us all; if there is anything in the conduct of His chosen people; if there is anything in the conduct of Christ himself, who came upon this earth, and yielded up His life as a sacrifice, that all through His death might live; if there is anything in the conduct of His Apostles, who inculcated obedience on the part of slaves towards their masters as a Christian duty, then we must believe that the institution is from God."—Hon. William Smith, of Virginia, in a speech in the House of Representatives.

Every sentiment expressed in that eloquent extract meets my hearty approbation. As a Christian man, believing in the teachings of Holy Writ, I am here to-day before a Christian nation to reaffirm and reannounce the conclusion to which that distinguished gentleman came—that this institution, however much it may have been reviled, is of God.

I desire now to notice another error into which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] has fallen. He told you and the country that "unhappily for the slave States, many of their enterprising young men leave their native land for those States where individual ability and exertion are sufficient to confer wealth and eminence."

Mr. Chairman, this is a fancy sketch—the offspring of a heated imagination. Why, sir, let me give you the facts as they exist; and I may say to that gentleman that he knows but little of the enterprise, the industry, and the resources of the southern country, and but little of the enterprise of our young men, if he supposes for a moment that they are compelled "to fly to other lands" to obtain wealth and eminence. Sir, the opposite is true. It is admitted that the northern States annually send out hundreds of their young men to the southern States in search of that employment which is denied them at home, and there to receive a living and support, and acquire wealth and eminence, too, in the midst of what gentlemen on the other side of the House call the monopolizing influence of the slave power.

Proceedings upon this floor afford evidence of what I say. A few days ago, the facetious gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] declared that we must and would Americanize Central America; that it was necessary to supply the means of subsistence for the superabundant population of the North. The gentleman told us, in a manner that really excited my sympathies; that the Yankees (I believe he termed them) were in a tight place, and must have the lands of Central America to emigrate to. Well, sir, I am willing that our Yankee friends shall go there. I presume they will go there; but I hope they will have a little better success than they had a few years ago, in their efforts to redeem the barren pine fields and sedge patches of Virginia. I say I think it is very likely that our Yankee friends will go there, and, when there, follow the example of those who have heretofore gone South—become the owners of slaves, aid in developing the resources of the country, and show the world that the institution of domestic slavery is a blessing not only to the master, but to the slave.

But let me say to the gentleman from Missouri, in all kindness, that if he expects to plant a colony of blacks upon our southern borders, he has very much mistaken the spirit of the age. It is a monstrous proposition, to which the South would never submit. Your efforts at colonizing the African race must always, as heretofore, prove abortive, because based upon a wrong principle; you can no more enslave the Anglo-Saxon race on this continent, than you can make freemen of the Africans. You would not dare to attempt the one, nor can you effect the other. Slavery has been written on the brow of the African. The Ethiopian cannot change his skin, nor the leopard his spots; neither can the wisdom of Solon or Lycurgus invent a system of laws by which to elevate the African to political equality and the enjoyment of political sovereignty. Sir, my experience teaches me, confirmed by daily observations, that they are incapable of self-government, and must ever be. You cannot make freemen out of them. They are idle, dissolute, improvident, lazy, unthrifty, who think not of to-morrow, who provide but scantily for to-day. These seem to be the inherent laws of their nature. You cannot change this law of nature.

Several years ago, Mr. Chairman, a half century, perhaps, the French and English Governments, pursuing what has turned out to be a misguided philanthropy, attempted to colonize the negro, and give him political power and sovereignty. What has been the result? The experiment resulted in a failure, and has been productive of evil instead of benefit to the black race. In 1794 the National Assembly of France enacted a law emancipating Hayti. In order to show the effects and consequences of that ill-advised legislation on that garden spot of the world, the rich Island of Hayti, I desire to direct the attention of the committee to a few statistics. I find, sir, I will repeat, that Hayti was emancipated by the act of the National Assembly of France in 1794. In 1789 the products of that island were as follows: of clarified sugar, 47,516,531 pounds; in 1841, after this system had been fully tested, of clarified sugar not a pound. In 1789, of muscovado sugar, 93,573,300 pounds; in 1841, 1,363 pounds. Of coffee, in 1789, 76,335,219 pounds; in 1841, 34,114,417 pounds. Of cotton, in 1789, 7,400,274 pounds; in 1841, the inconsiderable quantity of 1,591,454 pounds. These statistics, sir, show the effect of that emancipation act upon the Island of Hayti. Following this example of France, Great Britain, in 1833, emancipated the islands of the West Indies, and amongst them the Island of Jamaica and of Guiana. I have statistics to show the effect of that act upon the resources, the wealth, and the products of these places.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to state to the House, at this point of the gentleman's speech, in reference to the Island of Hayti, that the export commerce of this country to that portion of the Island of Hayti occupied by the free negroes, is $350,000 greater than the entire trade with Mexico, which has eight millions population. The export to Hayti, not including the Dominican Republic, for 1851, as shown by the book on Commercial Relations printed by this House, was, of flour, eight times more than to Cuba; of pork, six times more; and of dry-goods, about twelve times as much. This is the value of that island which has been destroyed, as it is said, by the emancipation of slaves.

Mr. GARTRELL. Conceding the gentleman's statistics to be true, they but affirm the position I have assumed on this question. It is not how much it takes to feed those negroes there, but what they have made. That is the question—not your exports to that country, but their exports.

Mr. BLAIR. They have been able to pay for what they have got, or else they never would have received it from this country.

Mr. GARTRELL. They are supported by their fostering Governments; and I will show the gentleman that those Governments are tired of the burden. But, sir, I pass on; I desire to show by statistics the effect of this emancipation statute on the Island of Jamaica and of Guiana. That statute was passed in 1833. In 1833, in the Island of Jamaica, they raised 1,140,760 cwt. of sugar; in 1849, fifteen years thereafter, 633,478 cwt. In 1833, 11,154,307 pounds of coffee; and in 1849, 3,399,093 pounds. In 1833, 982 cwt. of molasses; and in 1849, 102 cwt. In 1833, 2,450,272 gallons of rum; and in 1849, 1,778,661 gallons.

The effect on Guiana is more palpable. I will not consume my time in reading the statistics in regard to it. I will simply ask the reporters to incorporate them in my printed remarks. I trust gentlemen of the House will not object.

Guiana—Exports.

Year.	Sugar. cwt.	Coffee. lbs.	Molasses. cwt.	Cotton. bales.	Rum. gallons.
1836	712,800	4,801,350	380,880	3,196	2,955,120
1849	577,569	63,253	155,952		1,882,142

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri read from Earl Grey's letters to show that this colonizing scheme of the free blacks had succeeded in the Island of Trinidad. That, sir, was an exceedingly unfortunate example for the case stated by my friend from Missouri. I have an article, which appeared in the London Times of a late date, which disposes very summarily by facts and arguments of the position assumed by that gentleman in reference to Trinidad. It overthrows altogether the predictions, the imaginings, and fancy sketches alluded to by the gentleman as taken from Earl Grey's correspondence. The London Times, the leading English journal, combats the policy of the English Government in breaking down "the slave system of the West Indies without attempting to replace it with a better," and chronicles the fact that those "colonies are perishing for the want of labor." It says:

"Our attention has been directed to a report of the council on immigration for the Island of Trinidad, which shows how a British colony may decay while all around it is flourishing. If Trinidad had remained under Spanish sway, it might, in spite of tyranny and misrule, be the wealthy island which its position and fertility would naturally make it. But we learn that, although the island contains one million two hundred and fifty thousand acres, yet the extent of all the land now under cultivation is about fifty-two thousand eight hundred and seven acres, and of this area the sugar plantations cover only thirty-four thousand and fifty-nine acres. The entire number of agricultural laborers working for wages in the cultivation of sugar and cocoa is only fourteen thousand, of whom nearly eight thousand are immigrants from India and China, introduced at the public expense."

And then speaking of the immigrants from China and India, and eagerly craving their enslavement, continues thus:

"It is found that these are by far better laborers for wages than the negro, who, it is stated, 'will not be stimulated to greater industry by any increase of wages.' And at the present time the planters would gladly obtain labor by an advance of wages. The high price of sugar and other tropical productions, has stimulated enterprise, a greater extent of land is being brought under cultivation, and all that is wanted for the development of the colony, is a supply of hands. Such are the fertility and the abundance of land, that 'the expense of establishing on virgin land, an estate capable of producing two hundred and fifty hogheads of sugar, including the cost of machinery and buildings, would not exceed £6,000 sterling.' But, with the present supply of labor, even the present production of the colony cannot be kept up."

These significant extracts but foreshadow the disposition of the English Government to return in this, the nineteenth century, to a system of slavery more oppressive than the world has ever seen.

That Government, satisfied that the experiment has failed, is beginning to throw aside these misguided notions of philanthropy. They are coming up to the spirit of the age. They have had time to see the working, the effect, the conservative influence of domestic slavery in this country, not only upon the South, but upon the North; and, sir, I hazard nothing in the assertion here to-day, and I appeal to my northern friends for the truth of it, that slave labor and the products of slave labor have done more to build up your Lowells, to aid in the construction of your railroads, to rear your cities, and make you as you justly are, a proud, intelligent, Christian people, than anything else. I say that the cotton-bag has effected more than all other powers together. That proposition cannot be controverted; it will not be controverted. I have statistics, and can demonstrate it clearly to any one, that the products of slave labor have done more, not only to elevate this country in point of wealth and enterprise, not only to develop its resources, North as well as South, but, sir, they have done more to evangelize and christianize the nation than all other causes combined. I see that some of our friends over the way smile at the remark. It is suggested by a friend behind me that they are displeased with the truth of it.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Will the gentleman allow me to request him to read, in connection with what he has already read from the Bible, the fifteenth and sixteenth verses of the twenty-third chapter of Deuteronomy, or to allow me to read them?

Mr. GARTRELL. I will let the gentleman read them.

Mr. LOVEJOY. They are as follows:

"15. Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee.

"16. He shall dwell with thee, even among you, in that place which he shall choose, in one of thy gates where it liketh him best; thou shalt not oppress him."

I would also like the gentleman to quote the eighth commandment in connection with the tenth.

Mr. GARTRELL. I will ask the gentleman a question, and I hope he will answer it categorically. Does the gentleman consider the African equal to the white man?

Mr. LOVEJOY. That depends altogether upon his character, sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARTRELL. The gentleman has read from Deuteronomy to show that thou shouldst not deliver up a slave who escapes from his master. I ask the gentleman whether he abides by that text, or whether he abides by the Constitution of his forefathers and mine, which says that the runaway slave shall be delivered up?

Mr. LOVEJOY. I understood the gentleman to say, in his speech, that the Bible was a "higher law," binding every one; and, in the second place, I abide by the Bible and the Constitution, for the Constitution says no such thing.

Mr. GARTRELL. The gentleman says that he abides by the Bible and the Constitution. Then, sir, he must go South, and settle upon our plantations. We claim you as a slaveholder. We claim you as an advocate of the principle and the practice; for the Bible says—God, in the Bible, Himself says: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's man-servant, nor his maid-servant;" and further on it is expressly inculcated that slaves owe obedience to their masters, and ought to render it; and, furthermore, that they shall be our inheritance, our possession, our bondmen forever.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to proceed very briefly in my line of argument. I was apprehensive that these quotations from Holy Writ might occasion a little fluttering over the way. It is well enough, however, to revert occasionally to sound principles—to go to the fountain-head.

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARTRELL. Certainly.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to farming out the floor in this way.

Mr. STANTON. Does the gentleman [Mr. GARTRELL] understand his quotations from Holy Writ as applying to African slaves?

Mr. GARTRELL. I understand them to apply to all kinds of slavery; while the Africans were, as I understand, the heathen spoken of and alluded to by the Scriptures.

Mr. STANTON. Then, as I understand the gentleman, it is not a question of color or race, but a question of social condition.

Mr. GARTRELL. Having disposed of this branch of the question, and finding my time running short, I deem it unnecessary—

Mr. BURROUGHS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman be allowed to finish his speech, and say all he has to say.

Mr. GARTRELL. I am very much obliged to the gentleman; and I should be very much obliged to the committee if it chose to extend to me this unusual courtesy. I will not, however, claim it. I cannot ask it at its hands.

But I desire to consider another question alluded to by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR,] and it is but a repetition of the argument that seems to have been current in the northern States for many years. It is said, Mr. Chairman, very exultingly, too, that this institution of slavery at the South has a demoralizing effect on the social position of the people of that section. I deny it. I hold, sir, that the statistics of this country show the reverse to be true. If crime, if pauperism, if indigence, if want, if misery, be evidences of demoralization, then to-day the southern people occupy a proud position as contrasted with that of its accusers. I call the attention of gentlemen to some statistics taken from the census report of 1850. Under the head of "crime," I find that in the northern States the number of native-born persons convicted of crime was ten thousand eight hundred and twenty-three; while in the southern States they were but nineteen hundred and seventeen. The number of foreign-born persons convicted of crime in the northern States, was twelve thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine; in the southern States but eight hundred and ninety-four. The total number in the North being twenty-three thousand six hundred and twelve, and in the slaveholding States but two thousand eight hundred and eleven. Then, sir, under the head of "pauperism," I find that the number of native born paupers in the northern States, in the same year, was fifty thousand and twenty-three; while in the southern States it was but sixteen thousand four hundred and eleven. Of foreign-born paupers there were, in the northern States, sixty-three thousand six hundred and eighty-nine; and in the southern States, four thousand eight hundred and forty-nine. Total number of paupers in the northern States, one hundred and thirteen thousand seven hundred and twelve; in the southern States, twenty-one thousand two hundred and sixty.

It is no pleasure to me to read these statistics;

but I read them not only in defense, but in justification of the system of domestic slavery as it exists in my section, and which I am here to-day ready and prepared to defend against all comers and goers. I say that I regret this state of things. I do not refer to them to the disparagement of the intelligence, morality, enterprise, or industry of our northern brethren. They are exempt from it as much as most people are. I honor them for their intelligence; I honor them as Christian people; I honor them for their enterprise; I honor them when they stand by the Constitution of our fathers. But when they seek, as some have sought on this floor, and as others seek elsewhere, to wage war on the constitutional rights of my people, I may be permitted to tell them of their own faults, and to cite the records of their own misfortunes.

But I will not stop here, sir. I will read to you an extract from a report made by a committee appointed a few years ago by the Legislature of New York, and which report throws a great deal of light on this question. This report shows:

"It seems that a committee was sent by the Legislature of New York to look into the condition of the lower and working classes of the city. They report, April 4, 1856, that in twenty-two districts twelve hundred tenement houses are occupied by ten families each, in some by seventy families, others one hundred, and in one, in particular, one hundred and forty-six families, or more than an average of one family and a half to each room! But let the committee speak:

"In the houses visited by your committee, sights were presented to them alike startling and painful to behold. In many, whites and blacks were living indiscriminately together; negro men with white women, and while men with negro women. Young faces, haggard with want and sickness, and bearing that peculiar look of premature old age imparted by early sin, gazed at them from every corner; misery and vice in their most repulsive features met them at every step. Scarcely an apartment was free from sickness and disease, and the blighting curse of drunkenness had fallen upon almost every family. Here and there might be found, it is true, some attempt at cleanliness, some display of a love of home, some evidences of industry and sobriety, with their natural accompaniments, cheerfulness and good health. But these, your committee found, were in most instances families that had not long been inhabitants of the neighborhoods in which they lived. The demoralization and ruin apparent all around had not had time to do their work on them. It is to be feared that too soon the miasmal air will creep into their systems, undermining the sturdy constitution, and prostrating its victims on a bed of sickness. Health failing them, want will follow; and then must come crowding rapidly upon them, neglect of home, neglect of children, uncleanness, drunkenness, and crime. It is no fancy sketch, no picture of the imagination. It is a stern reality, enacted every day in the midst of luxury and wealth, the natural and fearful result of the rapacity of landlords in an overcrowded city, unrestrained by conscience, and wholly unchecked by legislation."

I will not pursue this report further, but I simply recommend it to the attention of the gentleman and of the committee. I did not cite it for the purpose of displaying the misery, the woe, the destitution, and the want of the poorer classes of the North. God knows they have my sympathy and my commiseration. I would that it were in my power to relieve the poor of the North as well as the poor of the South. I have read this extract, not to bring a blush to the faces of my northern friends; I read it in sorrow. I read it, however, with a hope that I might thereby encourage them to begin the good work at home; that I might thereby assist in relieving the poor and miserable and destitute there, by reminding our friends of that charity which begins at home. Where, in the South, Mr. Chairman, could we find misery and want and wretchedness and destitution like that reported by this able and intelligent committee of the Legislature of New York? Go to the negro plantation, if you please, and what will you find? Health, plenty to eat, good clothes, comfortable beds, and but one family in a house. You will ransack even the pages of Uncle Tom's Cabin, and you will find no picture of misery and destitution which will compare with that portrayed in the extract which I have just read. No, sir; that book, which may be justly characterized as a picture, a libel, painted by the hand of slander, will furnish nothing to compare with it.

But, sir, I will not pursue this branch of the argument further. What I have said has been with a view to modify, and soften down, by bringing about reflection and consideration of this question, rather than to excite. I deprecate excitement. I had hoped that in this Congress at least we should have been exempt from the continual excitement upon the slavery question. I had hoped that it would have been taken from the Halls of Congress and left where the legislation of Congress properly leaves it—to the people of the Territory, when they come to frame their constitution and apply for admission into the Union. Sir, these were my expectations, and they were reasonable and just, because the legislation of the country, which received the sanction of Congress and the approbation of the people in the last presidential election, had met this question and taken it from the Halls of Congress and put it into the hands of the people of the Territories when they were prepared to lay aside their Territorial condition and assume that of State sovereignty. But hardly had we met within the walls of this Capitol and Congress organized, before the battle-cry was raised, and

"Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more!" was heard through the ranks of the Black Republican party. Why these continual aggressions? Why deny to us, to-day, our rights under the Constitution of our country? I beg to ask, what have the southern people done to warrant it? When have they ever waged war upon your rights? When have they ever proved recreant to the Constitution of your fathers and ours? When have they ever refused to expend their blood and treasure for the maintenance of the common honor and integrity of the nation? When have they ever failed to stand by their northern brethren in their hour of trial? Sir, the South has always been true and loyal to the Constitution. She is loyal to it now; she is ready to preserve it for your children, and their children—that they, arm in arm, and hand in hand, may perpetuate it to our latest posterity. But, in order to do this, I tell gentlemen plainly, I tell them dispassionately, I tell them coolly and deliberately, that your assaults must cease. Sir, I think I know something of southern loyalty, as well as southern impatience under your encroachments, and I tell gentlemen that the time has come when this question has to be met fairly by your action in this House. Upon the action of this Congress, must depend the union or disunion of this great Confederacy.

Gentlemen need not tell me that I am an extremist, or an alarmist; that the South has threatened disunion before, and, when the hour came, she backed out. Sir, I tell you, this is no idle threat. Indeed, it is not made as a threat, but as a warning. It is my duty to speak thus plainly here, and to announce the deep-seated, unwavering, unalterable determination of the masses of our people at the South, of all parties, to have equality in this Union or independence out of it. It is best that individuals, as well as States, should be plain and candid with each other. I do not speak thus to-day to alarm gentlemen. I am not here to suppose that anything I may say would alarm our friends on the other side of the House. If I speak feelingly it is because I feel deeply on this question of preserving intact the Constitution of the country; of preserving our glorious flag; the sovereignty of the States, and the rights and honor of the South. The Union cannot be preserved unless our rights are protected. I should be recreant to my duty if I did not proclaim this determination no longer to submit to insult and outrage. I have the honor of representing fifteen thousand freemen upon this floor; and I hazard nothing in saying that every man of them will respond "amen" to the sentiments I express here to-day. I hazard nothing when I assert that there will not be found in that constituency one man who is not ready and determined to proclaim as I proclaim to-day, that if you will preserve the Union of these States, you must give us the full measure of our constitutional rights. We ask nothing more; we will take nothing less. Is there anything unreasonable in this?

But, sir, this brings me to the Kansas question, and I understand that I have but five minutes left in which to discuss it.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I renew the request that, by unanimous consent, the gentleman be allowed to go on until he has finished his speech.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object. The gentleman will understand the reason for my objection.

Mr. GARTRELL. I desire to say, for my time is very brief, that what I have said has been directed mainly to the attainment of two objects. These objects are paramount with me to-day. Proud as an American citizen, proud of the country, and the whole country, of the North as well as the South, my object is to demand forbearance at your hands, and preserve, if we can, the Union of our fathers. My second object is to have secured to the people of the South their constitutional rights, fully, entirely, and effectually. You may drive me from my first position; you may force me to abandon the Union; you may tear the stars and stripes under which our fathers fought and won our liberties, and trample it under foot; you may drive me from my advocacy of the Union; but, sir, never, while I have an arm to raise or a tongue to speak, a heart to feel or a hand to strike, can you drive me from the maintenance of southern rights and southern equality.

I tell gentlemen, further, that in order to preserve that Union, you must admit Kansas as a State into this Union with the Lecompton constitution. You must admit her as a slave State, with that constitution. And why? Sir, this whole Kansas question is "in a nut-shell." It depends upon a single principle—it is the doctrine, the principle of non-intervention, sustained by the great Democratic party of the country in the last presidential election. Democrats from New York, Pennsylvania, and other northern States, have gallantly and manfully stood by this principle. I honor them for it. The South honors them for it. They are national Democrats, and, as such, are dear to the people in my section. We honor them for their devotion to principle. But, sir, I said this Kansas question depends upon the great principle of non-intervention. Has that principle been observed? I say it has not. We have had intervention there. It has been the intervention of Walker and Stanton against the South, and in favor of the North, and it does not lie in the mouths of gentlemen to make objection to her admission now. It is true the South has achieved a triumph in Kansas; but it was a victory won over intervention on the part of the officers of the General Government against slavery and against the South.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House. We can take up another bill for discussion.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman from Georgia be allowed to proceed with his remarks to their conclusion.

Mr. ADRAIN. I hope the gentleman will be allowed that privilege, as I understand that the printer will not publish the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks unless they are delivered in the Hall. I hope the gentleman will have the unanimous consent of the House to finish his remarks.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object. I do not understand that there is any objection to the gentleman from Georgia filing the remaining portion of his speech. He asks only that the portion of his speech which he could not deliver here for want of time, shall be published with what he has delivered. There will be no objection to that. Let him hand it to the reporters, and the privilege will certainly be accorded to him.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The reporters have not the right to publish in the official debates what has not been delivered in the House.

Mr. FLORENCE. With the permission of the committee I will say a word. We have, it seems, the edict of the official printer of the debates of the House, communicated at the beginning of the session, that what has not been delivered in the House will not be published in the debates. Such has not been the practice, for heretofore members have been allowed to publish the remarks which they were cut off from making by the hour rule. We might as well decide on this question now as at any other time.

Mr. MORGAN. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. FLORENCE. When the Chair decides that I am not in order, I will take my seat.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the question before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor. There is no question before the House but the bill under consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, who has the floor? I took the floor, and was interrupted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The time for general debate on the bill under consideration has been limited, and I trust that it will be laid aside to be reported to the House, and that the committee will proceed to the consideration of the next bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.
Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor to make that motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understood the Chair to recognize me as being entitled to the floor when the gentleman from Pennsylvania made a motion which could not be entertained.

The CHAIRMAN. No motion in order was made that the Chair heard.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I did not make any motion, and I do not want to. I only want to talk a little. [Laughter.] It was for that purpose I sought the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Neither the gentleman from Pennsylvania nor his colleague, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, made any motion that was entertained.

Mr. FLORENCE. I made a motion which was ruled out, but I do not relinquish the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means made a motion to lay the bill aside, to be reported to the House, but that was not entertained. His colleague, near me, also made a motion, which was ruled out of order. I understood the Chair then to recognize me as entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair gave the floor to the gentleman from Wisconsin, at the expiration of the time of the gentleman from Georgia. He has not yielded it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I am at fault entirely.

Mr. WARREN. I call the gentleman to order; and ask that the gentleman from Wisconsin be allowed to proceed with his speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is not in order, unless the gentleman from Wisconsin yields him the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to state my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is not in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I know the Chair will decide so; but he must first hear my point. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a personal explanation. [Continued cries of "Order!"] Gentlemen may clamor as much as they please. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I rise to a question of order. If gentlemen have not sufficient respect for themselves to keep the order of this House, I hope the Chairman will order the Sergeant-at-Arms to do so.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is no Sergeant-at-Arms in committee.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I am in favor, then, of a motion that the committee rise and ask for that power.

Mr. FLORENCE. So am I. [Great laughter.]

Mr. BURNETT. I call the gentleman from New York to order. He has only increased the confusion.

Mr. FLORENCE. Yes, sir; I call the gentleman from New York to order.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will resume their seats and preserve order. The gentleman from Wisconsin is alone entitled to the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, that the assembling of Congress would be signalized by some definite recommendation from the President of the United States, having for its object the relief of the commercial, mercantile, and industrial classes, now bowed down in such deep distress, was, I think, the general expectation of the country. The position heretofore occupied by the President when in Congress, upon the subject of the currency and tariff, gave assurance, to some at least, that he would have the courage to mark out some plan for the action of Congress which would tend to allay existing evils, and prevent their recurrence hereafter. To all such the message has caused bitter disappointment. Instead of any such measure having been brought forward, the country is now as much in the dark in regard to the financial policy of the Administration as on the day we first met. We are now approaching the close of the second month of the session, and what has been done? So far as anything practical or useful to the country is concerned, I may say literally nothing. Over one half of the present month has been given to the consideration of the outlaw and pirate, William Walker, and his vagabond associates. While the country is crushed beneath a weight of financial calamity such as has been seldom known, and whilst national bankruptcy is staring you in the face, you turn away, and treat with utter neglect all such matters. They are not worthy of the consideration of an American Congress; while a handful of desperadoes command the most distinguished consideration.

The President has discovered, as he thinks, the cause, and sole cause, of our present financial difficulties, but arrives at what I regard as a most lame and impotent conclusion, when he tells us that the Government is powerless to remove or lessen that cause, abate the evil, or in any manner to afford relief.

The President tells you that all our difficulties and financial troubles are to be attributed to our extravagant and vicious system of bank credits and paper currency, and to that alone. I deny the first, and I will proceed to show that this declaration is an artful dodge on the part of the Chief Magistrate, to draw attention from the real causes that have produced such wide-spread financial ruin.

The President is well aware of the prejudice existing in the public mind in regard to banking institutions generally. That prejudice is well grounded, and I do not seek to remove it; but I object to the President availing himself of that prejudice for purposes of concealment of the true causes of the public distress.

It is not my purpose to enter upon a defense of the banking system of this country. I could not defend it. That it has contributed to the present difficulties, I have no manner of doubt; nor have I any doubt but our whole system of banking, as now carried on, is unsafe, dangerous, and corrupt; and I am sure that no gentleman will go further than I will to reform that system, so as to prevent, as far as restraining the banks will prevent, a recurrence of the present condition of affairs.

Our present unfortunate condition may be attributed to numerous causes; but the principal cause is disclosed in the extravagant, corrupt, and corrupting practices of this Government for the past twelve years. That a wise and prudent Administration would have saved us from our present condition, I have no manner of doubt.

In 1841 a bankrupt law was passed, under which a large number of persons who were ruined by the revulsion of 1837 were discharged from their debts, and began the world anew. Of the wisdom of that act I express no opinion. Up to that period every branch of business was prostrate; and, in the opinion of the public men of that day, some action was required on the part of the Government to restore public confidence, put the wheels of our manufacturing establishments in motion, and give employment to the millions then in idleness. The result of that conviction was the tariff act of 1842. Under that enactment business speedily revived; our credit, at home and abroad, rose rapidly; and the effect of the then recent financial disaster was fast passing away; labor, the foundation of all wealth, found ready employment and ample pay, and the whole country was jogging on in a career of happiness and prosperity. There was no unhealthy inflation of prices, or wild spirit of speculation abroad among the people. While all was peace and quietness within our borders, the public mind was startled by the proclamation of President Polk, declaring that our soil had been invaded by a foreign foe. Upon that proclamation, this House, upon a discussion of twenty-five minutes, declared war to exist by the act of Mexico: a declaration, in my opinion, wholly unjustified by the facts then in possession of Congress, or of facts afterwards disclosed.

The effect of that hurried declaration was to precipitate us into a war with a foreign Power, from which we did not emerge until we had sacrificed eighty thousand lives and over two hundred millions of dollars. It is not necessary to my purpose that I should speak of the objects for which that war was prosecuted; and I now only speak of it as it affects our present unfortunate financial condition. The primary effect of that war was to unsettle the public mind. Thousands who were engaged in the quiet walks of life, impelled by patriotism or some other motive, abandoned the plow, the loom, and the anvil, to meet a hostile foe on a foreign soil. While those who went were withdrawn from the condition of producers at home, those who remained behind partook of all the excitement of those who went. "Halls of the Montezúmas" sprang into existence in every hamlet, and our before staid population became revelers therein.

This, then, was the first shock to that stability of the public mind, which has led to such results. To carry on that war required over one hundred million dollars. That vast sum was raised upon the credit of the Government, and was mostly drawn from abroad. That sum was disbursed while the war continued; and though a portion was paid out within the limits of Mexico, it nearly all went into the hands of our own citizens, and was soon nearly all in circulation within the United States. Thus was upwards of two hundred millions added by the Government to our circulation in a short space of time—a sum nearly equal to the entire paper circulation at this time, and far exceeding what it then was.

In addition to this large sum, you, about the same time, commenced the issue of land warrants, which you have kept up since, until an amount representing thirty or forty millions has been thrown upon the market; and as, to some extent, they entered into circulation and took the place of money, they to that extent still further contributed to the inflation.

No person at all familiar with the subject of the currency can doubt what the effect of that large increase of the circulating medium was; and it may safely be set down as a principle in political economy that cannot be controverted, that if you increase the quantity of the circulating medium, you will inflate prices in the same ratio, regardless of the fact whether that medium be coin or something to represent it.

Thus it was that our country first became inflated, and the steady habits of our people were broken up and destroyed.

In 1846 the tariff bill of Mr. Walker was passed, greatly reducing the duty on imports. The high prices caused by the inflation, added to the low rate of duties, invited to most extravagant importations, nearly doubling in the four years, from 1847 to 1851; and there would then have been a general break down, had not extraordinary causes intervened to put off the evil day. Those causes were the discovery of gold in California and Australia, whereby an increase of $900,000,000 has been added to the currency of the world—an increase unparalleled in the world's history, and which has wrought a revolution in prices throughout the length and breadth of this Republic.

The tendency of this increase of prices consequent on the great increase of currency, whether metallic or paper, most unquestionably has been to stimulate extravagant importations from abroad. The only other instance that I am aware of in the world's history where the metallic currency has been greatly and suddenly inflated, was at the time of the discovery of the mines of Mexico and Peru, in the sixteenth century, by Spain. The tendency of money is to equalize its value in all countries having intercourse with one another; and if brought in extraordinary quantities into one country, quickly spreads itself throughout the rest.

The manner in which this diffusion is brought about is perfectly plain. Take the case of Spain, which was the nation to which came the great influx of gold and silver after the conquest of Peru. This influx of the precious metals, by greatly adding to the money in circulation, at once raised the price of all Spanish commodities, and all articles used in that country, far above the level of prices elsewhere. As soon as this took place, foreign nations found an immediate profit from sending goods into Spain, and selling at the high prices there, bringing back gold and silver received in exchange, and repeating the transaction. Thus the treasures poured into Spain and Portugal soon found their way all over Europe, in the same way and for the same reason that the treasures poured in upon us from California have left us and been distributed among the other nations of the world; and thus it will always be, whenever a country has more than its share of money it is sure to lose it by the excessive import of goods, which the enhancement of prices is sure to occasion, until the value of the circulation and prices are equalized and at par with the money and prices of neighboring countries. The result of our redundant circulation and high prices, we have seen, has been to enable the foreign manufacturer to drive our own industry from the field of production, to draw from us our coin, and leave us little better than a nation of bankrupts.

The speculations of different minds as to the true causes of our present difficulties, are numerous and discordant.

The President tells you that it is one thing, and that alone; another tells you that it is the fault of our tariff system, inviting to extravagant importations and overtrading; and a third, that it all arises from a spirit of extravagance in the people, the lust of wealth, a desire for show, regardless of the obligations of honor, justice, and truth. The persons who advance these different theories are all more or less right. That the reason assigned by the President is true to some extent, it would be vain to deny; but I have shown, that while that may be one cause, it is far from being the leading cause. That is found in the extravagance, folly, and bad example of the Government; an extravagance that has run up the annual expenses of carrying it on, from $46,000,000, in 1852, to $75,000,000 at the present time. If the banks have in the last few years expanded to an alarming extent, it is but the legitimate fruit of your own extravagant expansion. But on looking at the tables that the Secretary of the Treasury has furnished in regard to the banks, I find that their circulation during the last four years has been very uniform, and that their loans and discounts have not increased in proportion to what the Secretary estimates to be the annual natural increase of the commerce of the country.

The second class of persons who trace all our woes to the tariff of 1846, quite overlook, in my opinion, the inflation which has contributed so much to render that tariff so destructive to the best interests of the country. That enactment was bad enough at the best; but had the volume of our currency only increased in proportion to the natural wants of the country, I do not presume that our overtrading would have ever reached to our late pitch of extravagance, and I agree with the President, that if you allow your circulating medium to be inflated to an unlimited extent, your tariff laws are impotent for purposes of protection. What our manufacturers want is not high protecting laws, but laws that shall be stable in their character; laws that will not be rendered inoperative and void by shifting legislation or periodical inflations and depressions in the currency. The third class, who discover the cause of all our misfortunes in the extravagance and folly of society, forget to look back to the causes of that extravagance and folly. That the nature of the men and women of to-day differs from that of those of fifteen years ago, no one believes; but different causes acting at a different time upon the same humanity, produce different results. A plethora of money is one of the greatest evils that can befall the manners and morals of any country, and to that cheapness of money and credit, resulting from the extravagance of Government, and the discovery of California gold, may be safely attributed that wild spirit of extravagance and speculation, which is by some mistaken for the cause of our late disasters.

As the greatest of the evils attendant upon our late system of business, I do not reckon the loss of fortune that has overtaken so many, sweeping them away from the busy haunts of business in a single night. Such as have maintained their integrity will rise again, wiser and better men for having been subjected to the "uses of adversity;" but the greatest of our evils grows out of that debauched state of public and private morals which has grown up side by side with the extravagance of Government.

Were I so inclined, I should be powerless to describe the condition to which society had been brought previous to the late revulsion. It was time for a revolution and revulsion; and I am glad it was delayed no longer. It would have been far better could it have come years ago. Had it not come now, it is fearful to contemplate the lower deep of extravagance, wickedness, and folly to which we were hurrying on. Amidst the artificial rise of every species of property, consequent upon the expenditure of the money borrowed abroad by the Government, and the influx of gold from California, imaginary fortunes were rapidly accumulated, and an appearance of prosperity created, such as was never before known. Among the worst effects of this state of things, was the complete change wrought by it in the manners and habits of the people. Frugality and economy we have seen followed by a reckless profusion, a disdain of the homely and honest ways of former times, and a disgusting and self-degrading aping of aristocratic manners and ways of life. Forgetting that the great business of life must be carried on by men and women, a rage for display and showy and superficial accomplishments appears to have seized upon all classes. From this condition of things, it is to be hoped that we are about to be delivered; and that some policy may be adopted that will prevent a similar recurrence for a long time to come.

But I have little faith in the adoption of any such policy. It is quite evident that the President and his Cabinet are not a unit in their governmental policy. The President is evidently a protectionist. He has told the country before, and he repeats it now, though in different language, that "if you will reduce the currency from its nominal to its real value, you will cover the country with blessings and benefits." Why? Because the effect of such reduction would be to afford protection to our domestic industry greater than any tariff law can afford, and thus "give us possession not only of the home market, for our manufactures composed of raw materials the production of our own country, such as cotton, iron, and woolen fabrics, but would have created for themselves a foreign market throughout the world."

The Secretary, on the other hand, devotes a number of passages of his report to an attempted explosion of the protective policy, and argues to considerable length, that whatever benefits the manufacturer must necessarily impose a corresponding burden upon the consumer, and that the injury sustained must be in proportion as the consumers exceed the number of manufacturers.

The Secretary congratulates the country upon the growing popularity of free-trade doctrines, as evidenced by the "strong feeling in the public mind for the extension of our territorial limits," which he can account for in no other way than as evincing a desire to increase the "area of free trade." If the free trade here spoken of means free trade in negroes, then I shall decline to dispute the point with him. While the President and Secretary do not appear to be entirely in coincidence upon the subject of protection, they also appear to disagree somewhat as to the cause of our present difficulties. While the President attributes them to one cause only, which cause is declared to be our "extravagant and vicious system of paper money," the Secretary says that "we must look beyond the banks, to the operations of other corporations as well as individuals, to fathom the entire cause of difficulties." But it is not my business to reconcile the differences of this Democratic household. I beg to call the attention of the House to some of the figures and estimates of the honorable Secretary. The other day, when the House was rushing through in such hot haste the shin-plaster or Treasury note bill, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Ritche] pointed out a strange want of consistency between the President and Secretary.

In the message the President boasts in ostentatious language of the sub-Treasury, declared that whatever might become of other folks, the "Government will continue to discharge its liabilities to the people in gold and silver;" speaks of a loan as a thing barely possible; and declares that it shall be avoided if possible. Who could possibly believe from reading this high-sounding language, that at that very moment the Secretary had slipped in at the back door of the Capitol, and was beseeching Congress for authority to issue $20,000,000 of "wild-cat and red-dog" with which to pay off the public creditors, whose liabilities, the President had just declared, would be discharged in gold and silver only? If all we hear be true, the Secretary did not apply to Congress a whit too soon; for it is currently reported that for some little time past, the public creditors have not been able to obtain either gold, silver, or wild-cat.

The Secretary, in asking for the privilege to issue twenty millions, holds out the idea that they may not all be wanted. I have been looking over his estimates. It will perhaps be deemed presumptuous in me to arraign the figures and estimates of so experienced a statesman as he; nevertheless, I shall take the liberty of doing so.

The Secretary estimates the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858, at the sum of $75,389,934 08, made up as follows:

Balance in Treasury, July 1, 1857	$17,710,114 27
Received for quarter ending September 30, 1857	20,929,819 81
Estimated receipts during the three remaining quarters to June 30, 1858, are—
From customs	33,000,000 00
From public lands	3,000,000 00
From miscellaneous sources	750,000 00

Estimated aggregate for the service of the current year $75,389,934 08
Expenditures for year ending June 30, 1858: 74,963,058 41

Leaving a balance in the Treasury July 1, 1858, of $426,875 67

which appears to be sailing pretty close-hauled on the wind.

The estimates by which the above result is arrived at, will not, in my opinion, bear the inspection of impartial scrutiny; but if they are correct, it is pretty evident that we shall be called upon for more aid before the fiscal year closes, because the sum then left in the Treasury will be wholly inadequate to an easy administration of the financial department of the Government; as it was shown during the progress of the Treasury note bill through Congress, that to meet the wants of the Mint and other exigencies, the Government could not get along with less than six millions at all times in the Treasury.

How then are you to get along when that balance is reduced to $426,875 67, as the Secretary says it will be July 1, 1858?

But that you will not have even that meager balance, I will now proceed to show.

To arrive at that result, and bring the Government to the end of the year with that beggarly sum, he makes the following estimates for the last three quarters, ending June 30, 1858:

From customs	$33,000,000
From public lands	3,000,000
From miscellaneous sources	750,000

Total receipts for three quarters $36,750,000

Let us now examine and see how the Secretary arrives at the above figures. He first assumes that our ratio of annual increase in importations for the last few years has been ten per cent., and that they will go on to increase in that ratio for years to come. How a gentleman of the reputed sagacity and judgment of the Secretary, or how any gentleman possessed of ordinary intelligence, could have ventured on that assumption, is quite incomprehensible, and imposes upon me the necessity of an examination into the position thus taken by him.

I think that it may be laid down as a safe principle, that no nation can go along uninterruptedly for a great length of time, increasing her importations much more rapidly than it increases in population and ability to pay. The increased ability to purchase of foreign imports depends principally upon the increase of population and labor to produce the necessary articles for export in exchange for foreign commodities. The invention of labor-saving machinery may have increased the efficiency of labor so as to render our people more able to purchase largely than formerly; though that, when applied to all the people of the United States, is questionable. If, then, this principle is correct, let us see where its application will lead us.

The increase of population for the decade from 1800 to 1810 was thirty-six and forty-five one hundredths per cent., or about three and six tenths per cent. per annum. From 1810 to 1820 it was thirty-three and thirteen one hundredths per cent. From 1820 to 1830 it was thirty-three and forty-nine one hundredths per cent. From 1830 to 1840 it was thirty-two and sixty-seven one hundredths per cent. From 1840 to 1850 it was thirty-five and eighty-seven one hundredths per cent.; showing a remarkable uniformity in the increase of our population, which has averaged about three and one half per cent. per annum. An examination of the table of imports from 1820 to 1850 will disclose the fact that, on an average, our imports just about kept pace with our population. Since 1850, our importations have rapidly increased, by reason of the disturbing causes which I have before alluded to, and not because of the increasing wants or ability of the country. When we remove that disturbing cause, importations, instead of going on to increase at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, which is about three times as fast as our population increases, will fall back to what they were before these disturbing causes commenced.

To return, then, to the Secretary's figures; he says that for the corresponding three quarters of last year, the amount of merchandise imported subject to duty was $210,000,000; to which he adds ten per cent. ratio of increase—$21,000,000—making the total amount that would be imported, were there no disturbing cause, $231,000,000.

Now, he says, that the derangement in business will probably cause a falling off of twenty-five per cent. in our imports; or in other words, I suppose that he means, that by reason of hard times, we shall get along with twenty-five per cent. less of articles of foreign merchandise than we otherwise should, and makes the account stand thus:

There would have been imported had there been no revulsion.....	$231,000,000
Deduct, by reason of revulsion, twenty-five per cent.....	57,750,000
Leaves.....	$173,250,000

Or, as the Secretary calls it, in round numbers, $174,000,000. Upon that amount of dutiable imports the Secretary estimates that the average duty under the late tariff act will amount to about nineteen per cent., thus giving him, as a revenue from customs for the three quarters ending June 30, 1858, $33,000,000. That this estimate is erroneous to the extent of $8,000,000 at least, I believe that I can satisfy every candid mind that will give attention.

The Secretary assumes that by reason of the hard times, our falling off from the corresponding quarters of last year will be fifteen per cent.; that is to say, he first adds ten per cent. for the natural increase in case there was no disturbing cause, to the amount of last year, and then deducts for derangement in business twenty-five per cent.; leaving as his estimate eighty-five per cent. of the imports of the corresponding quarters of last year as the imports for this.

That this estimate is a very liberal one, I think every one will admit. That it is one that we can safely trust, I do not believe. Is there a man in this House who believes that, for the last three quarters of this year, we shall buy eighty-five per cent. in quantity abroad of sugar, molasses, iron, cotton and woolen goods, and other articles, such as we usually buy, as for the corresponding quarters of last year? But, taking the Secretary's figures, and allowing that we do purchase abroad eighty-five per cent. in quantity, will it give the revenue that he supposes? Clearly not. Why? Because that eighty-five per cent. in quantity of merchandise will, by reason of the greatly reduced prices, fall far below the $174,000,000 that it would have cost last year.

It is well known that this revulsion has not confined itself to this country, but has been felt with equal, or greater, severity in England and on the continent of Europe; and it is a somewhat remarkable fact, that the severity of the pressure has been greatest in those places which had an exclusive metallic currency. The effect of this revulsion has been to reduce the price of nearly every article we import from abroad from twenty-five to fifty per cent. To be on the safe side, I will call it twenty-five per cent.

Suppose, then, that you import eighty-five per cent. in quantity, what will be the cost of that quantity? Certainly not $174,000,000, but twenty-five per cent. less than that, or only $130,000,000 in value, on which duties will be collected, allowing that the tariff of 1857 will give an average of duties of nineteen per cent., as claimed, and you have, as the receipts from customs, $24,700,000, instead of $33,000,000, being an overestimate from customs alone of the moderate sum of $8,300,000. It probably may be said that the Secretary, in estimating our imports at eighty-five per cent. of last year, did not refer to quantity of commodities, but their cost. If he means that, it is equivalent to saying that we shall, during this year, import a greater quantity of merchandise than ever before—a statement that everybody knows cannot be true.

To narrow this question down to a point where it will be apparent to the lowest comprehension,

I propose to take up the finance report, and invite your attention to one or two leading articles from which revenue is derived.

I will first call your attention to the articles of sugar and molasses, which are objects of universal consumption. The amount of importations of those two articles for the year ending June 30, 1857, were as follows:

Sugar.....	$42,614,604
Molasses.....	8,259,175
Total.....	$50,873,779

On which a duty was paid of over fifteen million dollars, or about one fourth of all the revenue from customs was received from that source for the last year.

Now, I have shown in general terms that the Secretary had over-estimated for this year, $8,300,000, and now I shall show that that over-estimate may be found in the articles of sugar and molasses alone. The fact is known that there was a short crop of sugar in Louisiana in 1856. From five hundred thousand hogsheds, which it had been, the product fell to less than one hundred thousand hogsheds. Two consequences followed this failure of crop; first, a very large importation to supply the deficiency; and, second, a great enhancement of prices, so that the value of the importation, which was only about thirteen million dollars in 1855, in 1857 reached the enormous sum of over forty-two million dollars! The cause that produced that vast accession to our revenue last year has ceased. The Louisiana crop is a good one; add to that the further fact, that there are now immense stocks of foreign sugar and molasses in the warehouses of the principal cities, and you will say that I am justified in declaring, that the imports of sugar and molasses for the last three quarters of this year, will not reach in quantity one half what they were for the corresponding period last year. The price has fallen off about one half.

For the last three quarters of last year you imported about thirty-eight million dollars of sugar and molasses in value, on which a thirty per cent. duty was paid, of about eleven million five hundred thousand dollars. This year, during that period, you may import one half the quantity, at one fourth the cost of last year's importation; so that your sugar and molasses of the three last quarters of this year, instead of paying duty on $38,000,000 will pay duty on perhaps $10,000,000, at twenty-four per cent., instead of thirty per cent., a duty of $2,400,000. Thus, on these articles alone, you will sustain a falling off in revenue of $9,100,000, a larger sum than I allowed in my general estimate, as the falling off from all the articles of merchandise that are entered for consumption. To carry out my illustration still further, I might call attention to the article of railroad iron, which has heretofore been a large source of revenue; but, as I have not time to more than advert to it, I pass on.

Having shown a very large over-estimate on the receipts from customs, I now propose to show a much larger over-estimate, in proportion, from the sales of the public lands. The estimate from that source is put down by the Secretary, for the three quarters, as $3,000,000; an estimate, in my opinion, wholly unjustified by any state of existing facts. It is well known that during the corresponding quarters of last year, there was a great, and, I may say, an unusual desire pervading the entire community, to acquire public land. This desire, the result of easy credit and a redundant circulation, did not confine itself to the new States, as the members of this House from the old States know.

Now, under this condition of great and unnatural activity, what were the receipts into the Treasury for that period from the public lands? Let us see:

For the quarter ending December 31, 1855.....	$808,252 86
For the quarter ending March 31, 1857.....	1,065,640 11
For the quarter ending June 30, 1857.....	1,063,213 28
Total.....	$2,937,106 25

With the above figures before him, and with full knowledge in regard to the depression in business that has affected all classes and conditions of men, he tells us that he expects to receive $3,000,000, or $62,893 75 more than for the corresponding period of last year.

This proposition of the Secretary only requires to be stated for its absurdity to be apparent. My judgment is, that the receipts from that source will not exceed one half of what they were for the same period last year, and shall accordingly put down the receipts from sales of the public lands at $1,500,000; receipts from customs, for the three last quarters, $24,700,000; miscellaneous sources, $750,000; total, $26,950,000; which is $9,800,000 less than the Secretary estimates, and which, instead of leaving a surplus in the Treasury, at the end of the year, of $426,875 67, it will be left with a deficiency of $9,373,123 33.

But, to press our examination a little further, we shall find that, to enable the Secretary to bring the Treasury to the close of the year, with the meager balance of $426,875 67, he has postponed the payment of existing appropriations for the service of the present fiscal year to the year ending June 30, 1859, to the extent of $16,586,588 35; so that, if these appropriations were expended within the year for which they were made, there would be a deficiency at the end of the year, taking the Secretary's own high estimates, of $16,159,712 68; to which add the sum of $9,800,000, which I have shown should be deducted from these estimates, and you have the real deficiency, on the 1st July next, as $25,959,712 68.

To enable the Secretary to present the balance he does at the close of the year, he not only postponed the large sum that I have before indicated; but I think has under-estimated the expenditures for the three last quarters of this year at least $10,000,000. He estimates the expenditures for that period at $51,248,530 04, but gives no details by which to judge of the correctness of the estimate; and we can only judge them by the preceding quarter ending September 30, 1858. The expenditure for that quarter, exclusive of what was paid to redeem the public debt, was $21,763,745 81. In view of what is transpiring on our frontier, it cannot be wide of the mark to say that the expenditures cannot fall much short of what they were the first quarter of the year for each of the three last quarters. Here, then, is over ten millions more to add to preceding deficiencies.

But I am not going to leave the Secretary here; but propose briefly to examine his estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859. The Secretary is evidently a hopeful man. It is a happy characteristic to be possessed of; but I submit to the House that it is not a quality to be sought or desired in the character of the man to whom is intrusted the management of the finances of this Government. The prudent and safe financier always looks at the worst aspect that his affairs present; and guards and protects himself accordingly. Not so our Secretary; but like a bankrupt merchant, who fears to look at his books, and face the state of facts there disclosed as they really are, he blunders on, expecting "something to turn up" to rescue him from impending ruin.

That I do the Secretary no injustice, in declaring him to be of a too hopeful and visionary character to be a safe counselor in the Department which he occupies, I think I have already shown; but if I have not, perhaps may do so before I close. The coolest, best informed, and most calculating men do not regard the late revulsion as a mere passing shower, to be immediately followed by balmy breezes and pleasant sunshine, but rather as a terrible equinoctial storm, producing a great upheaval in the ocean of business from its lowest depths, and sweeping away with its mighty surges that plant of slow growth, confidence—and with it the whole superstructure of mercantile credit. The wisest and most experienced among mercantile men believe that it is a work of time to restore that confidence, and rebuild thereon the structure that has been swept away. I know the courage and recuperative energy of our people, which no calamity has power to subdue. Indeed, like General Taylor, at Buena Vista, who did not know when he was whipped, so a Yankee does not know when he is broke. But with all our will, all our courage, and all our energy to overcome difficulties, we still want a little time. To ask us to believe that in a year's time from now our importations are going to return to what they were one year ago, with twenty per cent. added, is playing the "confidence man" a little too strong.

The Secretary estimates the receipts into the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, at $75,926,875 67, made up as follows:

Estimated balance in Treasury, July 1, 1858,	$426,875 67
Receipts from customs for the year ending June 30, 1859.....	69,500,000 00
Receipts from sales of public lands for the year ending June 30, 1859.....	5,000,000 00
From miscellaneous sources.....	1,000,000 00

Aggregate for the year ending June 30, 1859, $75,926,875 67

To obtain the above revenue, the importations of dutiable goods for that period are estimated at $370,000,000, a sum larger by $75,000,000 than was ever imported into this country in a single year. It is a safe calculation to say that the average of prices for the next eighteen months will range at twenty per cent. less than for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857; and looking at the effect of the revulsion of 1837, it would be a liberal allowance for the country to give it the same quantity of foreign merchandise for the year ending June 30, 1859, that it had in the year ending June 30, 1857, the period of our greatest expansion. That quantity under then existing prices, cost $294,160,835. Under the probable prices for the next eighteen months, it would cost $235,328,668, which, at the average duty of the new tariff of nineteen per cent., would give a revenue of about $45,000,000, a falling off from the Secretary's estimates of $24,500,000, for a single year in the customs alone.

To suppose it possible for our importations of dutiable goods to reach $370,000,000 for the year ending June 30, 1859, we must first suppose a return to that same "vicious system of bank credits" and expansion from which we have emerged, and which, as the President says, invited to such vast and ruinous importations and speculations, and also to a return of the same condition of reckless extravagance and folly in society; for, in consequence of the latter alone, were we able to make way with such vast quantities of foreign gewgaws as we have heretofore imported. I presume that the Secretary does not expect or desire a return to that condition of things, for he tells us that, "the only efficient remedy for such evils is to be found in a return to the prudent counsels and steady habits which, for a long time, were unhappily laid aside." How then does the Secretary expect importations of $370,000,000, from which to draw $69,500,000 of revenue?

The experience of every man tells him that there is a strong feeling pervading the minds of all classes of community, that retrenchment in expenditures is necessary. Heretofore, our people have bought not only liberally, but extravagantly; hereafter, and until the occurrences of the past have been forgotten, they will buy prudently and sparingly. The old coat will be worn a little longer, and wives and daughters will not complain of having "nothing to wear," even though they should not have a new dress for every day in the year.

With the present reduction of our currency from its nominal to its real value, and the habits of economy which it imposes, I am satisfied that our revenue will fall off even more than I have before indicated. It is in vain for the Secretary to draw a different deduction from the supposed value of our exports during that period; for, unless I am quite mistaken, our exports will fall off as much as our imports.

The total exports for the year ending June 30, 1857, exclusive of specie and bullion, were $278,906,713, made up as follows:

From cotton.....	$131,575,859
From provisions and breadstuffs.....	74,667,852
From tobacco.....	20,662,772
From rice.....	2,290,400
From other articles.....	49,709,830
Total.....	$278,906,713

The Secretary admits that our exports of provisions and breadstuffs may fall off some, "but that the increased value of the exportations of cotton will probably make up the deficiency," and that in the worst view our exports will not fall short over ten per cent. I disagree with him. That his high hopes in regard to cotton are doomed to disappointment must be evident to every person who has lately watched the cotton market. From the most reliable sources that I have had access to, I learn that the cotton crop of this year will fall three or four hundred thousand bales short of last year. That the tendency of the decline in prices will be to decrease the exportation must be apparent. That such has already been the effect is well known. Last year, at a certain period in December, there were one hundred and forty-eight vessels in the United States loading with cotton for Great Britain and France, against one hundred and five vessels at a corresponding period this year, clearly showing that a diminished quantity is going abroad this year. But admitting that the quantity shall be the same, the great falling off in prices must very seriously affect the last year's aggregate. It appears by the finance report that the price of cotton last year was very high, higher by twenty-five per cent. at least than it has been for the past five years, the average price being twelve and fifty-five one hundredths cents per pound. At the present moment it is only worth about nine cents.

The following table will show the relative prices of cotton, January 1, 1857, and January 1, 1858:

	Uplands.	Florida.	Mobile.	New Orleans and Texas.
Ordinary.....	11½	11½	11½	11½
Middling.....	13	13	13½	13½
Middling Fair.....	13½	13½	13½	14
Fair.....	14½	13½	14	14½

NEW YORK CLASSIFICATION, JANUARY 1, 1858.

	Uplands.	Florida.	Mobile.	New Orleans and Texas.
Ordinary.....	9	9½	9½	9½
Middling.....	9½	9½	9½	9½
Middling Fair.....	9½	9½	9½	9½
Fair.....	9½	9½	-	-

The falling off in price is twenty-five per cent. from last year. Admitting that it goes no lower than the average of the last five preceding years, and that the same quantity is exported as last year, and your receipts will be, from cotton, $98,681,895.

The falling off in provisions and breadstuffs will largely exceed, in proportion, the loss on cotton. For the past three or four years our exports of breadstuffs and provisions have been largely in excess of previous years, the result in the main of the Russian war, whereby the ports of the Baltic and Black sea were closed, and that great and principal source of supply cut off, leaving this country to supply the deficiency. That cause is removed; and all the grain ports of Europe are now open, and their productions in free competition with ours. In addition to this, all those European countries that have been purchasers of breadstuffs from us were last year blessed with a most abundant harvest. The result we see, not only in the greatly diminished quantity wanted, but also a decline in price of nearly fifty per cent. If, then, we allow that the quantity exported will reach seventy-five per cent. of last year, and that the price has declined forty per cent., the result will be that we shall export breadstuffs and provisions this year to the amount of $33,600,333.

The next largest article of export is tobacco. The quantity exported last year was about six million dollars greater than that of any previous year, which had before never exceeded $14,712,468. How far the quantity exported this year will vary from last, I have had no very good means of judging; but a comparison of last year's prices with the present, at Baltimore, the great tobacco mart, shows a falling off of thirty or forty per cent.; and the greatly reduced price abroad leads to the belief that a diminished quantity will be exported this year; but, allowing that there is not, the falling off in price will reduce the value of our exports of this year twenty-five per cent. from last.

The value of rice exported I shall put down the same as last year; and also all other articles, though it must be apparent that several millions ought to be deducted, and our exports will foot up as follows:

Exports of cotton.....	$98,681,895
Exports of breadstuffs and provisions.....	33,600,333
Exports of tobacco.....	15,497,079
Exports of rice.....	2,290,400
Exports of all other articles.....	49,709,830

The above will represent our ability to pay for importations for the year ending 30th June next, and all that we buy beyond that we must either run in debt for or still further reduce our limited amount of coin.

I have not time to take up and criticise the estimates from the sales of the public lands for the year ending June 30, 1859, and will only say here, that, in my opinion, he has over-estimated at least one and a half millions.

There is one other view of the Secretary's figuring that I desire to present, and then I leave the subject. It appears that, under our extravagant importations of last year, the amount consumed per capita was $8 45. The Secretary estimates that our importations will increase at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, and that our importations will reach $370,000,000 worth of dutiable goods for the year ending June 30, 1859; and as, under the new tariff, the goods not paying duty will reach at least one fourth the amount of those paying duty, the total amount of imported goods for that year, if the Secretary is right, would reach $462,500,000. If you will add to that the Secretary's estimate of increase for the ten years thereafter, you will find that, in 1869, we shall import about twelve hundred million dollars' worth of merchandise, which, making all due allowance for the increase of our population, would give about thirty dollars for each man, woman, and child in the United States, black or white, or more than three times the present amount consumed. I content myself by stating this without comment.

If, then, my estimates are at all correct, they disclose the fact of a deficiency of over nine millions for this year and twenty-six millions for next year, provided you keep your expenses within the estimates, which, in view of the affairs of Utah, Kansas, and Central America, which you have on your hands, nobody believes you will do. If gentlemen on the other side of the House expect to make up that deficiency by borrowing, let them say so at once. The country is impatient to know what the policy of the Government is to be—whether you intend to pay as you go, or saddle your extravagance upon posterity.

Speaking for myself alone, I have to say that, while I hold a seat here, it must be an extraordinary emergency that can induce me to vote for any scheme to raise money, unless a method for its speedy payment shall be at the same time adopted. If free trade and direct taxation is to be the policy, bring it forward. If you intend to depend upon imposts for revenue, then fix your duties at once at such a rate as will give the required revenue; but do not leave the country groping in its present state of uncertainty.

Upon you, gentlemen of the other side of the House, belongs the responsibility of this question of currency and revenue. The Republican party of this House, though representing a large portion of the business and capital of the country, is nearly lost sight of upon the most important committee of the House—the Ways and Means—and New England is ignored entirely.

If I had time, I should be glad to say a word in regard to the existing tariff law—an act which I believed at the time of its passage, and now believe, was ruinous, unwise, and unjust, and which I voted against; but I cannot dwell upon it at any length. That it will prove inadequate to purposes of revenue must be apparent by this time, and must satisfy all reasonable men that its passage was an error. We cannot correct that error any too soon. In looking at the subject now, it passes my comprehension how grave and experienced statesmen could expect that that tariff, with a largely increased free list, and a reduction of duty on dutiable goods to an average of nineteen per cent., and with a foreign valuation, could produce a revenue adequate to the extravagant wants of the Treasury. It did not require great foresight to predict, a year ago, that a financial revulsion was not far off, that would greatly reduce, even under the old tariff act, the receipts from customs; and I confess that I did not share in the fears entertained by some on this, as well as the other side of the House, that if some legislation was not had speedily, all the coin in the country would soon find its way into the sub-Treasury; and it was for this and other reasons, that when the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means brought forward his project to distribute the surplus revenue with the States, that I, almost alone on this side of the House, voted against it.

And now one word in regard to banks and the currency. I have already stated what I thought about the system generally. The doctrine is often advanced that a currency composed in part of bank paper is indispensable, and that a specie currency would be attended with such inconvenience as to render its general use very undesirable. I do not agree to this proposition. It has been my fortune to reside in a community which, for a period of about ten years, from 1843 to 1853, had an exclusive metallic currency, and even up to this time has a very large infusion of the precious metals. I suppose that the "lead mines" of Wisconsin and Illinois furnish the only instance in the United States, this side of California, where a paper circulation has been dispensed with; and how that came about was in this wise: prior to 1843 we had, if not the most worthless currency imaginable, it was because Nebraska, Georgia, and Tennessee wild-cat banks had not then come into notice. Then our circulation was composed of the irredeemable issues of the State Bank of Illinois, which, as between that and real money, were at a discount of about twenty per cent. For a long time the miners submitted to this tax upon their labor; but finally rebelled, held meetings, and resolved that, as their staple brought real money in the eastern markets where it was sold, they would not be put off by the middle men with irredeemable rags. The consequence was, that when the producer refused to receive depreciated paper, the purchaser had to find coin. Gold, which before was so scarce as to be a curiosity, now took the place of paper, and completely drove it out of circulation. Exchange, which before was at a premium of fifteen to twenty per cent., went down to about par. That the people were subjected to no inconvenience in having to use coin instead of paper, I can bear testimony. If a man was desirous of traveling from one extreme of the Union to the other, he could readily and easily carry coin upon his person to meet all necessary outlays.

Now, what our miners accomplished in the way of reforming the currency, may, with concert of action, be accomplished by other producers. At the present moment Iowa and portions of Illinois are overrun with paper money purporting to be issued by banks in Nebraska, and other far-off places, which has driven all good money out of circulation. It passes in limited circles, because the people are deluded with the idea that if they do not receive that for their surplus there is nothing for them. They do not seem to understand the fact, that the man who deals out irredeemable paper to them for their flour, wheat, corn, and pork, receives good money for those commodities when he sends them forward to market. The remedy of the producer is plain; and that is, to refuse to receive anything for his surplus but what the United States Government recognizes as money. But as it may be difficult to secure the concert of action which would be necessary to accomplish this object to its fullest extent, it is well worthy of inquiry if the Government has not the power to impose such burdens upon the banks as will result in giving us a currency of coin or its equivalent. Should Congress impose a tax on all bills under twenty dollars, of such an amount as would exclude them from circulation, and thus substitute in their place coin, which would be used in all small daily transactions, the effect would, no doubt, be most salutary. We should then have, at all times, a large infusion of coin in our currency, and should be less liable to fluctuations than we now are.

It is a very common thing for western bankers to issue money that is payable at some remote and difficult point of access. This plan, as appears from a letter of Colonel Benton, recently published, had its origin with a Scotchman of Aberdeen, about the year 1806. Another Scotchman, from the same Aberdeen, is the father of the same system in the West.

Of all the States, democratic Georgia has been most prolific in giving birth to illegitimate banks for foreign circulation; though the Territory of Nebraska appears to have followed along not far behind. From a recent Chicago paper, it would seem as though Nebraska had brought forth wild cat banks by the litter; and Fontenelle, Florence, Platte Valley, Nemaha, Wanbeck, De Soto, and Tekama, are some of the euphonious names appended to the rag-mills of that far-off Territory, all of which would no doubt have received their quietus from Congress long ago, had it not been for the modern heresy of non-intervention.

The State which I in part represent has perhaps as good a banking law as any other; but even there, in some instances, they come the dodge of practical inconvertibility, by locating their banks in the wilderness, at points existing only in the bankers' imagination; or, if having a real existence, to reach them would be attended with as much difficulty and danger as an exploration of Central Africa.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. Kellogg] has given notice of a bill to allow the sub-Treasury and United States Mint to receive deposits, and to issue for purposes of circulation certificates therefor. At this moment it does not strike me with much favor; and I fear, if once adopted, it would lead to complications on the part of the Government that would be fatal to its well-being; but without prejudging the proposition, I shall wait patiently to hear what may be said in its favor.

Mr. ANDERSON obtained the floor; but he yielded to Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, who moved that the committee rise.

Mr. PHELPS. If the gentleman will withdraw the motion to rise, I will suggest that, by unanimous consent, other gentlemen who wish to speak this evening can do so without depriving my colleague of the right to the floor in the morning.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will withdraw the motion, if that be considered the general understanding.

There was no objection to the suggestion of Mr. PHELPS, and the motion to rise was withdrawn.

Mr. GRANGER obtained the floor.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a personal explanation?

Mr. GRANGER. I cannot.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am sorry for it.

Mr. GRANGER. The Administration is alarmed at its financial condition. It has reason to be alarmed. By extravagance and folly our expenses have run up to eighty or ninety millions a year, while our revenue has run down to twenty-five or thirty. The President has one part of the Army in the Rocky Mountains, blockaded by snow and the Mormons; another playing second fiddle to slavery in Kansas; and the remainder fighting for glory with Billy Bowlegs. And now, sir, four regiments more are called for. When I vote any more men to such a commander, I reckon my constituents will find it out.

Sir, the Government is in trouble, and so are the people. The President, in his message, says:

"We find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want, and our financial condition deplorable."

Sir, the country is suffering with great pecuniary distress. Bankruptcy everywhere prevails, and the people are struggling with hard times. At the commencement of the session many an anxious eye sought the President's message for some tokens of relief. The message came and went, and not a ray of hope from that quarter. Pointing to the State banks as though they were the source of all the trouble, the President advises "that no State banks should be chartered unless restricted in their issues of paper to the amount of specie in their vaults," saying:

"All other restrictions are comparatively vain; and nothing else could effectually regulate the currency."

And before he leaves the subject, cautions the sovereign States to compel their banks to keep on hand at least one third of the amount of their issues and deposits in coin—just having told them that "that amount would be vain and entirely inadequate to regulate the currency."

Now, the country looks to us for aid; and shall it look in vain?

There is a cause for all this trouble, and there is a remedy, and that remedy is with the majority of this House.

I ask, then, is there any measure of relief to be proposed? If there is, I trust the minority will find no obstacles in the way, no factious opposition, but will cheerfully cooperate in any measure of relief. The Democratic party, by its mistaken policy, has made the mischief—has caused this financial revulsion and wide-spread misery. It was the repeal of the protective tariff of 1842 and the substitution of the revenue or free-trade tariff of 1846 that did it. It was done without reason, against the light of experience, and in disregard of the voice of the nation as clearly expressed in the election of 1840.

If there was any other cause for the repeal of the tariff of 1842 than that it was a Whig measure, I have it yet to learn. The principle of protection was discarded. Yes, sir, the principle and policy of fostering the industry and labor of the country were denounced and rejected.

With this change of tariff we began to purchase more abroad and manufacture less at home.

The balance scale settled down against us, and the debt to England began to pile up, till it has reached the enormous amount of $500,000,000, and we are all but vassals to the Bank of England.

It holds the rod over us, and can apply it when it pleases, and will do it as interest or pleasure shall dictate.

Whoever thinks that we can have prosperous times, without a good, safe, mixed paper and specie currency, or can have strong, useful banks, with such a foreign debt hanging over us, is mistaken.

A foreign debt that calls for half the gold we dig to pay the interest, mightily dilutes our independence.

The debt must be canceled, and nothing but a return to a steady, unwavering system of home protection can do it.

Vain of that policy we import $20,000,000 worth of woollens a year, every yard of which should be made here, and the money kept at home—while it is said we have not a single broadcloth factory in motion.

One hundred and twenty million pounds of imported wool is brought here for us to wear, which our own hill-sides and prairies could as well produce, and our farmers have the pay for it.

Nineteen million dollars in steel, railroad, and other iron, is made for us in foreign lands, by foreign hands, while our own iron-works are still, and our workmen idle and begging for employment.

Sir, our own home-grown cotton must be toted off to England for her to spin and send back for us to pay for at ten times the price she gave us for it; and this is what is falsely called free trade.

For this deceptive, starving, wretched policy the laboring man is decoyed to vote the Democratic ticket.

Sir, the single article of iron for a single year, had it been made here, as it might have been, and should have been, and would have been under the tariff of 1842, would not only have kept the money here, but it would have furnished employment for fifty thousand men, and have made comfortable three hundred thousand women and children, and they, in turn, would have made a home market for the farmer equal to the whole amount sold Great Britain.

Sir, it is for the party who, for good or evil, rule the country, to retrace their steps and allow this road to ruin to be trod no longer. What has been already lost cannot be restored. The wounds may be healed, but the scars will remain.

Sir, there is a way to relieve the country, and there is but one way; and that way is plain before you, and truth and experience point you to it.

It is a tariff for protection and revenue incidental.

A protective tariff never lacks revenue.

It was the protective tariffs of 1824 and 1828 that enabled President Jackson to pay off the war debt of the Revolution, principal, and interest, $100,000,000.

Sir, protection was then a measure of the Democratic party. Then, sir, there was a Democratic party.

The highest of all protective tariffs, that of 1828 was matured and reported by the distinguished Democratic leader, Silas Wright, and sustained by Calhoun and that party, South and North.

Then it was right to look out for number one.

Then it was right to find for ourselves first.

Then it was Democratic to sustain, by legislation, the great industrial interests of the whole country, and to give our own manufactures, mechanics, farmers, and laboring men, a shade of advantage in our own markets over the workmen of foreign countries.

Then it was that Andrew Jackson said: "Place your manufacturers by the side of your farmers, and you cover your country with blessings."

Sir, there was never a more statesmanlike sentiment uttered.

It was as true as the Bible then, and it is as true as the Bible now.

But if you will not do it, give us out and out free trade.

If protection is wrong, free trade is right.

Down with your custom-houses, and save the $3,000,000 a year, the cost of stealings and collection, and support Government by direct taxation, and let every one pay according to his property.

If protection is not right, and nothing is wanted of a tariff but to raise means to carry on the Government, then clearly there should be no tariff at all; for, as it now is, four fifths of the expense of supporting Government is drawn from the pockets of the poor and middle classes—the laborer and the mechanic—

While the property of the rich goes free, and pays nothing at all.

Suppose, then, we have free trade, and try it. If you believe what you say, why do you hesitate?

Don't be afraid to take your own pills.

If they give you the gripes, grin and bear it.

We expect to suffer with you, and misery loves company.

Sir, I tell you nay.

But you have the power, and do as you like.

Ay, and you have the responsibility, also.

Remember, there is a muckle day coming—1860 may be as 1840, and more abundant.

Sir, the party that struck down protection of the labor of our own country legislated for others. Will they not now change their course, and stand by American interests, and Let Great Britain take care of herself?

When the balance of trade is against us, and of course a drain of specie, our banks are on the lookout, and of course will curtail, and consequently the business of the country must suffer.

They are now doing it, and are forced to do it. It is an act of self-defense and they are doing right.

The policy of protection is as necessary to the health and usefulness of the currency as it is to the prosperity of the people.

Neither the one nor the other can prosper without it, but are mutually dependent on it and on each other.

No Executive homœopathy can do a particle of good. The disease is too deep-seated.

There is but one great grand remedy for our pecuniary and financial troubles, and that is to return to a steady unwavering system of home protection.

Not as a temporary or party measure, but as the settled policy of the country.

A policy that while it makes us prosperous and happy, it secures our independence.

It would amply provide for the expense of Government—render us independent of foreign countries—keep good a basis for the banking system of the States, and thus favorably visit every house and hamlet, and, as Jackson said, “cover the country with blessings.”

We have another source of specie accumulation peculiar to ourselves, one that no other country has.

We receive by immigrants about twenty million dollars a year, and that with the $50,000,000 dug from our own mines, and a well arranged tariff to keep it here and even add to it, we would at no distant day become the head money country of the world. Then, sir, we would have specie enough for a firm, solid basis for a paper currency, and a public credit throughout the world of higher value than gold itself.

Then, sir, we should use paper money as a matter of convenience only and not of necessity.

The tariff of 1828 in four years increased our specie $30,000,000, and with the low tariff that followed we lost it again. With the model tariff of 1842, gold again returned. The banks grew strong and useful; the people were never doing better, and the whole country prospered beyond comparison. Unfortunately the tariff of 1842 was repealed, and with it went the balance of trade, the balance of specie, and we have got for it in return revulsion, great pecuniary distress, a crushing foreign debt, a bankrupt Treasury, and an Administration flourishing its paper money.

Sir, the so-called Democratic party was in error. They were mistaken. They turned a screw the wrong way and deranged the whole machinery, and everything is out of fix.

They now have the advantage of experience and have the power to correct their error, and they alone can do it.

Sir, if they will do it, and if that party will cease its continued and desperate efforts to force slavery on Kansas against her will—“withdraw its legions and restore that Commonwealth to liberty”—agitation will cease and peace and prosperity will be restored to the whole country. Sir, in the name of a suffering country, with all due respect, I ask them to do it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to say anything of the neutrality act of 1818. Enough has been said in this debate, both on this side of the House and upon that, in vindication of that law. Enough also has been said of General William Walker and his raid upon Nicaragua. Enough, and more than enough, sir, has been said in denunciation of the gallant Paulding for his fidelity to duty in arresting this culprit and refugee from justice, and sending him back to answer to the violated laws of his country. The President, sir, has pressed upon the consideration of this House a question of graver significance, of mightier import, a question which concerns the honor and the life of the nation—a question which to-day challenges the profound attention of the whole people of this country—a question upon which, if the official organ of the President is to be credited, this House will soon be required to pronounce its final decision. It is useless to waste the time of the House in demonstrating the position of the President upon this great question. The President and his party not only indorse the Lecompton constitution, but by argument, by entreaty, and by threat, seek to induce Congress to indorse it, and thereby give to it the sanction and the force of law. That journal which is said to be in the favor of the Executive and to reflect his opinions, has told us recently that the question of the adoption or rejection of this Lecompton constitution will be a question between law and faction. I think, sir, it would have been more accurate to have said it is a question between Executive despotism and popular liberty.

I do not recognize the right of the Executive to dictate to this House the manner in which it shall discharge its official duty. It is his province to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and to recommend to its consideration such measures of public policy as he may deem just and proper, but not to control its legislation.

I trust that no member of this body will be influenced in the discharge of his official duties here, and more especially in the discharge of that duty which he owes to himself and his country in the settlement of this great question, by any consideration other than his sense of right and justice. For myself, I am free to say, that notwithstanding the President's solicitude in this behalf; notwithstanding the reported announcement by a distinguished Senator that if Congress reject this slave constitution, his State will secede from the Union; notwithstanding the clamor of the party of the President here and elsewhere; I cannot and will not give my sanction to this Lecompton constitution. This instrument does not emanate from the people of Kansas. It is not their will. Its provisions are in direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and with the principles of eternal justice.

It is conceded, it cannot be denied, that the reason why the convention which framed this instrument refused to submit it to the people for their approval or rejection, was that the people would have voted it down. The proposition, the monstrous proposition, is now made by the President, and by gentlemen on this floor, to establish this instrument as the constitution of Kansas by act of Congress, and against the will of the people of that Territory. Sir, it is the first time in the history of the Republic that the attempt has been made to establish, by Federal authority, a State constitution and government against the will of the people, and without their consent. State constitutions have been formed, and sent to Congress for ratification, without any formal submission thereof to the popular vote; but it was only in cases where the people, beyond all question, made the constitution, by their legally-appointed delegates. This has not been done in Kansas. No delegates have been legally chosen there; nor have any delegates been chosen there at all by the great body of the people.

The delegates who framed this instrument were chosen by a body of men not equal in number to one fourth the whole number of qualified voters in Kansas; and by virtue of an election law passed by usurpers. The constitution thus framed is the joint product of local and Federal usurpation. Let him deny this who can, or who dare. But for Federal intervention the Missouri invasion of Kansas would not have resulted in the election of the first Legislature in that Territory, and in the enactment by that body of a code of laws, so atrocious and unjust, that no man can, or dare approve it. But for Federal intervention the delegates to the Lecompton convention would not have been chosen! But for Federal intervention and the presence of Federal bayonets at Lecompton those delegates would not have thus conspired against the liberties, and insulted the majesty of the people. Now that this act of infamy has been done; now that the rights of the people have been cloven down; now that popular sovereignty in that Territory has been strangled; or, as a distinguished Administration Senator is reported to have said, throttled by the hands of the Federal Executive; we are blandly told to affirm this great crime against popular rights for the sake of the Union, or to use the President's very expressive words, “for the peace and quiet of the whole country.” Sir, it is not the first time that acts of tyranny have been dignified with the title of peace measures. The invader has before now destroyed the vintage, enslaved the people, plundered and burned their habitations, and called the desolation which followed in the train of his conquest, peace!

We were assured the other day by the Court Journal, that “all is quiet in Kansas.” Sir, if there be quiet in that distant Territory, it is not the quiet of contentment, it is not the calm repose of a people secure in their rights and happy in the enjoyment of them; it is the fitful lull which precedes the storm. Look to it, ye wardens of the Union and the Constitution, that by your act the freemen of Kansas are not driven to that point at which forbearance ceases to be a virtue, nay, becomes a crime, and submission the basest cowardice and treason. I was pained, sir, to hear the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WARNER] say in this debate “that the people of Kansas had not the manliness to assert and defend their rights as freemen, and to form their own government,” and yet he was ready “to vote now to admit the State of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.” The first of these assertions, sir, whether so intended or not, is, in my judgment, a calumny upon that injured people, and the last is a concession that the constitution which that gentleman is ready to vote for and sanction was not formed by the people of Kansas.

While I thank the gentleman for this honest concession that the Lecompton constitution was not framed by the people, I beg leave to say to him, and to all who think with him upon this floor, that, notwithstanding his assertion of their want of manliness; notwithstanding he questions their valor, Kansas is peopled with freemen who know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain them. They have the fortitude to endure; they have the courage to dare; they have learned wisdom in the lair of oppression; and to-day, by their defiant attitude, bear witness, that the fires of persecution through which they have walked, are not wholly impotent for good, but may elevate and purify as well as consume. I say, as did the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GARTRELL,] who addressed the House this morning, “I am no alarmist.” I would scorn to invoke any man's fears; I would scorn to appeal to any man's prejudices; I would scorn to anticipate consequences, however imminent or perilous, by way of apology, or colorable apology, for infidelity to duty. I say it deliberately, as the conviction of my mind, that our oaths and our honor, and the peace and prosperity of our whole country, alike demand that, as Representatives of the American people, we should, careless of all consequences, spurn this Lecompton constitution from us. An honest man fears no act of his life so much as duty unperformed, or wrong purposely committed. I repeat it: look to it, ye Representatives of the people, ye men who keep ward and watch over the Constitution and the Union, that the freemen of Kansas are not, by your act, driven to the dread election of submission and dishonor, or resistance unto blood. I tell you, notwithstanding their alleged want of manliness, Kansas has hosts of citizens, good men and true, who will never stoop to be your abject slaves—

“While heaven has light or earth has graves!”

Sanction this constitution, conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, and you can only maintain it by the Federal arm and the Federal bayonet; it can never receive the voluntary support of a free people. Sanction this constitution, and with it sanction, as it sanctions, that code of abominations which the invaders of Kansas enacted, and you compel resistance. Resistance to such legislation would be duty, not crime; patriotism, not treason. The resisters, or insurgents, or REBELS if you please, could point you, in vindication of their rebellion, to the fact that the history of Federal intervention in Kansas, ever since the day of its organization, is but a history of repeated injuries and usurpations.

In vindication of their rebellion, they could point you to the fact, that by your organic act you solemnly pledged the nation's faith that the people of Kansas "should be perfectly free to FORM and REGULATE their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." In vindication of that rebellion they could point you to the glowing words of the great Declaration, that "all men are created equal, and endowed by their Creator with the rights of life and liberty;" and that to secure these rights, "governments are instituted amongst men, deriving their just powers FROM THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED." These words of the Declaration still live; like the words of Luther, they are half battles; they possess vitality; they were accredited in the day of our nation's peril as the law and the voice of God; to-day they announce the great right of self-government, upon which rests the beautiful fabric of our free institutions. Let the wronged men of Kansas, in protest against your proposed act of tyranny—your violation of their natural and guaranteed right of self-government—but appeal to the whole people of America in the living and immortal words of the Declaration, and their appeal will not be made in vain; it will stir the American heart like the blast of a trumpet.

Mr. CLEMENS. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLEMENS. You have cited the language of the Declaration of Independence, that all Governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed. Will you be kind enough to tell me whether, according to the popular system of government, the people can act except under law and by law, or whether there is any such thing, so far as the sovereignty of the people is concerned, as acting except in consonance and conformity with the existing law?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have not claimed anything else than that; therefore the gentleman might as well have saved himself the trouble of presenting such a question for my consideration. But I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he undertakes to say that this Kansas code, called a code of laws, and which this Lecompton constitution expressly indorses, is law? Will the gentleman be so good as to answer that?

Mr. CLEMENS. Who is to decide that question? Is it the people of Kansas?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will tell the gentleman who is to decide that question. We are to decide it, sir; and that gentleman, in common with all of us, is bound by his oath to decide it.

Mr. CLEMENS. Very well. I admit that. I come to another question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I only gave way to the gentleman to ask me one question, and not to occupy my time. He will please excuse me. When I get through I will, if the committee please, answer him till sundown.

Sir, the great right of self-government cannot now be set aside by the puerile conceits of demagogues, whether embodied in a President's message or an instrument framed by conspirators. The Lecompton constitution directly contravenes this right of self-government, and proposes to legalize forever the violation of life and liberty and property, and to establish a government, armed with this fatal power, against the consent of the governed. What colorable apology can be made for this criminal conspiracy against the rights of mankind—for this attempt to repudiate the vital element of American institutions? Surely none can be found in the assertion of the President, that "the requirement to submit the whole constitution to the people was not inserted in the Kansas-Nebraska act;" and "the convention was not bound by its terms to submit any other portion of the instrument to an election except that which relates to the domestic institution of slavery." This is most remarkable language for the Chief Magistrate of the American Republic. The requirement to submit the whole constitution to the people was not inserted in the organic act of Kansas; therefore the convention of delegates, the people's servants, are not bound to submit the constitution which they have framed to their masters for their approval or disapproval! Is the servant greater than his lord—the creature greater than his creator? What are these delegates but the servants of the people? What powers or rights have they not delegated by the people? The right to frame a State constitution is inherent in the people, and is inalienable. It was well said, on a memorable occasion, by a distinguished Senator, then representing, with preëminent ability, the State of Missouri:

"Conventions [to form State constitutions] were original acts of the people. They depended upon inherent and inalienable rights. The people of any State may, at any time, meet in convention, without a law of their Legislature, and without any provision or against any provision of their constitution, and may alter or abolish their whole frame of government. The sovereign power to govern themselves was in the majority, and they could not be divested of it."—Congressional Debates, volume 12, p. 1635.

Mr. CLEMENS. Who said that?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Benton.

Mr. GROW. President Buchanan held the same.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is true; and I shall notice that hereafter. That was Democratic doctrine in 1836, when Michigan applied to be admitted into the Union. Then, sir, the people might make a State constitution without a territorial law, or against a territorial law, because the validity of the act depended not upon any existing statute, but upon the inherent right of the people—their great right of self-government, of which they could not be divested. If the words of the message, just cited, mean anything, they do mean that the people have not the inherent right of self-government; that their right to reject a constitution, framed by their delegates, depends upon a requirement in the organic act binding their delegates to submit the whole constitution to the people, and that all their rights in the premises exist only by virtue of Federal grant. This surely repeals the very words of the organic act of Kansas, which declares that "the people of the Territory shall be left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." They shall be left to form all their domestic institutions, not merely the "institution of slavery," as the President says, but all their local and State institutions. The organic act, by its words, simply affirms the right of self-government to be in the people; it does not profess to confer any such right. A man not yet out of the horn-book upon the law of construction, ought to know that this organic Kansas act does not profess to, and does not, in fact, grant the people the power to form their own domestic institutions, when its language is that it leaves the people, as it found the people, perfectly free, by virtue of their own inherent right, to form their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] following the assumption of the President, insisted that the organic act of Kansas was an enabling act. With all due respect for that gentleman, and with as much respect for the President as he permits me to entertain for him, I beg leave to say that the assertion, that the organic act of Kansas is an enabling act, is an after-thought. The President's party was not of that mind during the Thirty-Fourth Congress, when they clamored, from the Penobscot to the Pacific, for the passage by the House of their enabling Kansas act, which passed the Senate, known as the Toombs bill. No, sir, the organic act of Kansas is not, nor was it intended to be, an enabling act. Nor do I deem it necessary that there should be an enabling act. The Twenty-Fourth Congress, by a most decisive vote, so decided; and amongst those of that Congress who so declared, both by speech and vote, the present Chief Magistrate Mr. Buchanan, was conspicuous. Pending the question for the admission of Michigan upon a constitution made by the people, without any act of Congress or territorial act authorizing it, Mr. Buchanan spoke as follows:

"The precedent in the case of Tennessee has completely silenced all opposition in regard to the necessity of a previous act of Congress to enable the people of Michigan to form a State constitution. It now seems to be conceded that our subsequent approbation is equivalent to our previous action. This can no longer be doubted. We have the unquestionable power of waiving any irregularities in the mode of framing the constitution, had any such existed."

"He did hope that by this bill all objections would be removed; and that this State, so ready to rush into our arms, would not be repulsed, because of the absence of some formalities which perhaps were very proper, but certainly not indispensable."—12 Congressional Debates, pp. 1041, 1042.

It is no answer to say that the question in the case of Michigan was not, as in the case of Kansas, whether the people had the right to pass upon the constitution before Congress should approve it, and admit the State under it. The question in the case of Michigan included this and more; the question there was, whether the people, of their own motion, and without the aid of a statute, national or territorial, could make a constitution preparatory to admission into the Union, which Congress could receive and approve; and it was solemnly, and by the votes of more than three fourths of the Twenty-Fourth Congress, decided they could—that the action of the people without an enabling act was an informality which Congress could waive, and in that case did waive. It is indisputably true that the people of the Territory may themselves waive the formal ratification of the constitution, after their delegates shall have framed it; and in such case may well be held bound by the acts of their agents. But in this instance, the people of Kansas have not so waived their right. I know that it has been assumed in debate here by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR], and that the message of the President proceeds upon the same assumption, that the Lecompton convention was a legally constituted body, and that the legal presumption is, that what they have done has been lawfully done, and is the will and act of the people of Kansas, whose agents they were.

Sir, nothing can be clearer than that the Lecompton convention was not a legally constituted body; that the Legislature which enacted the statute by which the members of said convention were elected, was itself an illegal body, fraudulently chosen; and that their statute was not so executed, even if it had been valid, as to give legal effect to the election held under it.

But, admitting the assumption of the President and his especial advocates on this floor to be true, that the Lecompton convention was a lawfully constituted body: the legal presumption that their act is the act of the people of Kansas, cannot stand before the admitted and known fact, that a very large majority of the people of Kansas wholly repudiate the convention and the constitution presented by it, and are to-day ready to take up arms in resistance of it, and of any government which may be established under it.

There is, there can be, no presumption, either legal or natural, contrary to known and admitted facts. I say, therefore, admitting the President to be right in assuming the legality of the Lecompton convention, his asserted legal presumption against known facts cannot be gravely entertained, and must be scouted by every well informed man, as the veriest quibble, in aid of the most desperate cause. Despite this quibble and the force of this legal presumption, it must be conceded, it cannot be gainsayed, that the delegates who formed the Lecompton constitution, were not chosen by the majority, but, on the contrary, by a very small minority of the people of Kansas; and that it is as well known as the fact that this constitution was made by the delegates thus chosen, that it has been, and is now, emphatically repudiated and condemned by an overwhelming majority of all the people of Kansas. And yet, in the face of this fact, patent to all men, the President and his party on this floor demand that Congress shall fasten this repudiated instrument upon the people of Kansas as their legitimate act, and thereby coerce them to acquiesce in it and accept it as the expression of their will. You call this popular sovereignty; I call it Federal usurpation and Federal despotism; and before I give this proposed act of Federal tyranny my voluntary sanction, either by word or vote, may my right hand forget its cunning and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1st Session.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 26.

But, sir, it is asserted by the President that "the question has been fairly and explicitly referred, (by the schedule of this instrument,) to the people, whether they will have a constitution with or without slavery." With all due deference I submit that the very contrary of this is the truth, and is so clearly expressed on the face of the constitution as to silence all controversy. The seventh section of the schedule contains the provision for the submission of the question of slavery, and the only provision; it is as follows:

"[7.] Sec. 7. That this constitution shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States at its next ensuing session, and as soon as official information has been received that it is approved by the same, by the admission of the State of Kansas as one of the sovereign States of the United States, the president of this convention shall issue his proclamation to convene the State Legislature at the seat of government within thirty-one days after publication. Should any vacancy occur by death, resignation, or otherwise, in the Legislature or other office, he shall order an election to fill such vacancy: Provided, however, In case of refusal, absence, or disability of the president of this convention to discharge the duties herein imposed on him, the president pro tempore of this convention shall perform said duties; and in case of absence, refusal, or disability of the president pro tempore, a committee consisting of seven, or a majority of them, shall discharge the duties required of the president of this convention. [11.] Before this constitution shall be sent to Congress for admission into the Union as a State, it shall be submitted to all the white male inhabitants of this Territory for approval or disapproval, as follows: The president of this convention shall, by proclamation, declare that on the 21st day of December, 1857, at the different election precincts now established by law, or which may be established as herein provided, in the Territory of Kansas, an election shall be held, over which shall preside three judges, or a majority of them, to be appointed as follows: The president of this convention shall appoint three commissioners in each county in the Territory, whose duty it shall be to appoint three judges of election in the several precincts of their respective counties, and to establish precincts for voting, and to cause polls to be opened at such places as they may deem proper in their respective counties; at which election the constitution framed by this convention shall be submitted to all the white male inhabitants of the Territory of Kansas in the said Territory upon that day, and over the age of twenty-one years, for ratification or rejection, in the following manner and form: The voting shall be by ballot. The judges of said election shall cause to be kept two poll-books by two clerks by them appointed. The ballots cast at said election shall be indorsed, 'Constitution with slavery,' or 'Constitution with no slavery.' One of said poll-books shall be returned within eight days to the president of this convention, and the other shall be retained by the judges of election, and kept open for inspection. The president, with two or more members of this convention, shall examine said poll-books, and if it shall appear upon said examination that a majority of the legal votes cast at said election be in favor of the 'constitution with slavery,' he shall immediately have the same transmitted to the Congress of the United States as hereinbefore provided. But if, upon such examination of said poll-books it shall appear that a majority of the legal votes cast at said election be in favor of the 'constitution with no slavery,' then the article providing for slavery shall be stricken from this constitution by the president of this convention, and slavery shall no longer exist in the State of Kansas, (except that the right of property in slaves now in this Territory shall in no manner be interfered with,) and shall have transmitted the constitution so ratified to the Congress of the United States as hereinbefore provided. In case of the failure of the president of this convention to perform the duties imposed upon him in the foregoing section by reason of death, resignation, or otherwise, the same duties shall devolve upon the president pro tempore."

Can it be said that this is a fair submission to the people whether they will have a constitution with or without slavery? I do no more than call attention to the extraordinary and unfair provision that the president of the Lecompton convention, Mr. Calhoun, is to appoint three commissioners in each county; which three commissioners shall appoint three judges of election in the several precincts of their respective counties; and shall also establish precincts for voting, and cause polls to be opened at such places as they may deem proper in their respective counties; the result to be determined by Mr. Calhoun and two other members of the convention. A marvelously fair provision for an election, to provide that one of fifty usurpers shall, by his agents, open the polls and conduct the election in such manner and at such places as he shall deem proper! and, finally, with two of his co-conspirators, determine the result. A complete device this for the successful reenactment of election frauds, without a parallel save in the recent elections in Kansas, held under the same bogus laws which sanctioned this convention. Still more clearly does it appear that the question is not fairly referred to the people, whether they will have a constitution with or without slavery, by the last clause of the seventh section, which is, that although the majority shall vote "constitution with no slavery," "the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with." And to make sure of this, the ninth section of the schedule provides:

"Sec. 9. Any person offering to vote at the aforesaid election upon said constitution shall, if challenged, take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and to support this constitution, if adopted, under the penalties of perjury under the territorial laws."

And to the same effect is the fourteenth section, which provides:

"Sec. 14. That after the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, and change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two-thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention; and if it appears that a majority of all the citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall, at its next regular session, call a convention to consist of as many members as there may be in the House of Representatives at the time, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors, that chose the representatives. Said delegates so elected shall meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the constitution; but no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

A fair submission of the question whether they will have a constitution with or without slavery! It is no submission of the constitution at all. In no event are the people, or any one of them, permitted to vote against the constitution; they can only vote for the constitution with slavery. This is plain; for it is provided if the people should all vote for the constitution with no slavery, yet the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with; and the only effect, therefore, of such a vote, would be to cut off that provision of the instrument which provides for the further importation of slaves into the State. The only question, then, that is submitted to the people is, whether they will prohibit the increase of their slave population by future importations; and before they are permitted to exercise even this privilege, they must, if challenged, submit to the humiliating requirement of taking an oath—a test oath of fealty to their masters and to their masters' work, to wit: that they will support this constitution, if adopted. As I have said, its adoption is made sure, for no one can vote against it; all must vote for it, or not vote at all. And as if to add to the humiliation and sharpen the sting of the indignities thus heaped upon this invaded province of Kansas, the President, with "smooth dissimulation," speaking of the election provided for in the seventh section of the schedule, to be held 21st of last December, says:

"At this election every citizen will have an opportunity of expressing his opinion by his vote 'whether Kansas shall be received into the Union, with or without slavery.' The election will be held under legitimate authority; and if any portion of the inhabitants shall refuse to vote, a fair opportunity to do so having been presented, this will be their own voluntary act, and they alone will be responsible for the consequences."

Is it mere partisan heat and partisan zeal, or is it the reckless arrogance of power that prompts the President thus to speak; thus to falsify the record; thus to insult an outraged people? A legitimate election and a fair opportunity to vote! A dictator determines and chooses the places and the officers of the election, and, with two of his co-conspirators, the result of the election; the people can vote only for the constitution, framed and presented to them by these conspirators. They must, if required, swear, upon the pains and penalties of perjury, to support that constitution when adopted, and by its terms are restricted, and shall in no event be permitted, by alteration or amendment of their fundamental law, "to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves." With the shadow of this great calamity upon them, shedding its dubious twilight over all their habitations, threatening the inauguration in their midst of that anarchy which is fearful in energy and atheistical in creed, frightening their pale-faced villages with war, and profaning their temples and shrines with the blood of murder; they are mocked with the infamous and gratuitous counsel of submission. Submit, submit, says the President, and vote, now that you have a fair opportunity, for this constitution, framed by usurpers and tyrants, or be yourselves "alone responsible for the consequences."

Responsible, sir, for what consequences? For the consequences of refusing to submit to Federal dictation and Federal usurpation—the consequences of provoking, by this act of disobedience, the power of that vengeance which slumbers in the arm of the Federal Executive. The threat is as weak as it is wicked. The millions of the populous North would revolt against the attempt of the Federal Government to arrogate to itself the power expressly reserved to the people—the power to form their own local and State institutions. The President himself confesses, that the people of Kansas are allowed only to vote for this constitution; and that, although they should all vote for it with no slavery, they must, nevertheless, have it with slavery, and must support it with slavery; and to excuse this atrocious invasion of the people's rights, the President says:

"Should the constitution without slavery be adopted by the votes of the majority, the rights of property in slaves now in the Territory are reserved. The number of these is very small; but if it were greater, the provision would be equally just and reasonable. These slaves were brought into the Territory under the Constitution of the United States, and are now the property of their masters. This point has at length been finally decided by the highest judicial tribunal of the country; and this upon the plain principle that when a confederacy of sovereign States acquire a new Territory at their joint expense, both equality and justice demand that the citizens of one and all of them shall have the right to take into it whatsoever is recognized as property by the common Constitution."

A most humiliating confession, should the people adopt the constitution without slavery, the rights of property in slaves now in the Territory are reserved, and therefore they have a constitution with slavery; and this we are told by the President "is just and reasonable," because "these slaves were brought into the Territory under the Constitution of the United States," and "are now the property of their masters." It only remains for the President to say that the people of Kansas are now the property of their masters. In another communication the President has told the country "that slavery existed in Kansas under the Constitution of the United States;" and now he says "this point has been decided by the highest judicial tribunal;" and yet he says, as if he were demoted, "the question has been fairly and expressly referred to the people whether they will have a constitution with or without slavery," and every citizen may express, by his vote, whether Kansas shall be received into the Union with or without slavery. Surely this cannot be if slavery is in Kansas under and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. Why talk of submitting it to the people when slavery is there, not by force of their will, but by force of the Constitution of the United States? Why talk of the people of a Territory excluding that which the Constitution of the United States sanctions and upholds? Can the people of Kansas repeal, by a vote, or otherwise, the Constitution of the United States?

Is it not written on the face of that instrument, "this Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, the constitution and laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding?" If, therefore, men are property under the Constitution of the United States, and by virtue thereof held as property in the Territory of Kansas, it is in vain, and a mockery, to talk of the right of the people of that Territory to exclude slavery therefrom, or to establish a State constitution without slavery; and hence the conclusion of the President upon this hypothesis is logically and severely true—that although the majority of the people of Kansas adopt a constitution without slavery, slavery nevertheless continues in their Territory, and under their constitution so adopted. And to this complexion has it come at last—that in Kansas it is just and reasonable that the people thereof shall be permitted to vote only for the constitution framed and submitted to them by usurpers, and only for a constitution with slavery. And this is popular sovereignty under Democratic rule! I shall not join in this libel upon the Constitution of my country, that slavery exists in Kansas or anywhere else under, or by virtue of, that sacred instrument. I know that one of its immortal authors, sometimes called the Father of the Constitution, said "that it would be wrong to admit in the Constitution that there could be property in men." I know that he who sleeps in his quiet tomb on the banks of the beautiful Potomac—sometimes called the Father of his Country—has said that the Constitution "is perfectly free in its principles." I know that it declares upon its face that no person, whether white or black, shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, but by due process of law; and that it was ordained by the people to establish justice! I know that by a law made under and pursuant to that Constitution, the traffic in men upon the high seas, under our flag, is a crime, and punishable with death. Can it be that this traffic, which, upon the seas, by the law of the Constitution, is a crime worthy of death, and punished with death, is upon land a right, a sacred right, sanctioned by the Constitution, and not to be restricted or interfered with by the fundamental law of any State in this Union? If this be so, tyrants may call the roll of their slaves on Bunker Hill, and upon the very grave which holds the hallowed dust of the first great martyr in the cause of our own American liberty.

Such, sir, is not the Constitution of the United States. That instrument guarantees liberty, not slavery; justice, not injustice; a republican Government resting upon the consent and upholding the inborn rights of the governed, not a despotism or an oligarchy fastened upon the people by brute force and upheld by brute force. The Constitution of the United States limits the sovereignty of the people in the formation of State constitutions to this extent, that their constitution must be republican, that it must not impair but sustain and secure the universal and inalienable rights of life, and liberty, and property. When the people of the Territories frame such constitutions, Congress may admit them into the Union. That Congress is the final arbiter on the question of the formation of new States within our Territories is clear, for unless the constitution framed by the people of a Territory be affirmed and approved by Congress, no State is organized, and the constitution so framed does not become law. Your Kansas-Nebraska act recognizes this principle to the fullest extent. It declares that the people of the Territory are left "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

Who is to judge whether the institutions formed by the people of a Territory conform to the Constitution of the United States? Manifestly Congress, inasmuch as Congress alone can admit or reject the proposed State. It is the right of the people of a Territory to form a republican constitution, which in its provisions does not contravene natural justice or the supreme law of the land; and when they, having sufficient numbers to sustain a State government, do frame such a constitution, it is the duty of Congress to admit them under it into the Union. No higher or more important duty than the admission of new States into the Union is imposed upon the Congress of the United States. If, therefore, the Lecompton constitution had emanated from the people of Kansas; if it had been the expression of their will; if it had been republican and not inconsistent with or repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, it would have been clearly our duty to have approved it, and to have given to it the authority of law by admitting Kansas under it into the Union as a State.

I have already said, and it has been conceded on this floor, that this constitution does not emanate from the people of Kansas, and does not express their will. For that reason it is our duty to reject it; but if the whole people of Kansas had solemnly ratified and adopted this instrument, at either of their recent elections, I affirm that it would still be our duty to reject it. It would be our duty to reject it, because it contravenes the plainest principles of the Constitution of the United States; because it legalizes the wanton and continued violation of the rights of life and liberty and property; because it is a constitution not fit to be made, and such as no people or State can, of right, make; and because it is a constitution which could only originate in a base conspiracy against the liberties of the country, and the sacred rights of human nature. Consider this! What do we sanction by affirming this Lecompton constitution? First, the wild and guilty fantasy of property in man; the coarse and brutal atrocity of merchandise in human souls. The first section of the seventh article contains these words: "The right of property" * * * * "to a slave and its increase is" * * * * "before and higher than any constitutional sanction;" and, although the article itself had been rejected by the people at the election, yet its provision would still stand, and the right of property in slaves is held irrevocable.

The American Congress to sanction this! The American Congress to declare that the right to hold men, and women, and children, as property, and to sell them as chattels, is inviolable, and before and higher than any constitutional sanction!

I submit, if by any fiction you can convert a child into property, it is a fact before and higher than any human law or constitution that the property of the child is in its parents to the exclusion of the stranger. By enacting this Lecompton constitution, you would reverse this great fact of nature, or rather violate this right of nature, and declare it lawful to steal from the parent his child. If you will by law degrade one portion of the human family into chattels, for God's sake do not by law reduce another portion to the still lower level of thieves. After you shall have enacted your statute, will not the law of the stone table still stand, "Thou shalt not steal?" After you shall have enacted your statute declaring it lawful to send little children to the auction block for sale, will they not still be as sacred, whether an African or an Indian, a European or an American sun first burned upon them, as they were in that day when the Nazarene, whose intense holiness shed majesty over the manger and the straw, said: "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven?"

In keeping, sir, with the atrocious provision of the Lecompton constitution declaring property in man, is the further provision, which declares "that all FREEMEN, when they form a social compact, are equal in rights." By adopting this we are asked to say, that the self-evident truth of the Declaration that "ALL MEN ARE CREATED EQUAL," is a self-evident lie; a glittering generality; a rhetorical flourish, unconstitutional and undemocratic; that the self-evident truth now in these latter days is, that men are not created, but, like Topsy, they grow; and THEY are equal in rights only "when they are free and form a social compact." Allow me to ask the advocates and supporters of this Lecompton bill of rights—this new declaration of self-evident truths—what rights men have before they are free and form a social compact? Are they then, by endowment of their Creator, possessed of the rights of life and liberty? Or, outside of your social compact, is there an inferior class of human beings, "who," as the majority of the Supreme Court said in the Dred Scott decision, "have no RIGHTS or privileges but such as those who hold the power and Government, may choose to grant them?" This is the precise principle and avowal of this Lecompton constitution; and we, by affirming it, are only to become the avowed upholders of the stupendous lie, that one class of men have no rights which another are bound to respect; and hence, the partial and exclusive provision of the ninth section of the bill of rights of this instrument, which is—

"9th. That no freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or dispossessed of his freehold, liberties, or privileges, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any manner destroyed or deprived of his life, liberty, or property, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land."

"NO FREEMAN:" the words of necessity import that any person not a freeman, any slave, any human chattel, may be taken and imprisoned, dispossessed of his freehold, liberties, and privileges, outlawed, exiled, and murdered, without the judgment of his peers, and without the protection of law. That this instrument may want in no provision of horrid cruelty, it is further therein provided, that "free negroes shall not be permitted to live in this State under any circumstances." Sir, they are mere "visionary theorists" who suppose that this world was not made for Caesar, but for man—that it belongs only to the common Father of all, and is for the use and sustenance of all his children. We are to say, by our act of affirmance of this instrument, to certain human beings in the Territory of Kansas, though you were born in this Territory, and born of free parents, though you are a human being and no chattel, yet you are not free to live here upon your native heath; you must be dispossessed of your freehold liberties and privileges, without the judgment of your peers and without the protection of law. Though born here, you shall not, under any circumstances, be permitted to live here. You must suffer exile or death—you cannot and shall not live here. That sky which you first saw, and to which weary men look up for hope and consolation—that beautiful sky which bends above your humble home like the arms of beneficence clasping in its embrace the evil and the good, the just and the unjust—that sky was not made for you; you shall not live under it. This land, this goodly land, with its fertile fields, and quiet waters, and rustic homes, where you first learned to lisp the hallowed name of father, sister, brother, and where sleeps in humble hope the sacred dust of your poor dead mother—this land was not made for you; you shall not, under any circumstances, be permitted to live upon it; go hence, never more to return: that is our law. Representatives! will you give to this proposed atrocity your official sanction? Answer upon your oaths, to your conscience, to your country, and to your God!

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. BOCOCK, who moved that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WINSTON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill making appropriations for the invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had come to no resolution thereon.

OMISSION IN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to supply the omission in the enrollment of a certain act therein named, with a view to put the same on its immediate passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the House do now adjourn.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Patent Office, transmitting certain additional papers to be appended to the mechanical part of the Patent Office report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of the report of J. Ross Browne on the Indian affairs of Washington and Oregon Territories.

Mr. QUITMAN. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and be printed.

Mr. GREENWOOD. This communication, I suppose, is in response to a resolution emanating from the Committee on Indian Affairs. I suppose it should be referred to that committee.

Mr. QUITMAN. It is in response, I presume, to a resolution which came from the Committee on Military affairs.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The Committee on Indian Affairs presented a resolution calling for the information which is there communicated.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Arkansas inform the Chair on what day the resolution offered at the instance of the Committee on Indian Affairs was passed.

Mr. GREENWOOD. It was passed during the execution of the order of the House calling the States for bills and resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the resolution to which this is a response was adopted on the 15th, at the instance of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The communication was thereupon referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication of like character, in response to a resolution of the House of the 19th instant; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communications; which were disposed of as indicated below:

A communication from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating a letter from the Commissioner of Public Buildings, transmitting copies of all contracts entered into by him for the year 1857, as required by the House resolution of April, 1838. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, asking an appropriation for deficiencies for surveying the public lands, in connection with the private land claims in California. Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, asking an appropriation for the deficiencies in the appropriations made at the last session of Congress for the erection of stables and a conservatory for the President's House. Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, asking an appropriation for deficiencies in the appropriations for the Post Office Department. Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 18th instant, transmitting the information called for, relative to the estimates necessary to complete the harbors of Delaware river. Referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the War Department, in answer to the resolution of the House of 15th January, 1858, calling for the report of the commissioners appointed to ascertain and report upon the war claims in Washington and Oregon Territories. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the War Department, containing statements of the appropriations applicable to the War Department, during the years 1856 and 1857, the amount drawn by requisition, the balance due on the 1st of July, 1857, and such of the appropriations as have been carried to the surplus fund. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the First Assistant Postmaster General, transmitting copies of contracts for the transportation of the United States mail to foreign countries; also, tabular statements of the accounts of postages derived from the mail transported as aforesaid. Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

STENOGRAPHER TO SELECT COMMITTEE.

The question then recurred on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw the motion to adjourn, to permit me to offer a resolution authorizing the select committee of investigation into charges connected with disbursement of money of Lawrence, Stone & Co., to appoint a stenographer.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I cannot withdraw the motion; if I do the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] first comes up.

Mr. STANTON. Then I hope the House will vote down the motion. I cannot present the resolution, except by unanimous consent, on any other day.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

OMISSION IN ENROLLMENT.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. FAULKNER to suspend the rules.

Mr. STANTON. I now ask unanimous consent to offer my resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to know what is the first business in order?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia to suspend the rules.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio authorizing the select committee of investigation into the conduct of the late Doorkeeper, to employ a stenographer.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. STANTON. I understand the gentleman from Virginia does not desire a vote upon his bill to-day, if it can come up next Monday.

Mr. FAULKNER. If I can be assured that it will come up next Monday, that will be perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. STANTON. Then I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will if I can have any assurance that the motion will come up next Monday.

Mr. HOUSTON. No bargains.

Mr. STANTON. That bill cannot pass without discussion. The gentleman from Virginia certainly does not contemplate pressing it to a vote to-day.

Mr. FAULKNER. When I submitted the motion to suspend the rules, I supposed the House would adjourn, and the motion go over until Monday next. I am perfectly willing that the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio shall come up for consideration now, if my motion can go over until next Monday.

Mr. STANTON. It is perfectly obvious that our committee can do nothing during the coming week unless this resolution is passed to-day.

Mr. BURNETT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be entertained, because nothing has intervened since the vote was taken on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BOCOCK. I will make the motion that there be a call of the House.

Mr. BURNETT. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. RUFFIN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Bliss and Russell were appointed.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw the call for tellers. I would be glad if he would do so. I think that the gentleman ought to have an opportunity to have the House pass on his resolution.

Mr. BURNETT. I would withdraw it, but for the fact that if I do so, the gentleman from Virginia would lose his motion.

The House refused to adjourn; the tellers having reported—ayes 43, noes 70.

The SPEAKER stated that the question recurred on the motion that there be a call of the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Mr. HUGHES demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. STANTON. If the gentleman will permit me for a single moment, by withdrawing his motion that there be a call of the House, I would say I think there is an arrangement between the gentleman from Virginia and myself, by which we both can accomplish our purposes without further trouble.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There was no quorum on the last vote. I do not want to do anything without a quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Boccock and Waldron were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 72.

The Chair voted in the negative, making a quorum.

So the House refused to order a call of the House.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. Speaker, if the House will indulge me for a moment, I will indicate the course I propose to adopt with regard to the bill from the consideration of which I propose to discharge the Committee of the Whole, and which will accomplish my purpose, and at the same time give an opportunity to the gentleman from Ohio to accomplish what I think ought to be done.

The bill to which I have called the attention of the House is a bill to correct an error of the enrolling clerk, by which he omitted from the Army appropriation bill of last session one of the regular annual appropriations recommended by the Executive, and which, for a series of years, has been annually appropriated, according to the military policy of the country, for the national armories.

It was simply an omission, and it is imperatively necessary that it shall now be supplied or your national armories will be closed. I propose now merely to ask to have the rules suspended, and the bill taken from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and when that has been done, I will move to postpone its consideration until Monday next.

Mr. GROW. I desire to understand exactly what the bill is. Does it embrace only that item for the armories?

Mr. FAULKNER. That is all, sir. It is one of the regular annual appropriations.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Can a motion to suspend the rules be postponed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Virginia merely proposes to postpone the consideration of the bill itself in case the rules shall be suspended, and the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union discharged from its consideration.

The bill to supply an omission in a certain act, therein named, was then read. It proposes to appropriate $360,000 for the manufacture of arms at the national armories; that item having been accidentally omitted in the enrollment of the Army appropriation bill of the last session of Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if this is a motion to suspend the rules merely to get the bill before the House, or does it include that the bill shall be first considered in the House?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules so that the bill shall be considered in the House.

The question was taken, and the rules were suspended, two thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. FAULKNER. I now move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for a division on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The call for a division comes too late, the Chair had announced the result of the vote.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I asked for a division as soon as I could. And I submit to you, sir, this question. You had to vote a moment ago to make a quorum here, and is it right for us to legislate without a quorum? [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The last vote of the House showed that there was a quorum present.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. By the vote of the Speaker, a bare quorum was obtained.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to postpone.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, sir, I ask for a division upon that.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Thompson and Barksdale were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 110, noes 8.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT OF A STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. STANTON. I now ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to investigate the charges against members and officers of the last Congress, growing out of the disbursement of any sum of money by Lawrence, Stone & Co., be authorized to employ a stenographer, at the usual rate of compensation.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to that resolution.

Mr. STANTON. I move to suspend the rules so as to enable me to offer it.

The question was taken; and, on a division, there were—ayes 113, noes 10.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

Mr. STANTON. I move the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HUGHES. I offered an amendment to the resolution. I sent it to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. It was not in order, pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HUGHES. I sent it up before the previous question was demanded.

The SPEAKER. That is immaterial.

Mr. JEWETT. I presented an amendment before the call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not entertain the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, for the reason that the proposition then pending was a proposition to suspend the rules to enable the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] to introduce his resolution.

Mr. HUGHES, (at a quarter to five, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only ten members voting therefor.

The question was then taken, and the motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division, ayes 17, noes 101.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of order. I wish to put an inquiry to the Chair. When the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio was first read, I rose to my feet and announced that I desired to offer an amendment, which I immediately sent to the Clerk's desk, before the motion to suspend the rules was made; and I wish to know of the Chair if that amendment came too late?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was not in order in moving his amendment; first, because the rules had not been suspended to permit the gentleman from Ohio to introduce his resolution; and, second, because, so soon as the rules were suspended, the floor, according to universal parliamentary courtesy and propriety, was assigned to the gentleman from Ohio, who demanded the previous question; so that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES] has not had an opportunity of presenting his amendment in such form as that it could be recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HUGHES. I appeal to the House to vote down the previous question.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the gentleman from Ohio what the usual compensation to a stenographer is?

Mr. STANTON. I will answer the gentleman with great pleasure. I understand he is paid by the folio; so that the pay depends upon the amount of work. It is impossible to say what the amount would be.

Mr. FLORENCE. That was the only difficulty with me. I do not know what the usual compensation is. How much is it a folio?

Mr. HUGHES, (at ten minutes to five o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division, ayes 22, noes 105.

The question recurred on the call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BOCOCK and CHAFFEE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported-- ayes 102, noes 15.

The SPEAKER voted in the affirmative.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. BOCOCK. If the House adjourn now, does not the question come up to-morrow morning the first thing?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BOCOCK. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

No. 86) for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union. The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed. Mr. DOUGLAS notified Senators that he would ask for the consideration of the bill as soon as the report should be printed, perhaps to-morrow.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Pamela Preswick, for herself and the other heirs of William Wigton, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the petition and papers in the case of Pamela Preswick, in behalf of herself and other heirs of the late Major William Wigton, praying for the payment of a sum alleged to be due for services rendered by said Major Wigton, be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 26) to provide for the examination and payment of certain claims of citizens of Georgia and Alabama, on account of losses sustained by depredations of the Creek Indians, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of certain permanent residents of Kansas, presented the 19th instant, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Secretary of the Interior; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 97) to incorporate the Benevolent Christian Association of Washington City; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 13) in relation to certain liabilities assumed by the State of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 207) to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Ansel Wilkinson," approved August 13, 1856; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

DEATH OF MESSRS. LOCKHART AND BRENTON.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. C. ALLEN, its Clerk, informing the Senate of the death, during the recess, of the Hon. JAMES LOCKHART and the Hon. SAMUEL BRENTON, members elect of the present Congress from the State of Indiana, and communicating the proceedings of the House of Representatives in relation thereto.

The resolutions of the House of Representatives were read.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. President, the death communicated to us by the resolutions of the House of Representatives is an event well calculated to inspire serious and painful reflections. Again and again, this session, have we been reminded that death has been amongst us. For the sixth time, since our meeting, has the dread announcement been made, that one of our number has gone to his eternal home. The uncertainty of life could scarcely be brought to our minds in a more impressive form.

My late colleague, the Hon. JAMES LOCKHART, departed this life, after a long and painful illness, at his home in Evansville, Indiana, on the 7th of September last. Though wasted by disease, he retained his mental faculties unimpaired until the last, and spoke words of peace and comfort to those surrounding his bedside.

JAMES LOCKHART was born on the 13th day of February, 1806, in Auburn, Cayuga county, New York. He emigrated to the West in 1832, and located in Evansville, Indiana, where he commenced the practice of the law in 1834. He applied himself studiously to his profession, and rose rapidly to a distinguished position at the bar. In his intercourse with the people, he so won their confidence and regard that his success, professionally and politically, seemed to follow as a matter of course, and with but little effort on his part. He was elected in 1841 to the office of prosecuting attorney of the fourth judicial district, and was reelected in 1843.

He performed the duties of this office with such ability and fidelity that, at the expiration of the second term, in 1845, he was chosen by the Legislature circuit judge of that judicial district, and continued in the discharge of its duties until 1851, when he resigned.

In 1850, he was elected a member of the constitutional convention of Indiana, and took an active and leading part in its deliberations.

In the fall of the same year, he was elected to the House of Representatives from the first congressional district; and as a member of the Committee on Territories, in the Thirty-Second Congress, applied himself diligently to the duties devolved upon him, and displayed that thorough acquaintance with the details of its business only to be acquired by studious application.

At the expiration of his congressional term, he resumed the practice of his profession; but his old constituency, unwilling to spare him from the field of public labor, summoned him again before them, when he was elected by nearly five thousand majority.

His efforts in the memorable canvass of 1856 will long be remembered by those who coided with him in political sentiment. It was in that contest he seemed to forget himself, and thinking only of the work before him, taxed his frame beyond its power of endurance. At the close of the canvass, death seemed to have marked him as its victim. Though not confined to his bed for some months afterwards, his physicians and intimate friends entertained but little hope that he would live to take his seat in the present Congress. Alas! their fears have been realized. In the meridian of life, and in the midst of his usefulness, he has been stricken down. The State he represented has lost a faithful public servant, and society an exemplary man in all the relations of life.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. JAMES LOCKHART, deceased, late a Representative elect from the State of Indiana, will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. FITCH. Having been acquainted with Mr. BRENTON, one of the members elect whose death has just been announced, I cannot permit the enunciation to pass without bearing my testimony to his worth as a man, citizen, and officer. Mr. BRENTON and myself represented in Congress at one time, adjoining districts of our common State. We differed in politics, but the difference never was permitted in the slightest to cloud our personal relations.

He was a native of Kentucky, (your State, sir,) but early manhood found him a citizen of Indiana, a member of the Methodist clergy, the laborious duties of which position he continued to perform with a very slight interval of rest from 1831 to 1847. During that interval, a rest rendered necessary by the condition of his health, he read law, was admitted to the bar, became to some extent identified with politics, and was elected to the Legislature of Indiana, but finding the law not adapted to his taste, and not perhaps to that strong religious bias which was a prominent feature of his character, he returned to the active duties of his ministerial profession. He was appointed to many stations in that State, and left none without leaving behind him hosts of friends, and their heartfelt regret at his departure.

In 1847 an attack of paralysis compelled him to abandon his clerical duties. Soon afterwards he was appointed register of the land office at Fort Wayne, Indiana, and subsequently made that city his permanent residence. His acquaintance, of course, became extended, in what was, to him, a new sphere, growing out of his new position; but it was a sphere in which, like all others in which he had moved, many friends sprang up around him. His manly qualities, his satisfactory discharge of the duties of every position in which he had been placed, and his extensive acquaintance, made him prominent among his political friends. In 1851 he became their candidate for Congress, and was elected. He was reelected for the second time in October, 1856; but in March following death called him from a further discharge of earthly duties, to the realization of those hopes which he had ever held forth, as a clergyman, as an inducement to a life of rectitude and reliance upon Providence.

Mr. BRENTON never laid claim to brilliancy of intellect, nor did his friends for him; but he was a man of strong practical common sense. His epitaph can be written in words far more honorable to his heart than if they recorded merely lofty deeds without virtue. He was an honest man, a kind neighbor, a good citizen, and an efficient and honorable officer. Well might his city, when such a man departed from among them, go forth, as it did, mourning in his funeral train.

Mr. President, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. SAMUEL BRENTON, deceased, late a Representative elect from the State of Indiana, will go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Mr. HARLAN. In rising to second the motion of the Senator from Indiana, I do not propose to pronounce a eulogy on the life and character of the deceased. His high order of talent, and purity of character would certainly justify it. But it seems to me to be uncalled for on the floors of Congress. Here he was fully known—here he has made his record. Whatever he possessed in character and life worthy of admiration, as portrayed in his congressional career, is vivid in our memories. But his chief labors were performed in a different sphere of action. From his twentieth to his thirty-ninth year of age, (including an interval occasioned by ill health,) he was employed as an itinerant minister, under the direction of the church of which he was a member. It was in this calling that he attained his highest distinction, and endeared himself to the thousands who were accustomed to the enchantment of his pulpit eloquence. By close application he familiarized himself with the prescribed course of theological studies, with general literature, and acquired that general learning and scholarship which prepared him for the easy and graceful performance of the duties of the various positions in public life to which he was afterwards called. During the interval in his ecclesiastical labors, before mentioned, he engaged in the study and practice of law, in which he obtained merited distinction, winning the confidence and esteem of the masses, who selected him as their representative in the legislative councils of his State.

In 1848, when by an inscrutable dispensation of Divine Providence, he was permanently deprived of the power to fulfill the duties of an itinerant minister, he was appointed by the President to the land office at his place of residence; from which he was called by the people to represent them in the Congress of the United States. And to this high and honorable position he had been elected the third time immediately preceding his death.

There are those who doubt the propriety of selecting men who have been engaged in the ministry for political stations. And if it may have been said of him, as it has been and will be said of others, that he has degraded the office of the minister, and tarnished his own character for purity, by stooping to touch the turbid and polluting waters of politics, let the voice of his constituency at home, and our faithful remembrance of his daily walk and conversation, be its only refutation. If his experience was here varied from that of former years; if he here observed the vortices of avarice, licentiousness, and lust; if here he heard the voice of revelry and profanity; if here he witnessed deception and treachery, fraud and corruption, among his associates and companions in official stations, none have so much as whispered his participation in these evils. If in the opinion of those in positions of honor and trust under this Government, its offices and their approaches are so polluted and polluting that a pure man must avoid them as a leprosy, as he would avoid the malaria of the marshes or the pestilence of the deserts, the woe should be pronounced, not on him who is thus offended, but on them by whom the offense cometh. It is true, sir, I will admit, that personal considerations growing out of the character of society might have prompted Joseph to avoid the court of Pharaoh, Mordecai the gate of the Shushan palace, Daniel the court of the Babylonian King, and possibly Brenton the Congress of the United States. But it is equally true that his Christian meekness, his uniform piety, and consistent purity of conduct and conversation, made him all the more agreeable to a large majority of those with whom he served in these Halls. On this account he enjoyed the confidence and esteem of all who shared the pleasure of his acquaintance.

And now that he is no longer with us—that his name is no longer heard in "the call of the roll"—that his voice is silent, his eloquence mute in death, his Christian purity stands out the more conspicuously. In the opinion of his compeers, standing here, as it were, on the brink of his grave—in the opinion of those on whom their countrymen have conferred the highest honors, what is there in the whole of life to compare with conscious rectitude of purpose and moral purity? Who, as he approaches the grave, would exchange them for all else that can be attained in life?

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

Yes, he has left us with a confident expectation of a realization of this promise. But he went not alone. A colleague from his own State, and other companions from the other Chamber, have been summoned to accompany him through the dark valley. From this Chamber, too, from the purest and most beloved by us all, other companions have been summoned; they have gone out as on a committee of conference. But where are they to-day? The image of each is distinct before us; but they answer not at the sound of their names; they come not at the "call of the roll;" on "a call of the House" they still tarry; for they have been introduced to the angels—they are holding converse with "just men made perfect"—these to a Brenton, to a Bell, to a Butler, to a Rusk, are "kindred spirits"—hence they linger long, though we shed tears for their absence. And they may not return, though they loved us, for the angels are doubtless unfolding an eternity of enjoyment to their view. But by their example they beckon us to join them in that world of celestial light to which they have fled.

Mr. President, I second the passage of the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

SPECIAL ORDERS—COMMODORE PAULDING.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, being the bill (S. No. 79) for the increase of the military establishment of the United States. By leave of the Senate, the Chair will make a brief statement with reference to the order of business. Yesterday there were two subjects specially assigned for consideration, this bill being assigned for twelve and a half o'clock, and a motion for the hour of one o'clock, the latter being the older special order. The Chair decided that the bill now in his hand, assigned for twelve and a half o'clock, would continue to have precedence over the older order, when the hour of one o'clock should arrive. That opinion was expressed in obedience to what he was informed had been the ruling and practice of this body. On a careful comparison and examination of the rules, he is quite clear, construing them by their language, that that decision was erroneous. Where several subjects have been severally assigned, they take precedence in the order at which they were severally assigned, and not in the order to which they were assigned severally. Accordingly, this special order is now before the Senate, and when the hour of one o'clock shall arrive, the Chair will call up another special order of an older date, being the joint resolution (S. No. 7) directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding, which will then take precedence of this bill, unless it shall be postponed by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. PEARCE. Perhaps it is not premature for me now to make a motion in regard to that, as the Senator from Mississippi will have his bill taken up immediately, and I have no desire that it shall be interrupted this morning while in progress. I will move now that the joint resolution last referred to by the Chair be postponed until Thursday at one o'clock. That will leave two days for the discussion of his bill, and will interfere with no other special order, as I understand.

Mr. DAVIS. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Maryland for allowing this bill to have that length of time for discussion, which will probably be effective, and for his yielding his right to the floor this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to allow the motion to be put?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved that the joint resolution directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding be postponed to Thursday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States.

The first section proposes to add to each of the regiments of dragoons, cavalry, infantry, and of mounted riflemen, two companies, to be organized in the same manner as the companies now composing these arms, respectively, and to receive the same pay and allowances, and to be entitled to the same provisions and benefits in every respect, as are authorized by the existing laws. They are to be subject to the rules and articles of war; and the enlisted men are to be recruited in the same manner as other troops, with the same conditions and limitations.

The second section authorizes the President of the United States to increase the number of privates in each of the companies of the Army serving in the field, or at remote and frontier stations, to any number not exceeding ninety-six; this increase to be by enlistment, and the soldiers to be on the same footing, in all respects, as other soldiers of the Army.

The bill further provides for the addition to the medical department of the Army of such number of assistant surgeons, not exceeding fifteen, as in the judgment of the President may be required by the wants of the service; the officers so added to be appointed in the same manner, and to be, in all respects, on the same footing as the officers of that corps now authorized by law. Hereafter, the bill provides that regular promotions to vacancies occurring in the regimental grades of commissioned officers of the United States Army are to be by regiments or corps, instead of by arms of service, as now regulated and provided in certain cases.

Mr. TOOMBS. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs what addition the first and second sections of the bill will make to the numbers of the Army? Those sections provide for increasing the rank and file.

Mr. DAVIS. The first section will add thirty companies to the Army, which, at the present greatest number allowed by law, would amount to two thousand two hundred and twenty men. If the second section, which authorizes the increase of each company to ninety-six, be adopted, of course the number of men added to the effective service will depend on the manner in which the Army may be posted. Suppose the Army to be posted as now, and the thirty companies added to be all sent to the same frontier where the one hundred and eighty-five are now serving; it would make a total increase of six thousand nine hundred and fifty privates.

Mr. TOOMBS. Does the second section alone make that increase?

Mr. DAVIS. No; the second section increases only the existing one hundred and ninety-eight companies; but the first section, adding the thirty companies to the Army, would make that increase.

Mr. TOOMBS. The second section would make an increase of over four thousand men, if they were posted on the frontier?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOOMBS. I shall move to strike out the first section of this bill. I think the increase of the Army will be at least great enough with the second section, and will be made in a more appropriate mode. The occasion for the present increase of the Army is, I believe, a supposed Mormon war—an anticipated Mormon war, rather than an existing one. Inasmuch as the second section, if the men be employed in active service on the frontiers, will give from four thousand to five thousand men, and inasmuch as they can be used during the exigency of that expected war, and then be disbanded, I think that is the best way to increase the Army; and therefore I propose to strike out the first section.

I am perfectly satisfied that the present Army of the United States is altogether sufficient for the peace establishment. The original idea—and, I believe, it is common to the armies of most countries with which I have any acquaintance, though I am not very familiar with the subject—in arranging our Army on the peace establishment, was, that we could increase the numbers according to any temporary exigency. I think originally—probably by the act of 1822, or before that time—certainly it was so when I first came into Congress—the rank and file of each company was forty-two. It was afterwards raised in time of peace, probably on account of our Indian disturbances, to sixty-four. From time to time we added new regiments to the service. This bill now proposes to carry the number in each company up to ninety-six. I do not object to that mode of increase, if it be supposed by gentlemen better acquainted with the military wants of the nation at this time than I am, that three or four thousand men are now wanted in anticipation of the Mormon war; though I do not think any increase is necessary, and shall not vote for the bill in any form whatever; but I deem it my duty to make the bill, in my judgment, as good as possible before voting on it finally. I do not think any one will say that more than four thousand men will be wanted. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe the rank and file of the present establishment is about seventeen thousand.

Mr. DAVIS. It is a variable quantity. It depends on how the Army is posted. As it is now posted, it is over seventeen thousand.

Mr. TOOMBS. It can be carried above seventeen thousand?

Mr. DAVIS. Seventeen thousand nine hundred and eighty-four.

Mr. TOOMBS. Nearly eighteen thousand. We have an Army capable of being enlarged according to its position in the public service on the frontiers, to nearly eighteen thousand men. This bill proposes to add about thirty-two companies to the one hundred and eighty-five companies now existing, making nearly five thousand men. To that extent it is capable of being enlarged; and if the second section alone be passed, it will make an Army of twenty-two thousand men in actual service under the bill. My friend from Ohio [Mr. WADE] suggests to me that it will cost $22,000,000 a year. I believe it will on that distant frontier; because I know, that on some occasions during the Mexican war—and it would be worse in our own country than in an enemy's country—it cost $1,000 a man, on account of the peculiar service.

But the question of cost, I admit, is not one to be considered when the public defense is concerned. If it be necessary for the public defense, of course the money must be expended, though it amounts to a hundred millions of dollars. I see no such necessity, on a peace establishment, even for the existing Army. So far as several of the arms of the national defense are concerned, they are comparatively useless for the service on which account it is proposed to raise them—I mean the Indian service. The infantry are worth but little or nothing on our frontier, in peace or war. They can take care of forts; but for any other purpose, they have proved to be an exceedingly inefficient service there.

One great objection I have to increasing the Army by adding companies is, that you never can get rid of them. I suppose the bill of the Committee on Military Affairs to be much better than that proposed by the Secretary of War. The five regiments he asks for, I deem to be wholly unnecessary. This is a superior plan and meets my approbation more than that proposed by the Secretary of War and presented to us in the annual message of the President. Inasmuch, however, as we can get four thousand more men by the second section of the bill, carrying up the rank and file on the war establishment to ninety-six men in a company, thus giving us nearly twenty-three thousand men altogether, which I think adequate to the purposes of the Government, I am unwilling to assent to the other sections of the bill.

I think it is a great mistake to suppose that our increased extension of territory has created an increased necessity for troops. Twenty-five or thirty years ago—in fact, from the last war with England down to the Mexican war, our legal military establishment did not exceed eight thousand men. Our Indians were scattered; large numbers of them were in Florida; large numbers were in Georgia; large numbers were in Mississippi; many were in the North west, and they were mixed with the white population. Instead of the two fronts of which gentlemen speak now, there were half a dozen fronts. Since we have adopted the policy of carrying them west of the Mississippi and putting them together, while we concentrate them, we can concentrate our Army. I think there is less necessity for troops now than when the Indians were scattered about from north to south, from Florida to the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude. Our troops now are required to protect the frontiers only in two points you may say—on the eastern front and the Pacific side. That twenty-two thousand men will be adequate for the defense, I have no doubt.

As to the Mormon war, it is not yet a fact. Congress, which alone has the power to make war, has not spoken; and it is very certain, unless our country has undergone a silent revolution, that the President cannot make that war. It is very certain, that unless the Senate and House of Representatives intend to go on in the downward path of vesting all the powers of government confided to the legislative department in the executive, this war does not exist in contemplation of law. Therefore, I say, Congress has not yet acted, and when that question shall come up, there may be gentlemen who may believe such a war to be unnecessary; who may believe it to be unnecessary to carry vast bodies of troops over the Rocky Mountains, in order to murder those people who are called Mormons. It may be that we may suppose that no such necessity may exist. These are my present impressions on the case, though I give no judgment. I am not prepared to declare such a war, nor to wage it; but if we do declare it, if we do wage it, it is very clear that it must be exceedingly brief and temporary. If these troops are to be raised for the Mormon war, I shall then move an amendment, if I fail in my present motion, that these companies shall go out of the service on the termination of the war. When, on a national exigency, we declared war against Mexico, in regard to all the extra regiments, I believe, that were raised for that war, it was provided in the act raising them, that the commissions of the officers, and the terms of service of the men should expire with the war. Now, if we are going to raise the army on the pretense of a Mormon war, I shall insist on putting a provision in this bill, that all these commissions shall expire, and that the terms of service of the enlisted men shall expire with the expiration of the war, if it ends within five years.

If it be the intent simply in time of peace, with an exhausted Treasury, without the pretense of Indian war, now to increase the Army to twenty-six or twenty-seven thousand men, I am opposed to it, and shall oppose it in all its stages. If it be for the purpose, as I again repeat, of carrying on the Mormon war, twenty-two thousand men will be enough; four regiments will be enough. The force of Brigham Young is magnified merely for the purpose of getting regiments in many quarters. The same story has been told to Congress, I think, three or four times since I have been a member of the public councils. They came at the opening of the session two or three years ago, and said, "we are going to have an Indian war along the frontier." Stories were manufactured in the newspapers, and they came to Congress and got the regiments; and when they got the regiments, we had peace instantly. The regiments, when once mustered, are not to be gotten rid of; they are permanent officers, fastened on the community until we have a revolution. There is nothing in the times, sir; there is nothing in the condition of our country; there is nothing in its finances; there is nothing in those distracting questions which now agitate it; and I see nothing in the future which makes it either wise or prudent for the American Senate and House of Representatives to enlarge the military forces of the United States. A republican Government should rest upon and be defended by the people; and when they are unwilling or unfit to defend it, the sooner they get a master the better.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia moves to amend the bill by striking out the first section. The question is on that amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the theory of our peace establishment, from the foundation of the Government, has been to maintain a small army, sufficient for the exigencies which would exist in time of peace, and capable of expansion to war necessities when war should arise. The adding of two companies to the regiment, as provided for in the bill, gives uniformity to the organization of the Army; it gives twelve companies to each of the regiments. Four regiments now have twelve companies. I esteem it a better organization than ten companies. If it turns out that we shall have such quiet among the Indians and elsewhere that it will not be necessary to have so many on the present establishment, which is not seventy-four, as the Senator supposes, but fifty-two to the company, it will be capable of reduction. Seventy-four men to each company was only provided for in extraordinary cases, as recited in the act of 1850. That number to each company would give us on the peace establishment, in the large army of which the Senator from Georgia speaks, but eleven thousand nine hundred and fifty-six, if the thirty companies were added. If these eleven thousand nine hundred and fifty-six men should be found greater than the wants of the country required, then we should have an organization of the regiments susceptible of a division into three battalions, and a reduction of one third, keeping two battalions in the service on the peace establishment, and capable of sudden expansion, by the addition of the third battalion, in time of war.

So far from favoring the idea, which I know has been popular in both Houses of Congress for many years past, of increasing the rank and file in time of peace, I adhere to the theory of our fathers, which was so handsomely illustrated by Mr. Calhoun, as Secretary of War—a skeleton in time of peace, capable of sudden expansion in time of war, to the wants of the country. I have no disposition merely to reduce the expense by disbanding a few officers, to cut down our establishment to a few regiments, and to swell the rank and file of those regiments, so as to answer peace purposes. I prefer to incur the additional expense of keeping a larger skeleton, a greater number of regiments with a fewer number of privates, which gives us an efficient Army in time of war, by merely adding new privates to the old ones that constitute the skeleton company in time of peace, and prevents us from suffering those disasters at the commencement of a war which always ensue from an undisciplined army.

I think, sir, it will be an improvement in the organization of our Army to add two companies to each regiment, making them all uniformly consist of twelve. It will then be an easy matter, as I stated, to cut off the third battalion and reduce each regiment to eight companies, if the case ever should arise which the Senator from Georgia contemplates, of our having a larger army on this establishment than is necessary. I wish to call his attention to the fact that under the existing law, the number of privates allowed to each company is fifty-two, and the strength of the Army, therefore, with the thirty companies added, when the troops are not on frontier stations or in the field, will be eleven thousand nine hundred and fifty-six; and to that number it is competent for the President now to reduce the strength of every company of the Army, for he is only authorized or permitted to increase it to seventy-four, that not being our peace organization; for Congress, notwithstanding its preference for the rapid increase of the rank and file, has always had the wisdom—I say the wisdom—to preserve that skeleton organization which constitutes a small company in time of peace.

But it is argued that this increase of the Army is on account of the Mormon war. That is not my motive, nor is it the line of argument which is pursued by the Secretary of War in his report asking for an increase of the Army. He begins by reciting the actual strength and the authorized strength. He then states the number of posts, the amount of frontier to be protected, and the length of the line of communication between the settlements and the point at which troops must be stationed, and he closes his brief, and I think very forcible, argument thus:

"To render governmental protection to our vast frontier and emigration perfect, a very large augmentation of the Army would not be required. Five additional regiments would answer the purpose, if properly posted."

"It will be seen from a paper carefully prepared from reliable data by the Adjutant General, that no increase of our forces is so efficient, or near so cheap, as the augmentation of our regular Army."

Then, the two motives which the Secretary presents—and his report is adopted by the President of the United States in his message—are, first, the necessity for the protection of the frontier and the emigrant route; and second, the economy with which it can be done in the manner proposed by him. The manner proposed in the bill before us is more economical than that of the Secretary. It does not give us so large a peace skeleton; but the committee has decided that the skeleton would be large enough on this bill, being nineteen regiments of twelve companies each. To strike off the addition to each regiment of two companies, provided for in the first section, and to leave the increase in the rank and file proposed by the second section, would be so small a measure of economy that I am sure, on a calculation, the Senator from Georgia would not urge it on that account. It would be merely adding the three company officers to each company thus added to the Army, the rank and file being supposed to be constant, either by reduction of the size of the company or otherwise. These three company officers—the captain and two lieutenants—being then all the additional cost of maintaining the larger skeleton, I do not think there is any financial consideration which will justify us in rejecting the proposition contained in the first section of the bill.

War, it is said, has not been declared against the Mormons; nor do I understand war to exist. I do not understand the President to be levying war upon the Mormons. I do not understand that the Army which is now en route for Salt Lake has, on reaching that point, any other order than to enforce the laws of the United States, and see that they are faithfully executed. I regret, as much as any one, that it should be necessary to call in the troops of the United States to execute the laws of the Union in any of its parts. I regret, as much as any one, that a rebellion should exist in the remotest Territory of the United States; but wherever rebellion does exist, wherever there is insurrection against State authority or invasion of the United States, the President has the power to repel such invasion, to suppress such insurrection, to put down such rebellion, if it be in a Territory, without the necessary application by the Governor or Legislature of a State provided for in the case of a State.

Our forefathers, jealous of the use of the Army and Navy by the Executive, first provided only for the use of the militia, wherever the militia is competent to discharge the duty. I think every Executive who consults his own welfare, who properly appreciates the true policy of our Government, will resort to the militia rather than to the Army and the Navy; but it is not apparent that the President cannot resort to the militia in this case? The militia composed of the Mormon Legion to be called out by the President to execute the laws of the United States upon the Mormons! The proposition is so palpably absurd that no one can entertain it. His only resort, then, is to use the Army. If he attempts to execute the laws of the United States in the Territory of Utah, he is perforce driven to the necessity of using the Army, in case of any organized resistance to the execution of the laws. That there is an organized resistance in the Territory of Utah is reported; it is generally believed. I have no further knowledge of it than that which belongs to every member of the Senate. I take it for granted, however, that there is resistance, an organized resistance, to the laws of the United States, and that the troops will be employed to execute the laws when they reach their destination. If there be no resistance to the laws there, then it will be merely a march to that portion of our territory.

I have not yet received the report which I called for some time ago, in relation to the Indian affairs of Oregon and Washington Territories. I think, however, that we may rely upon the statements which are made, that the Indians there are in a disturbed condition; that white emissaries have been among them supplying them with ammunition; a priori, we might have reached that conclusion, for the progress of the settlements towards the West, and then the progress of settlements towards the East, on the Pacific ocean, have driven these Indians into contiguity. Formerly dispersed in small bands, living in fertile valleys with tribal wars, traditional hostilities existing among them, they were weak. Driven from their old homes, collected into great bodies, their former feuds suppressed by the necessity of the case, they become every year more and more formidable against the United States; and the long line of communication by which it is necessary to reach them, may make them, within no distant period, a formidable foe to all the power which the United States can employ.

Surely it is no argument to say that Indian wars have heretofore been reported; that troops have been raised to prevent them; and that when the troops were raised, there was no Indian war. God grant that that may always be the result. It would be a blessed consummation if the sending of a force into Utah should insure submission and obedience to the laws of the United States there. It would be a still more fortunate event if the posting of large bodies of troops all along our frontier should prevent the outbreak of Indian hostilities. To prevent hostilities is surely a more desirable object, and one which would better justify the expenditure of money, than to raise armies to exterminate Indian tribes, or shed the blood of inhabitants of the United States.

I have no doubt, myself, (and my early life gave me some opportunities for observation in that service,) that a large portion of our Indian hostilities has resulted from the very small garrisons which we keep on the frontier. The Indians whom we are now required to watch, are not like the Indians to whom the Senator from Georgia alluded. The Indians in Mississippi were generally friendly to the United States; and it was the traditional boast of the largest tribe in that State, that they had never shed the blood of a white man. The Indians in his own State were more hostile; but settlements at that time advanced slowly. The greater portion of his State, like my own, was cultivable; the people went shoulder to shoulder as they encroached upon the Indian tribes. In these vast interior regions, however, where fertility depends entirely upon the power to supply water, little segregated settlements are formed along the valleys of streams, not of sufficient strength to sustain themselves, and there they invite the incursion of the savages, and there these hostilities usually occur. I think, therefore, that the present position of the Indians is nothing like so favorable, even if we had only the same number to combat, as that in which they formerly existed.

Then, again, it is to be remarked that a different race of men have been brought into contact with these Indians. In no spirit of boasting or sectional exaltation, I will say that the men who inhabited the southern States and the southern Territories, from their habits as hunters, had those prerequisites for military service that enabled them, without the support of the Government, to find their way into the Indian country, and to maintain themselves against Indian tribes. Even against the formidable tribes that possessed Kentucky when it was settled, the white man made his steady progress without the aid of any military force from the United States. Such is the history of our country. The reverse is the fact in relation to the population now brought in contact with the Indians of the West. To a large extent they are foreigners; and the residue of the population is, to a very great extent, made up of emigrants from the northeastern States. Neither of these people are accustomed to a life which qualifies them to meet the savage in his own mode of warfare. They require the protection of the military arm; and hence, year by year, it has increased as a necessity on the part of the Government of the United States, to give military protection to these settlements. Every year you have bills brought before you to indemnify persons for property lost; and Congress has so far adopted this theory of their obligation to protect the person that they have carried it to the security of his property. They have almost become underwriters of the property on the frontier. If it were a mere financial question, it would not be difficult to prove that it is cheaper to maintain a force which will prevent these outbreaks of the Indians on the frontier, than it is merely to grant that poor boon of indemnity to the family of him who has been murdered by the Indians when hostilities commence.

I hope, therefore, that the first section of this bill will not be stricken out. I believe that it will render the Army more efficient. I believe that when no hostilities exist, when no necessity for actual operations shall require the companies to be filled up to the large standard proposed, by reducing them to fifty-two we shall have a skeleton or peace establishment better suited to the purposes of our Government in time of war. I believe, also, that this will furnish us a convenient organization whenever we shall think proper to adopt it; making three battalions to each regiment; having two in actual service, and the third battalion disbanded when there shall be no necessity for it, but called into service as regular, volunteer, or militia troops, and added to the two battalions which constitute the permanent regiment. These are my principal reasons for proposing the addition of two companies to each regiment, and these are the considerations for which I insist on its not being stricken out.

Mr. HUNTER. If I believed that these Mormon difficulties required an increase in the regular Army, I certainly would vote it; and if I had to do so, I would greatly prefer the shape in which that increase is presented by the bill of the Senator from Mississippi than to raising it by additional new regiments. I prefer it because it would furnish rather more men, as I understand, than the five regiments, and we should have fewer officers.

But if the proposition be to increase the present standing Army to that extent, on account of these difficulties, it seems to me that it ought to be accompanied with another provision, that when these difficulties are settled, this addition to the Army shall be disbanded and dismissed. Unless some such provision accompanies the proposition, it is manifest that it is a mere increase of the standing Army of the United States, which is designed to be permanent. Now, sir, I am unwilling to do this. I believe that there are no lasting and permanent necessities which would require such an addition to the Army. We discussed this matter in 1855. Four new regiments were then added to the existing army, and it was supposed that was all that would be necessary to guard and protect our country in ordinary times of peace. I see nothing that has occurred since that time to create the necessity for five new additional regiments, or for the addition now proposed by the bill of the Senator from Mississippi, unless it be to settle the Mormon difficulties; and, as I said before, if that be the object, there ought to be some provision for disbanding them after those difficulties are settled.

There are, it seems to me, two provisions in the existing laws which would enable the President of the United States to increase the present rank and file. I see from the report of the Paymaster General that he states that at present one hundred and eighty-seven out of one hundred and ninety-eight companies come within the provisions of the law of 1850, which allow the President to raise the company force to seventy-four when stationed at distant posts. Already the whole Army comes within the range of this provision, with the exception of eleven companies as here stated. I see, too, that the law of 1846—I do not know whether it is construed to be obsolete, or not—allows the President to raise the company force to one hundred.

Mr. DAVIS. It is construed to have been repealed by the act of organization which reduced the strength of the company to fifty-two, and afterwards, by the special act which authorizes the President under certain circumstances to raise the strength to seventy-four. I esteem it an obligation, I will here say, with the Senator's permission, whenever the circumstances do not require the organization to seventy-four, that the President should go back to the organization of fifty-two. I think he is bound to do it.

Mr. HUNTER. I had supposed the law of 1850 allowed the President to keep up the companies to seventy-four as long as he thought the public good required it. Of course he has the power to reduce it if he chooses; but if, in his opinion, we want so many more men, he is already allowed, I think, under the law of 1850, to keep up the company force to seventy-four, certainly of those companies stationed at distant or frontier posts. That is the only limitation of the law.

Now, sir, what can be the necessity for increasing the Army beyond what is allowed by the law of 1850, and especially since the addition of four new regiments in 1855? For, observe, I throw out of consideration the Mormon difficulties for the present. This is designed to be a permanent increase of the Army; and I ask, what is there now to require more troops than were necessary in 1855? Certainly not the condition of the Indians. We have no more Indians to guard now than we had then; nor are those Indians more difficult, or even so difficult, to guard and keep off from our frontier, as they were at that time; for it is to be remembered that since that period we have adopted a very expensive system of defensive policy in regard to these Indians. We are collecting them in the north western reservations. We are feeding them; we are keeping them within the boundaries of civilization and the white population, where they can be guarded without so many troops, and where, if the argument be true that was urged in favor of the establishment of these reservations, they will be kept at peace by the inducements which are held out by furnishing them with land and such supplies as are given them. It is also known that the number of Indians is yearly diminishing, and that the task is likely to be easier and easier with the lapse of time, instead of being more difficult, of defending our frontiers against them.

It seems to me, sir, that when we look to the immense expense of our Army, as it now stands, and is now organized, we should be exceedingly careful how we increase it; unless we can devise some means of bringing these expenditures within bounds. I know not why it is that in those distant Territories, especially when we are making these large grants of land, they might not be made with some condition of military service; why we might not make some use of them, which would enable us to command the services of the population in consideration of the lands which are given them, to preserve and protect them. If it could be done it would double the inducements to peace, because it would diminish the inducements of the frontier men to press too far and too fast on the Indians, and to make those wars, which they are accused of too often making, themselves. I think we had better turn our attention to the policy of peace, and to something of that sort, especially as it has already cost us a good deal to embark in it, than to make this large addition to the regular Army of the United States.

If it shall be said—and on that point I am willing to defer to the opinions of military men, and there is no man to whose opinions on such subjects I would defer more willingly and more cheerfully than my friend from Mississippi—that some addition is necessary on account of the Mormon difficulties, I am willing to vote it in the shape he has offered it, provided he will make it temporary, and introduce a section in the bill requiring the disbandment when these difficulties are settled. Let him do that, and I will vote for his addition in that shape; but if it be not done, I am unwilling to vote for it, because I cannot agree, as at present advised, to any permanent increase of the regular Army.

Mr. HALE. I beg to make a single inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I have not the papers before me, and I desire to inquire from him how much the Department asks for arrears in the military service of the last year in the deficiency bill.

Mr. HUNTER. No estimate has come to me as yet. It has gone to the other House; and I am unable to inform him precisely what is the estimate for deficiencies.

Mr. HALE. I am told, but not officially, and that was the reason why I put the question to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, that it is very nearly seven millions of dollars. The deficiency, which the Administration asks for the War Department, for the military service, is, I understand, $6,700,000. We actually spent $19,426,000, and they want about seven millions more, making $26,000,000 for military service last year. I have a little book here, and I find that during the most expensive year of the war with Great Britain, our military expenditures never got up to $21,000,000, and in the highest year of the Mexican war, when we had, I think, nearly fifty thousand men in the field, they never reached to $36,000,000; but now, in a time of profound peace, they amount to about twenty-six millions of dollars.

The honorable Senator from Georgia is a little mistaken in one respect. He says that in these extravagant times the Army will cost about a thousand dollars to a man. They cost that when I first came into Congress, fourteen or fifteen years ago. I took occasion then to look at the total military expenditures of the country, including fortifications, &c., under the military head, and they averaged $1,000 a man. The expenditures now in the West are a great deal more, for we have about fifteen thousand men, and the expenditures are $26,000,000.

Mr. HUNTER. How much does the Senator say it averages per man?

Mr. HALE. I am upon that question now. I said that, when I first came into Congress fourteen or fifteen years ago, the whole military expenses, including ordnance, fortifications, &c., under the military head, amounted to $1,000 a man. Now, we have got up to about fifteen thousand men, and the expenditures are about twenty-six million dollars, making over fifteen hundred dollars for every man in the service. This bill proposes to raise about seven thousand additional men, which will saddle upon this Government a permanent annual increase of expenditure of about twelve million dollars.

The idea that the Army will ever go back, and grow smaller as long as we have money or credit to maintain it, is too absurd to be introduced by a sensible man on this floor. There are no backward tracks when our Government begins to expend money. You may have a war; it makes no difference how expensive it is; and you may have peace, and your expenditures will go on increasing. We actually spent more money last year, exclusive of any payment for the public debt, than we ever spent in any year from the beginning of the Government up to the last year, by a very considerable amount. The highest expenditures, exclusive of payments of the public debt, during the most expensive year of the war with Mexico did not come up to $54,000,000, but last year we spent $72,000,000. Pass this bill, and next year your expenses, including what you pay, and what you get trusted for, will be over a hundred million dollars. I represent a people who are in the habit of working hard for what little money they get, and they are not willing to vote away money unless there is an absolute necessity for it.

What does the President want with this Army? Let me read a note that gives definite and official information in regard to some matters about which some remarks have been made. I read from the last Army Register, on the forty-second page:

"By the act of June 17, 1850, 'to increase the rank and file of the Army,' &c., section second, the President is authorized, whenever the exigencies of the service require it, to increase to seventy-four the number of privates in any company 'serving at the several military posts on the western frontier, and at remote and distant stations.' In the table, the minimum or fixed organization is given, viz., fifty privates to a company of dragoons, sixty-four to a company of light artillery and riflemen, and forty-two to the artillery and infantry. Under the authority vested in him, the President has directed that the number of privates be carried up to seventy-four in the several companies serving in the peninsula of Florida, and on the islands adjacent to it; in Kansas, Nebraska, Utah, Texas, New Mexico, California, Oregon, and Washington Territories; as well as in those stationed at Forts Snelling and Ripley, on the upper Mississippi; Fort Ridgely, on the Minnesota river; and Fort Arbuckle, on Wild Horse creek. There being one hundred and eighty-three companies serving at, or in route to, these distant stations, the authorized increase in the number of privates is five thousand two hundred and twenty-eight; making the 'total enlisted' (as the troops are now posted, or in route) seventeen thousand and sixty-six, and the 'aggregate' eighteen thousand one hundred and fifty-one. If all the companies belonging to 'regiments' (one hundred and ninety-eight) were serving at the distant stations described, the additional number of privates allowed would then be five thousand six hundred and sixty-four; thus increasing the 'total enlisted' to seventeen thousand five hundred and two, and the 'aggregate' to eighteen thousand five hundred and eighty-seven."

So, sir, according to this statement we have now actually an Army of eighteen thousand men. I have been a little laughed at once in the Senate, and I am willing to be laughed at again, for repeating as the solemn conviction of my understanding a lesson of wisdom which the fathers of my native State inscribed on the first constitution they ever wrote, and which, I hope in God, will remain as long as we have a Constitution—that standing armies are dangerous to liberty. I tell you, sir, that an Army of eighteen thousand men, or twenty-five thousand men, as this bill proposes to make it, with the means of transportation with the rapidity of lightning by means of railroads from one end of the country to the other, is a force equal to what it would have been in olden times, if we had one or two hundred thousand men. The President can, if he pleases, concentrate them at any point, at any moment, and for any purpose. I do not know how it is, but the law has been construed that these armies are called, I believe, a posse, and under the name of a posse he can transport them to any place for any purpose he chooses. It is a significant fact to my mind that he has undertaken to play possum with them at elections. [Laughter.] Not long ago there was a call made to have a portion of his posse go to Baltimore and see that the elections were regularly carried on there. I believe, however, it was not thought prudent for them to go, and they did not go; but he did have a posse in the city of Washington to carry on an election, and no small portion of this force—this posse—has been employed, and is now being employed to illustrate "perfect freedom" and "popular sovereignty" in Kansas.

I have an official table before me, by which I find that in the first quarter of 1855, three hundred and twenty-one men were considered sufficient to carry out popular sovereignty in Kansas. The next quarter they went up to nine hundred and twelve; and the first quarter of 1856, we had got up to one thousand and eighty-six men to carry out popular sovereignty in Kansas, and leave the people thereof "perfectly free." [Laughter.] Then we came to the first quarter of 1857, and at that time "perfect freedom" required a force of one thousand three hundred and forty-two men in Kansas. They so continued until the commencement of the fourth quarter of 1857, which I suppose was about the 1st of October last. At that time there had been an election in Kansas; and the people of Kansas had manifested what their ideas were of popular sovereignty and perfect freedom, by putting the President's forces into a very small minority, and electing a free-State Legislature, and a free-State Delegate to Congress, by an overwhelming majority; and immediately upon that the Federal army is raised from one thousand six hundred and seventy-three to two thousand five hundred and sixteen men in Kansas. That is what the President needs this Army for—to carry out "popular sovereignty" and "perfect freedom!" I think a force of eighteen thousand men is quite enough to do that; and I think that $26,000,000, in a time of profound peace, is enough to spend upon an army in this country, particularly as long as we have to borrow the money to do it with. Borrowing money in order to raise men for such a purpose, I am utterly opposed to. I believe that if there is a difficulty in Utah, the Army is three times large enough to attend to it.

I am sorry to disagree with a man who is so perfectly competent to express an opinion on these matters as the honorable Senator from Mississippi is, but I differ from him entirely in the view which he presents, that our difficulties are owing to the fact that we have had so few soldiers among the Indians. I believe the difficulty is that we have had any troops among them. I think it has been provoked by the military display which has been made among them, and the conduct of some of the men, either among the volunteers or the regulars that have been stationed among the Indians. I do not speak without the book, on this subject. Anybody who will read the history of the Oregon and Washington Indian war, given by General Wool, (though I believe, as a matter of private history, the honorable Senator from Mississippi would not regard that as the highest authority,) will see what it is that provokes Indian hostilities on our frontiers. You will see there, according to the account of General Wool, that an Indian chief who came into the American camp with a flag of truce, offering, if any injury had been committed by his people, to make compensation and reparation in cattle or in money, was told that he had better go home and fight. They finally provoked hostilities, and took this chief who came in with a flag of truce, murdered him in the American camp, cut him into pieces, and sent the pieces around to different quarters of the Territory. That is a statement under the hand of General Wool.

Now, sir, I believe that the experiment which was made in olden times with the Indians, by the Quaker Penn, has been the best and wisest Indian policy which has ever been adopted. If the Indians are treated like men, I will not say with kindness, but with justice, you will be troubled with no Indian war. I am sorry that I do not see in his seat the veteran and honorable and gallant Senator from Texas. [Mr. Houston,] who knows so much in regard to the Indian, and who has so often, in his place on the floor of the Senate, expressed sentiments similar to those which I have here expressed. He has said, in regard to Indian hostilities, that whenever the blame is traced to its foundation and its source, it has been found to be with the whites, and not with the Indians. If we return to a policy of peace and justice to the Indians, that is all that is wanted.

I do not profess to know much about this Mormon war. I will say in the outset, however, that I do not believe in it, nor in the necessity for the tremendous expenditure that is being made. I believe that if commissioners had been sent to precede the Army, they would have superseded the necessity for sending the Army.

Again, the honorable Senator from Georgia says we have not declared war against the Mormons. Has he forgotten our modern history? He is well versed in ancient history; but has he forgotten our modern history? Did we ever declare war against Mexico? No, sir; but I will tell you what we did declare. We declared that war existed by the act of Mexico. We may declare by-and-by that war exists by the act of Brigham Young; and if it be repeated as many times in a presidential message as the other statement was, that war was commenced by the act of Mexico, it will get to be a part of our history; and a man who shall doubt that war was commenced by the act of Brigham Young will be no better than an alien and a heathen.

I shall vote for this amendment, and I shall go for any other amendment that is proposed which will limit or restrict the number. I shall support the amendment which I understand my honorable friend [Mr. SEWARD] proposes to offer, that these troops shall be limited to the special necessity which calls for them; and when that ceases, that they shall cease to exist. I shall go for every amendment that will cut the bill down to what the honorable Senator from Mississippi calls it—a skeleton. I shall want to reduce it to a skeleton, and I shall go against the skeleton after that. [Laughter.] I shall go against the whole bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to this bill, mainly for the reason that it creates a less addition to the Army than will be created by the bill if the first section stands as part of the bill; for I am among those who believe that, increased as the second section of the bill proposes to increase the Army, it will be increased enough, and, in my judgment, too much. I am free to say, that if the bill be amended by striking out the first section, as proposed by the Senator from Georgia, I shall still vote against it. I would rather, however, that it should pass with the section stricken out than with the section standing. Therefore, I am in favor of that amendment.

On what grounds, Mr. President, are we asked to increase the regular Army of the United States, as proposed by this bill? There is, I believe, no written report accompanying the bill from the Committee on Military Affairs; and the reasons, and all the reasons which we have yet heard, come from the honorable Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of that committee. I must confess that the reasons suggested by him for increasing the Army are not such as satisfy my mind, although I defer certainly, as I ought to defer, to his superior experience and judgment on this question. The Senator from Mississippi and the Military Committee, as they have a perfect right to do, differ from the President and the Secretary of War; for in the message of the President and in the report of the Secretary of War, a plan different from this is proposed. Inasmuch as they differ from the Executive, and if they think the Executive is wrong, they are bound to differ from him. I suppose each individual Senator here is bound to act in his own judgment and on his own responsibility, and is not at liberty to defer to the judgment of others when that judgment does not conform to his own.

I do not believe, sir, that even for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the United States in any State or Territory, or for the purpose of protecting the frontier from the aggressions of our Indian tribes, or to keep the peace in Utah, or to bring the Mormons into subjection to the Government, is the increase proposed in this bill necessary. These are the grounds, and all the grounds, which are suggested; and the honorable chairman of the committee does not allude to the Mormon war as among the reasons why the Army ought to be increased. If I understand him, he disclaims that as a reason for increasing the Army; so that we are brought back simply to the two reasons—our relations with the Indian tribes, and the necessity of executing the laws of the United States. Now, sir, is it a fact, that eighteen thousand men in a regular army are not an adequate force to protect our frontiers from the aggressions of the Indian tribes, and to see that the laws of the United States are faithfully executed throughout our whole territory? For one, I believe that force is abundantly sufficient.

I agree with the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, that one cause of our hostile relations with the Indians is a disposition to send military forces into their neighborhood; and I do not believe that the regular Army of the United States, if it were doubled, and if it were stationed along the whole line between the Indians and our frontier settlements, would serve to protect those settlements from the aggressions of the Indian at certain times. Certainly fifty thousand men could not extend over our whole line along the Rocky Mountains; and the mode of warfare practiced by the Indians would be then, as now, not to fight our Army in the field, but in the mode known to them, and in the mode alone followed by them. They would make incursions, commit thefts, robberies, and murders on our people, and fifty thousand men would never prevent it; fifty thousand men would do more to provoke it, in my judgment, than eighteen thousand, and very little more to protect the settlements. The national honor is not concerned in these warfare with the Indian tribes; it is simply a question of protecting the lives and property of our people, and that is all. No question of national honor is involved in fighting the miserable Indian tribes on this continent. It is simply, I say, a question of protecting the lives and property of our people, and mainly protecting the property of our people; for the Indians are not generally disposed to commit murders, unless it be in retaliation for murders committed among them. They are more disposed to predatory incursions, to steal cattle, and other property which they may, under certain circumstances, be enabled to possess themselves of.

Now, sir, viewing it in that light, it becomes, to some extent, an economical question. Look at the present condition of the detachment of the Army in the Rocky Mountains, with reference to the loss of property by that detachment, and compare it with the loss to which our people living on the frontiers have been subjected for the last five years, and how would the sum total be? Unless the accounts are grossly exaggerated—and we have no reason to suppose they are—the detachment of the Army now buried up in the snows of the Rocky Mountains has lost in property to this Government more than has been lost by all the emigrant trains, and all our inhabitants on the frontiers, within five or ten years past. I am not, by any means, advised of the precise number of domestic animals, such as horses, mules, and oxen, that have perished from starvation and cold in the Rocky Mountains, connected with the detachment of our Army now there; but I hazard nothing in saying that the loss of these animals will be found greater than all the animals which have been stolen by the Indians in ten years past. If our Army be sent out to the Rocky Mountains, or along our western line, to protect the property of our people, and in order to carry out that policy they are losing more property, day by day, than there is any danger of our people losing if the Army was not there, what kind of economy is it to continue this policy, when the question, as I have before suggested, is almost purely an economical question? I believe that if there were fewer of our military men sent along the line of the Indian territory, there would be fewer murders, less loss of property, greater peace with the Indians, more real protection to the inhabitants of our frontiers, and greater safety to life and property.

Next, in regard to the execution of the laws; where is the necessity for a large force to execute the laws of the United States? Some two thousand five hundred men belonging to the Army are in the Territory of Kansas, and have been for some time. For what purpose? To see that the laws are faithfully executed? I do not believe they are there for that purpose. They are there under orders; but I do not believe the detachment of the Army which is there is there for that purpose, or that it effectuates or carries out that purpose. On the contrary, I believe that the detachment of the Army now there is rather for the purpose of enabling the minority of the people to rule the majority, and to carry into effect laws which the people have not made, and therefore are not disposed to submit to; for it involves, to my mind, an absurdity to suppose that we need the cannon and the bayonets of the Federal Government to enforce laws which the people themselves have made. The Territory of Kansas is living, we are boastfully told, under a new era of legislation. That era is to give to that population the right to regulate their domestic institutions, and make their own laws precisely in the manner they please; and in that Territory, almost an entire barren wilderness till within a few years past, there now seems to be need for two thousand five hundred men to enable that people to mold their institutions, to make their laws, and to enjoy that perfect freedom which there was first to be enjoyed on the soil of the United States as a territorial soil! I do not believe in the necessity of sending two thousand five hundred men, or any number of men, into the Territory of Kansas to protect the people against themselves—to enable them to execute their own laws. I believe that the tendency of the military force of the Government there was, and is, to give to a portion of the people—a very small minority of the population—the power to control the majority; and hence the need of force.

Now, sir, I am not disposed to vote an increase of the Army for purposes of this sort. The Army is not to blame. They are bound, of course, to obey the orders of the Commander-in-Chief, and are not to be held responsible for the position in which they are placed. And here, perhaps, I ought, by no means, to pass any criticism on the loss of property which the Army are now suffering in the Rocky Mountains, in consequence of their animals being unprovided with forage and killed by frost, and also by starvation. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs yesterday hesitated in regard to pronouncing an opinion on the course of policy and management of the Army in that position. When he hesitates, certainly it would be very arrogant in me to pronounce an opinion. Taking it, however, for granted, either that the Army has been there under proper orders and properly provided, or that there has been an improper order, an improper provision, made for the Army in that position; in either event, it justifies and requires me to vote against an increase of the Army for such purposes as have been alluded to; because, if the Army is reasonably and properly there subjecting the country to these losses in the way of animals and other expenses, for the purpose simply of protecting property, it is unwise and unjust, and ought to be voted down as an economical measure; and if the Government is in such hands that the Army, if raised, will not be so commanded and directed as to effect the objects we have in view, the result is the same. No increase ought to be made.

Under these circumstances, Mr. President, I am compelled, in the first place—following the dictates of my judgment—to vote for this amendment; and then, if I can vote down the bill by my vote, I shall most cheerfully do so. If I cannot, I shall still be glad that, by adopting the amendment, the increase is not as great as the first section of the bill would make it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, just at this time I believe we are at peace with all the world. I do not know of any troubles that threaten us anywhere, except some little domestic difficulties, which, I suppose, the United States are very competent to take care of without any very particularly large army. I do not know that war threatens us from any quarter, or that there are any symptoms that we are about to get into difficulty with any foreign Government whatever; that is to say, any such difficulty as will lead to hostilities. I think, therefore, we need not alarm ourselves with apprehensions on account of foreign foes, but may turn our attention to the state of things as they exist at home, and see if there are any dangers that threaten us here which require the measure that is now proposed on the part of the Government, through the Committee on Military Affairs of this body.

One other thing is observable, and I think it ought not to be left out of view—that just at this time we are bankrupt; we cannot pay our debts; we are obliged to direct that orders on the Treasury, so far as they can be dispensed with, shall not be drawn, even to meet our existing obligations. We are obliged to borrow money. We have passed at this session of Congress, under the pressure of great necessity, a bill authorizing substantially a loan of $20,000,000. It was proposed at the time—or said, at any rate, and it was a leading argument—that in a very short time the Treasury, on account of a revulsion in business, from an unfavorable to a favorable position, would be able to meet all demands, and that we should go on as usual. The facts, instead of all encouraging that idea, have presented themselves to us in such a shape that I believe everybody is well convinced that, instead of our being able to meet that debt, provided we can incur it, (which seems to be a matter of some doubt, as nobody seems willing to take our notes,) we shall be obliged to resort to some other mode of raising an additional amount of money.

In this state of things, while we are at peace with everybody, and while we are bankrupt and not able to meet the expenditures which ordinarily arise in the course of government, for civil and other service, we are called on by the President of the United States to increase the expenses of our Government in the military department, by some five or six million dollars—$7,000,000 if there are seven thousand men, certainly, and probably up to $12,000,000, as suggested by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. It strikes me, as a plain man, looking at the outside of matters, and not very competent to look deeply into affairs of government and political economy, that when a proposition of this kind is made in a peaceful day, and with a bankrupt Government which has not money wherewith to meet its expenses, and does not know where to get it, some exceedingly good reasons should be given for this proposed increase of our expenditures. I have waited to hear from the chairman of the committee who advocates this measure, those reasons which should induce me to give my vote for the measure, satisfying myself, at the same time, of the necessity of the case and the urgency of the exigency which is pressing upon us.

It was this view, and impressed by these general considerations, that I desired time yesterday. I suggested that, although we had the recommendation of the Secretary of War, yet we had not before us, as a Senate, the facts accompanying his report upon which we could predicate an opinion. We were at last precisely in this position: that we must take the recommendation of the Secretary of War on the reasons which he gave, which were mere logical deductions from the general state of things, and were to have nothing at all that we could look at from those officers who were competent to give us the details from which we might be enabled to form our own opinions on the subject. We have no report from the commanding General of the Army, that I know of; no details from any one conversant with the troubles upon our Indian frontiers, which would enable us to reach the conclusion which seems to have been arrived at by the Secretary of War and the committee. Nor have we a detailed report from the Committee on Military Affairs. We are obliged to take the bill, which, as the honorable Senator at the head of that committee said, is a plain proposition, and act upon that bill without details and without information; that is to say, without anything but the recommendation of the President and the Secretary of War.

Now, sir, I am one of those who require something more. When we are asked at a time like this, with the Treasury bankrupt, as I have said, and in a period of peace, to impose a burden of some ten or twelve million dollars additional per annum, permanently, on the people of the United States, it is hardly enough for my purpose to be told that the President recommends it, and that the Secretary of War recommends it, and that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has had leave from the committee to bring in a bill to that effect.

Then that not being enough, we are obliged to proceed as we can. We have nothing before us as to the present existing state of facts; we have no details from military men; we have nothing presented to us as to what is intended to be done with this military force in detail; we are not told where it is to be stationed; that so many men are wanted here, that so many men are wanted there; so many for this expedition, and so many for that. No detailed tables are given us, by which we may see plainly that so great a military force is absolutely requisite in order to preserve the peace of the country. Ought we not to have something of that kind? Why should it be all kept back.

I do not say kept back purposely; but why is it that we do not have it from some source or other—either the President, or the Secretary of War, or the committee? We are called upon to act on a measure of this importance—not only important in point of money, but doubly important in point of principle—simply upon the say-so of the officer at the head of our Government, without giving us any details whatever, on which we can safely predicate an opinion.

Mr. President, this leads me to look at the outside of the matter, for I can penetrate no further, and inquire what there is in the existing state of things calling for this large addition to the expenditures of the Government? I waited to hear something on the subject from my honorable friend at the head of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. HUNTER.] I had hoped that he would appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to state some reason in the present condition of the Treasury, showing the extreme urgency and necessity of the case calling for this increased expenditure. We have had nothing pressed upon us showing the existence of an extreme urgency. The suggestion yesterday was that, if we are to do certain things immediately, this bill should be passed at once; and yet, to-day, the chairman tells us that he does not ask for this increase of the Army with reference to any particular exigency now existing, but rather with reference to military considerations generally. I think his great argument was that this measure would make the Army more uniform. I certainly so understood him. His first point, if I heard him rightly, was, to use his language, that it was desirable to encourage, or promote, or procure uniformity in the organization of the Army, and that for this purpose twelve companies to each regiment would be better than ten.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will permit me, I will correct his misunderstanding of my remarks. I said that the addition of the two companies to each regiment would perfect the organization; but it did not follow that it would increase the whole number in the Army, because you can reduce the size of the companies, and with twelve companies have no more men than if you had but eight companies to a regiment. My remark in relation to the Mormon war was, that that was not the cause of asking for the increase—not that it did not enter into it, for just in proportion as troops are sent into the Territory of Utah, they are withdrawn from their ordinary duties. The ordinary duties of the Army, preserving the peace of the frontier, particularly in relation to the Indians, as well as garrisoning many posts which are now vacant, but which ought not to be vacant, constitute, in my mind, the necessity for the increase of the Army—the other consideration being only an element, not the great cause, as presented by the remarks of others. What I said was in answer to their remarks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I listened to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs very attentively, with a view to see what were the particular points that he made to establish an exigency calling for this increase of the Army at the present time. Yesterday I spoke of the importance of Senators having on this subject some definite information, derived from the documents, instead of being compelled to take the mere say so of the Secretary of War, or the recommendation of the committee, accompanied by no report; and then I understood him to say that it was of pressing importance that the bill should be passed at once, in order that the enlistments might go on to prepare the Army for operations.

Mr. DAVIS. I say so now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My next question sought to find out what the operations are, if the operations are necessary at the present time, and the exigency is so very pressing; but I have not heard that stated as yet. As I stated before, one ground of the increase is, that to the military eye there will exist greater uniformity. The Senator now says, that although you may have twelve companies in a regiment, they may be so manned that the whole number will not be equal to what it might be if there were only ten companies; but he will not deny that if you have twelve companies, capable of expansion to a certain number, that may be a much greater number than would be allowed by fewer companies.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This, therefore, is substantially an increase of the Army, because it enables the President, who is to judge of the exigency of the case, to increase the Army, whenever he deems it necessary, to that point. Whatever may be done by the Executive Government in this respect I look upon as done, because we give the power to do it.

I have great respect for the military mind in its proper place, and I have no doubt the honorable Senator is remarkable for the extent to which he possesses the military as well as the civil mind; but I think they should be kept distinct. I am in civil life, and I am not at all pressed by any considerations of a military character. I believe the country does not care that there shall be a particular number of companies in order to make out a uniformity in the organization. The people desire men enough, and so officered and organized that they can render the needful service; but whether there are more or less companies is of no consequence, except that they desire as small a number of companies and of men as possible. I would not add a man for the sake of making the companies uniform, nor would I enlarge the skeleton which is thus capable of expansion, in time of peace, for the sake of uniformity. It is no argument to my mind.

The honorable Senator said—he will allow me to insist upon it, I am not yet satisfied at least that I misunderstood him—that this increase was not wanted in reference to any existing difficulty with Utah; that in the enlargement of the skeleton, if he will allow me to call it so—

Mr. DAVIS. I think my remarks were in answer to the argument made, that that was the reason for asking the increase. I say no; that is not the reason given.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then the Senator admits that it is one of the reasons. Passing by what was said by the Senator from Georgia with so much truth, that there is no existing war, it is impossible to keep out of sight, and I do not wish to do so, that there are existing difficulties with Utah which may require the use of a certain number of troops, a certain portion of the Army. We had the judgment of the present Secretary of War and our present military department on this subject, when they dispatched the recent expedition to Utah. We had their opinion of the exigency—not such as the honorable Senator now urges so strongly, that we cannot delay even to acquire the necessary information in the passage of this bill. Their opinion of the exigency was, that some two thousand five hundred men were all that were needed, and they dispatched them at the close of the summer, when there was no probability, in anybody's calculation, that they could get there in season to interfere with the operations going on in Utah. It was only, as it has been called in reference to Kansas on other occasions, a posse, to be used as a civil posse in aid of the operations of the civil government.

If they sent them out for that purpose—if two thousand five hundred men were enough, and they were dispatched in the manner they were dispatched, with no urgency, no speed, no haste, without preparation, without even making any reliable basis of operation, as I believe military men call it—without laying out their track in such a way that they could be reached and protected, or that they could protect themselves; if that is the opinion of the Government—and surely we may conclude it to be their opinion, from the mode of operation—there can certainly be no such pressing exigency arising from the necessities of the troops in Utah as would seem to be urged upon us. Why, sir, I never have been a believer in all these stories that are told about the great strength of the Mormons, and what we should have to do there. I believe in them no more than the Government does. On that subject I am somewhat of the opinion of the honorable Senator from Mississippi in regard to reports from Kansas, and certainly they cannot be considered as any more reliable. There is a vast deal of exaggeration in them, to say the least; and in the next place, we have no positive reliable information on the subject.

If the state of things in Utah at the present time be even one of the reasons for asking this increase of the Army, why has not the Government of the United States obtained some reliable information on the subject and sent it to Congress for our consideration? They accompany their demand for an increase of the Army with no statements of facts. They say that there are difficulties; that the laws are resisted. They do not say there is war; they speak of no force requiring a great military power on our part; and yet, on the bare suggestion that there are difficulties existing in that country, without even giving credence to the rumors which exist, and which we have seen in the newspapers, and which we certainly cannot credit to the extent that they are given, they make this demand on us. Does it become us, as statesmen, to act in a matter of this importance, on such loose, unreliable data as these; upon bare suggestions, unaccompanied by facts; upon reasoning without giving us any details from which the conclusions are drawn? No legislative assembly in the world would undertake to raise a large military force in a time of peace, and at a time of bankruptcy add ten or twelve million dollars a year to its expenditure, merely on the requisition and suggestion of its Government, with no facts to show that the necessity existed.

It comes back, then, merely to the question of the Indians; and on that I do not feel disposed to say much. Indeed, I could not, if I would, add anything to what has been so well said by my friend from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] on that point. I remember that I had the misfortune to be a member of Congress in the year 1842, when the subject of the condition of the Army was gone into, and its number was fixed, I think, at about eight thousand. The grounds upon which it was determined at that time that that was a proper number, were predicated, in the first place, upon the necessity of supplying our fortifications on the Atlantic, and our military posts on the frontier; and we had then the same story about the Indians which we have had since, and are having now. I was a younger man then than I am now, and I was not disposed to look with so careful and scrutinizing an eye at matters of expenditure as I am at present. I remember that I made a speech at that time in the other House against the reduction of the Army. It was, however, advocated very strongly, and finally carried. I remember very well that Mr. Adams was a leading man in favor of reduction. We had no difficulties of any consequence at that period, and the Army was reduced to that number. The Florida war had been ended. Since then, we have acquired Texas and California and New Mexico and Utah. It is true, these additions have enlarged our frontier, and increased the number of our Indians. I am not disposed to deny, that on this ground our expenditures are necessarily greater; and I admit that we have occasion for a greater military force now than we had then; but between 1842 and 1857, a period of fifteen years, the Army has more than doubled. It has increased from eight thousand to eighteen thousand men; and as the Senator from New Hampshire has remarked, the expenses per man have vastly increased. Our Army expenditures have gone up from eight millions per annum to twenty-five or thirty million dollars. Is there anything in the present state of things to show that that increase is not enough in proportion to our necessities now, as compared with the existing state of our Army, and our necessities then? Why does not the Government give us some details of the difficulties on the Indian frontier? Why are we left merely to the statement that there are a certain number of military posts? Is it necessary to garrison all these posts? It may be necessary to garrison some of them and not others. Why are we left to the simple statement that there are so many Indians subject to our dominion? Why do they not tell us that, whereas we had then on our broad frontier a great cloud of about fifty thousand Indians who had been removed to the West, and stationed with those before on the frontier, disposed to quarrel, smarting under the grievances which they supposed had been imposed on them in the removal, our Indians are now settled down, a quiet, peaceable population, many of them cultivators of the soil, and at all events not disposed to commit aggressions upon us? To be sure we have acquired others; but so far as this particular class of Indians is concerned, we are vastly better off now than we were then.

I see, then, nothing in the state of our Indian affairs that should call for this increase of the Army. Indeed, I believe that instead of relying on the Army, it would be better to rely on the frontier men themselves, for we shall never have any peace except such as they conquer; and if they choose to conquer it, I am willing to pay them for it, although we pay them more than we should have to pay the regular Army, because we shall then have the privilege of looking into the matter and seeing how far we are responsible, and what the difficulties really are.

What I complain of, then, is that we have no specific information on this subject; that instead of telling us there are so many posts to be garrisoned in order to meet such and such dangers, and that there are so many Indians to be met at such and such points, we are simply given the number of Indians in all our Territories, and the number of military posts. We have no military details whatever as to the necessities of the case. I think we have a right to expect such details from the honorable chairman, and he is unquestionably competent to give them, for he is perfectly familiar with all these matters. When he asks for this large increase of the Army, why not give us a statement of precisely what is necessary, and where and what number of troops is needed for each particular place, and each particular service, without dealing in these generalities? No legislative bodies on the face of the earth, careful as they ought to be, especially with us, and as our ancestors always were in the expenditure of money, ever thought of granting it, except upon the most specific statements showing how the money was to be used.

Some two or three years ago, on the recommendation of the then existing Government, and while the honorable chairman of the committee was at the head of the military Department of the Government, we raised four regiments, if I recollect aright. We, in fact, authorized the increase of the Army to very nearly, if not quite, the extent that was demanded. He will correct me, if I am wrong on that point. Has there been anything since to increase the necessity? Are we in any trouble now that we were not in then, calling for a larger number of troops? The honorable Senator says it is not Utah. What, then, is it? I believe that recommendation was based on similar arguments to those used now. With regard to the number of Indians on our frontier, and the exposed character of the frontier, the necessary protection of the people, and the necessary protection of emigrants, the argument was the same. How is the case changed? We raised the four regiments; we increased the Army; we added $4,000,000 a year to the general expenditure, and now we are called upon to add from seven to ten million dollars more. I should like to know from somebody (because I profess my ignorance on these subjects) what has arisen, in the mean time, between the act we did then, in granting the increase of the Army, and the present time?

All these facts I desire to know; and they were the motive and the reason why I stated to the Senate yesterday, that upon this subject I did not believe the Senate was sufficiently informed; because I think it is the duty of every Senator to judge for himself upon the details of facts, and to take the word of no man, and no particular set of men, in regard to such matters, when merely stated in general terms.

I am not disposed at all to make an issue with the Government, simply for asking an increase of our military force. If that increase is necessary, I am ready to vote for it. It makes no difference to me what the amount is; if the exigencies of the State demand an increase of expenditure, in any quarter, I am perfectly willing to take my share of the responsibility of meeting it; but, with the honorable Senator from Connecticut, I do not believe there is a necessity for this increase, nor do I approve of the use that has been made of the Army, or that I believe will be made of it.

Allusion has been made to the use of the Army in Kansas for the purpose of executing the laws. Sir, I have never yet been able to understand that the President had the slightest right to use any portion of the Army there in that way. I know the power is claimed, and it is claimed under an act giving the President authority to use the Army of the United States in cases where he might use the militia for certain purposes; but that power never extended to the Territories, and does not extend to the Territories now, by existing laws.

Mr. PUGH. The statute of 1807 extends to the Territories.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I beg the Senator's pardon. The statute does not extend to them, as I understand it. That construction can only be made out by implication, and not by any necessary or strong implication either. I am disposed to agree with the honorable Senator from Georgia in the statement which he made the other day, that our ancestors were jealous of allowing the President to use the Army for the purpose of enforcing the laws. I wish the people of the present day were quite as jealous on that subject. Senators who are sensitive in relation to using the Army for one purpose are not so sensitive in regard to its use for other purposes. I never yet have been convinced—and I doubt whether I can be—that there is the slightest authority for using the Army as it has been used in the Territory of Kansas for the purpose of enforcing the laws of Kansas. I know gentlemen have disputed this proposition heretofore; but I must say, that to me it is a new idea that the President may use the Army to protect the polls in a territorial election.

President Pierce held that there was no authority in the Government, whatever, to undertake by any demonstration of force to see that fair voting was had in Kansas. President Buchanan seems to be of a different opinion. I suppose the honorable Senator from Mississippi agrees with the former President in opinion, as he was one of his Cabinet, that the Government possesses no power in such a case; but opinions seem to have changed on that subject. I apprehend the change has been owing to the fact that at that period the polls were to be protected against a superior power, from without the Territory; at the present time the polls are to be protected against the majority of the people of the Territory. That has made the change in the views of the Government. Why, sir, it was certainly so. The Senator will remember well, and the Senate will remember well, that in one of his messages President Pierce expressed a doubt whether he could so use the Army, and he certainly never attempted to use the military force of the country for the purpose of protecting the polls in Kansas, or elsewhere.

We all know what the condition of things then was. We did not get, I believe, even in the report of the honorable chairman, who was then Secretary of War, a direction to the military force in that Territory to see that the polls were protected against invasion, either from abroad or at home. Why? I will not say why, because it would not become me to say why, or to give an opinion or make an intimation on that subject; but the fact was that at that particular period the force outside of the Territory on the Missouri border was very much stronger than the force inside; and the polls, if they were to be protected at all, were to be protected against those from without the Territory who had taken possession of them by force, and shown their inclination and will and determination to take possession of them by force, whenever an election was held. The times have changed within a very short period. The free-State force in the Territory of Kansas is very well able to protect itself now, and see that there is fair voting if left alone; and now it becomes necessary that the military arm of the Government should be used to protect the polls in Kansas! Sir, whether the change in the policy of the Government is owing to the change of circumstances, is not for me to say, but the country will judge for itself upon that subject.

I say, then, sir, seeing no reason, having heard no pressing exigency, illustrated and enforced, calling upon me to vote an increase to our expenditure of $10,000,000 in a time of peace and a time of bankruptcy, by adding to the permanent force of the Army, except loose suggestions and recommendations, unaccompanied by statements of facts, unaccompanied by any detail as to the proposed use, and therefore the proposed necessity, for this great increase of the Army, I must necessarily not only vote for this amendment, or for any other amendment which has a tendency to limit and lessen the increase which is proposed, but also against the bill in any shape in which it may be presented.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, there is never any question which embarrasses me so much as the propositions to increase the military power of the Government of the United States, which are continually moved here. The last reflection that I am willing to endure is the one that any portion of my countrymen shall suffer loss of property and life in the Territories of the United States, owing to my refusal to make the Government strong enough to protect them. Therefore, looking at the condition of things in the Territory of Utah, having made up my mind that the difficulties there are far more serious than Senators here seem to think them to be—much more serious and alarming than the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill here, [Mr. DAVIS,] seems to think—I am perplexed about the vote I shall give.

Sir, we are entering on a new experiment in the government of a Territory. The Territory of Utah stands out entirely distinct from the whole line of our past experience. Our territories heretofore have been settled by our own countrymen; by men trained up under our own Constitution; by men accustomed to the principles and the habits of American republican society—men educated to govern themselves, and maintain their rights and liberties; and men also accustomed by habit to submit with loyalty to the Federal Government in the exercise of its proper jurisdiction over them—men whose religion and whose morals have been derived from the same source with our own—men in every way who were our brethren. These territories have practically been accessible to us; they have been adjacent territories. Here we find a lodgment of a band of men which has been expelled from the heart of our country—cast out and rejected by its civilization—equally intolerant of us and intolerable by ourselves—men who have been driven to hate, and not yet instructed by all their calamities and experience to fear us. This body of the settlers of Utah are men who have set up for themselves another and peculiar religion. They have gone back two thousand five hundred years, and have set up a religion based upon the principles of Judaism—a system repudiated not only by ourselves, but repellent to the religious and moral sense of all Christendom. This community, thus made to fly before us, has taken refuge in passes of the Rocky Mountains, or in a region encircled by the mountains, which secures to them fortifications such as military science never yet has devised, or military art been able to construct. I look at that band, and see the perpetual increase of it by emigration from amongst ourselves, and by emigration from European and South American States; and I see in their religious and political constitution two martial elements—the elements of resistance to law and to authority such as have never yet been successfully overcome when combined: the one a lust of independence, of power, and dominion; and the other a religious license to the base passions of mankind.

This is the internal enemy which is lodged within a Territory across the path which leads from our Atlantic to our Pacific settlements. I trust in God that the difficulties in which we are placed with regard to these people will pass away as easily and lightly as Senators seem to think. I do not believe it. Whether the system of defense or of war to which they shall resort shall be that of open resistance, (for which I believe they have the spirit, urged as they are by superstition and ambition, and by a spirit of retaliation, which I believe they have the power to exercise,) or, practically, a guerrilla war on our people passing from that Territory, and our Army sent to maintain order and authority there, I believe the utmost vigilance on the part of the Government, and the utmost energy, will be demanded; and that seems to me to require, on the part of the Legislature of the United States, some confidence in, and liberality towards, the Administration which has charge of so serious and important a matter.

Sir, I have turned over in my own mind every possible proposition, to see if, with that love of peace which is paramount to all others—if, with a fear of a standing army, which is the strongest constitutional principle I cherish, it is possible, in any way, to accommodate this difficulty with safety, with honor; and I have not been able to find it.

Eight years ago, when that people was perfectly contemptible in numbers, counting only eight or ten thousand, the Government of the United States, the Government of this Republic, this imperial power, instead of sending a loyal citizen of the United States to exercise the administrative power there, and instead of appointing judges trained amongst ourselves, and being unable to find any such in this wild and strange Judaic population, humbled itself and placed the government, the treasury, and the force of the Territory, in the hands of the chief of the high priests of that religion. Ever since that time the United States have stood in the Territory of Utah a Mormon authority; the administration has been a Mormon administration, for it has exercised the powers of government through the hands of the chief of the Mormons. I have always been assured of this, although I cannot say that I was not misled with others, and gave my vote to confirm the first appointment of such a Governor. But I have gone far enough in that direction. I can go no further; and I do not see any reason to believe that when we shall change that policy we shall be able to maintain ourselves in Utah without the demonstration of military force—and a considerable one. I hope it may be demonstration merely; and I believe that a strong demonstration, if anything, will be more effective than the employment of an inferior force, which it may be hoped by the Mormons they can easily overcome or weary out of the Territory.

But for this, I see no reason for increasing the Army of the United States. I agree with all the Senators on this side of the Chamber who have expressed the opinion that the use of the Army has been abused in the Territory of Kansas. I wish to see no more of the employment of the Army of the United States in preserving the purity of elections in the Federal capital. I wish to see no more intervention by the Government of the United States in the elections of the metropolis of the State in which I live. I wish to see no more expeditions of the naval or military powers of the United States to enforce the execution of the fugitive slave law in the city of Boston. But I cannot be content that disaster shall happen to that small band of men who are now representing the United States, and hemmed in in winter quarters, distant from every part of our civilized country, in danger, and wasting away by disease, for aught I know, or by Indian or Mormon depredations deprived of their cattle and of their forage. I cannot endure the thought that I may possibly hear, at some not distant day, that disaster has overtaken that small band.

Then I come back to the question. It must be a military demonstration that shall be made. Why shall it not be a force of volunteers? All the political theories I ever studied and ever learned commended to me the use of volunteers; and yet I have given no vote here which I ever reflected upon with so little satisfaction as I do the votes, never withheld, to pay militia-men and volunteers for maintaining the peace against Indians in Florida and in Georgia; and I look forward with little satisfaction to the vote I shall be asked to give for the payment of volunteers who have protected and maintained public peace in Oregon and Washington Territories. I believe it the most extravagant and the most wasteful mode in which a country can be defended. If I could only be guaranteed that there should be no abuse of armed power, I would then have no hesitation whatever in increasing this force till it should be strong enough to command respect even in the Rocky Mountains, and to exact submission to the Constitution and laws of the United States even from these apostatizing Mormons.

Under these circumstances, it has seemed to me that the line of my duty required me to propose an amendment explaining my views, though it may not be in order to offer it now. This amendment will contain the proposition that the officers and men raised in this new levy, shall be occupied only in and about the business of maintaining the Constitution and laws in the Territory of Utah; and when order and acquiescence shall have been established there, then that they shall be disbanded. I hope that it may be accepted. If it is, under all the circumstances in which I am placed, I shall be able to give my support to this measure, but not pledging myself against any further alterations to make it more acceptable to the Senate. I ask that it be read now.

The Secretary read the amendment as follows:—
And be it further enacted, That such officers and men as shall be enlisted, or raised, under this act, shall be employed only in the maintenance of the laws in the Territory of Utah, or in maintaining order and tranquillity in case of disturbances raised by the Indians, or in the movements connected with those operations; and when public order and tranquillity shall have been established, all such forces so enlisted or raised shall be discharged.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the fairness with which the Senator from New York presents his argument, and the clearness with which he views this subject—and that is characteristic of him generally—induce me to hope that he will not press his amendment after the very brief statement which I propose to make. It is to limit the use of the men, added to the Army by this bill, to operations in Utah; but the bill proposes to increase the size of companies; it proposes to add to each regiment two companies. Does he not perceive that it would be impossible, without breaking up the whole organization, the whole system of the administration of the Army, to send the men added by this bill particularly to Utah, if the rest of the companies to which they belong were sent to service elsewhere? It would be the separation of privates from the company to which they belong; the separation of companies from the regiments to which they belong. He must see that it would be impracticable in the administration of the Army. If there was a proposition to add an integral part to the Army, as by the proposition recommended by the President and Secretary of War, and the commanding General of the Army, to increase the force by five regiments, those five regiments might be sent to Utah, and disbanded at the end of the troubles in Utah; but the Senator must see that it is impossible that his proposition can be executed as the bill stands. I hope therefore that he will either modify his proposition so as to suit the character of the bill, or abandon it altogether. I am sure no one more readily than himself will see the justice of the objection which I present.

I listened with attention to the remarks of the Senator from Maine, and I must say they were characterized by more ingenuity than fairness. His ingenuity was displayed in the first instance by denying the right to use the troops in the Territory, and yet his pride of opinion as a lawyer required him to say that it might be drawn by implication. But, sir, it is in the terms of the law specifically granted. It was the act to which I referred as being that in which Congress, relaxing somewhat from the jealousy with which they viewed the standing Army and Navy, agreed that they might be used, as it had been previously provided the militia of the country might be employed by the President of the United States. The act approved March 3, 1801, is:

“That in all cases of insurrection, or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States, or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval force of the United States as shall be judged necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect.”

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him, as he is arguing that question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I understand that statute, it simply changes the instrumentality. All the effect of the statute is this: where the President had power by law before to use the militia, by that law he is authorized to use the Army. I think it goes no further.

Mr. DAVIS. I saw the ingenious construction which the Senator put upon the law, and it is, of course, with great hesitation that I differ with him in its construction; but the language does not sustain him. It provides for the use of the Army “in all cases of insurrection, or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States, or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia.”

It is giving him additional means. He previously had the power to use the militia. The statute refers specifically to the laws of a Territory; and surely that reference to the laws of a Territory makes it more than an implication that the powers granted to maintain the peace within the States are extended also to the Territories of the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will excuse me, I will state, in a very few sentences, precisely the view which I take. I do not say that the authority ought not to exist in certain cases; but, in my judgment, it is an omission in the law. The previous statute, to which the act of 1807 refers, gives power to the President to use the militia, in certain cases, in the States. It does not go beyond the States; it says nothing whatever of the Territories. This statute says that where, by any previous law, the President has power to use the militia in the States, or in the Territories, he may use the Army; but there is no authority, by the previous law, to use the Army in the Territories.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think the Senator's argument will hold. He refers to a date when the power over the Territories was unquestioned. The first statute was enacted at a time when the laws from the States were adopted in the Territories; and the second comes down to a period when there were laws enacted by the Legislatures of the Territories; and hence the difference in language. Upon this the Senator, perverting the language of President Pierce, hangs another argument: that President Pierce did not consider that authority existed to use the troops to preserve peace in the Territory of Kansas. President Pierce considered, and it was a part of his strict construction of all laws, fundamental or statute, that the provisions of the law must be fulfilled; that the troops must be used as a posse comitatus; that they must be called upon by the civil authority; and that, if insurrection existed, he must first issue his proclamation to the rioters to disperse; and he did issue a proclamation. Then, again, it is within the knowledge of the Senator, certainly, that the troops were employed during the administration of President Pierce; and his insinuation as to any change of circumstances in that Territory was the more unworthy, because it is also within his knowledge that these troops were used to prevent men from shedding blood, when his own political friends alone would have been involved in the hazard.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My statement was, that the troops were not used by President Pierce; and he denied the power to use them for the purpose of protecting the polls in the Territory.

Mr. DAVIS. The troops were not used for any other purpose than that provided by the law. The troops were used to put down insurrection—to suppress rebellion. They were used to check armed bodies of men who were in a state of insurrection—rioters, who were about to disturb the peace; but he did not—and I am proud to remember that he did not—station the troops in places to take care of the private interests of people within the Territory. He was blamed by the political friends of the gentleman himself for that sort of intervention which he always refused to make. He stood by the Constitution and laws passed under it, and used the means put in his hands to execute them according to the terms of those laws. Under the present Administration, I do not understand that a different policy has been pursued; but I am not so familiar, of course, with the acts of the present Administration. Far be it from me to follow the gentleman's example, and pretend to judge of their motives. I arraign the motives of no man. I ascribe to no man purposes unlike those which he avows, unless I am ready first to arraign him as destitute of all honor and truth. I take it for granted that the Administration has pursued the policy which is in exact accordance with the statements made in the official papers which have been laid on the desks of Senators, and there it appears that in every step the troops have been used under the application of the civil authorities, and used as a posse comitatus.

Will the Senator deny the power of the President to send troops to any point where it may be necessary, in order that they shall be within call of the Governor of a Territory, he having reported that those troops are absolutely necessary to preserve the peace? If so, he must deny to the President the powers conferred on him as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy; he must assume that this body is to sit directory of the President as to where the troops are to be stationed; that he is to be stripped of his constitutional prerogative. The Executive may be held responsible, in foro conscientie, for stationing troops where the public necessities do not require them. He is open to that fair criticism, when any Senator or other citizen of the United States may think proper to make it.

I did hope, sir, to escape from this constant and, as it seems, interminable reference to Kansas. I did not suppose that Kansas was to be the subject of discussion on a proposition to answer an application on the part of the Executive, favorable or unfavorable, as the Senate please, for an increase of the standing Army, the military establishment of the United States. But since it is otherwise, and since the fate of the bill seems to hang upon that, the argument must be made. I shall be brief, for I have no taste for the discussion; I do not see its application to the question in hand; but that it may be understood why troops have been kept in Kansas under this Administration, (and if it were necessary, the same reasons belonged to the one which preceded it,) if it is required that the arguments shall be shown to justify the Administration in not sending all its disposable forces to the frontier, so as to preserve quiet among the Indian tribes, I refer to the message of the President, communicating the correspondence of the late Governor of Kansas in relation to affairs in that Territory, and the course which he pursued. Governor Walker in a letter to Mr. Cass, dated July 15, 1857, after referring to difficulties which had occurred, and the necessary use he had made of the troops to prevent an outbreak in the execution of civil process, and the troubles then hanging over him, and the doubts he had of the future, says:

"During this period a telegraphic dispatch was received from General Scott, indicating that General Harney was to proceed with the troops to Utah. Subsequently, General Harney received from the same source what appeared to be an official order on this subject, indicating, if carried into execution, that Kansas would be left, not only by General Harney, but by all the troops, except a single company of infantry, which would be divided between Fort Riley and Fort Leavenworth.

"In view of my official letter of the 2d of June, 1857, and of the conditions upon which I agreed, with great reluctance, to accept the position of Governor of this Territory, namely, that General Harney, in whom I had great confidence, and who was well known to the people of Kansas, and greatly respected by them, should be ordered from Florida, put in special command in Kansas with a large body of troops, and especially of dragoons and a battery, and retained there, subject to my directions, for military operations, if necessary, in Kansas, until the danger was over, and in the absence of which I never would have accepted this office, I could not but conclude that some mistake must have been made by General Scott, and that such a course could never have met the approval of the President and his Cabinet, or of the Secretary of War, by whom this matter was so well understood."

He goes on:

"I received, on Monday morning last, a printed handbill, which I now inclose you, showing certain most alarming proceedings in the town of Lawrence. This was accompanied by information that the people of that town were proceeding that day to elect a mayor, aldermen, and other officers, and would immediately pass and enforce ordinances, in defiance of the laws of the Territory. At the same time, the fact was communicated to me that handbills were circulated from Lawrence throughout the Territory, urging all the disaffected localities, whether towns, cities, or counties, to pursue a similar course of organization; thus overturning the territorial government in detail, and necessarily producing collision with its authority, and, as a consequence, a renewal of civil war. Although still suffering from debility, as the result of my illness, I considered the crisis so alarming as to require my immediate presence at Lawrence, where I proceeded in company with Mr. Secretary Stanton, and after spending several hours there, ascertained to my entire satisfaction that all the facts communicated to me were true, and that this movement at Lawrence was the beginning of a plan, originating in that city, to organize insurrection throughout the Territory. Lawrence is the hot-bed of all the abolition movements in this Territory. It is the town established by the abolition societies of the East, and whilst there are respectable people there, it is filled by a considerable number of mercenaries, who are paid by abolition societies to perpetuate and diffuse agitation throughout Kansas, and prevent a peaceful settlement of this question. Having failed in inducing their own so-called Topeka State Legislature to organize this insurrection, Lawrence has commenced it herself, and, if not arrested, the rebellion will extend throughout the Territory."

Governor Walker, on the 14th of July, 1857, writes to General Harney:

LEAVENWORTH, July 14, 1857.

SIR: I have received authentic intelligence that a dangerous rebellion has occurred in the city of Lawrence, in this Territory, involving an open defiance of the laws, and the establishment of an insurgent government in that city.

This movement, if not speedily arrested, I am also assured, will be extended throughout the Territory, and must result in a renewal of civil war.

It becomes, then, my painful duty, under my instructions from the President of the United States, to request you to furnish a regiment of dragoons, to proceed at once to the immediate vicinity of Lawrence, to act as a posse comitatus in aid of the civil authorities in the due execution of the laws, and for the preservation of the public peace. The service of the troops for this purpose will be discontinued so soon as the public exigency will permit.

Respectfully yours,

R. J. WALKER,
Governor of Kansas Territory.

Brevet Brigadier General W. S. HARNEY, Commanding troops in Kansas, &c., &c.

Going on with the evidence of the necessities which the Governor of the Territory of Kansas found for retaining the troops within the limits of Kansas, and the purpose for which they were retained, I read from his proclamation of July 15th, 1857, to the people of Lawrence:

"It will be perceived that the authority of the territorial government is here distinctly denied, and whilst that of the so-called State government is acknowledged, it is conceded that no charter has been granted by them; indeed, it is a fact that, although this so-called State government has in itself no legal existence or authority, yet you asked and failed to receive a charter from them."

Further in this proclamation he says, speaking to the same people:

"Your evident purpose is thus to involve the whole Territory in insurrection, and to renew the scenes of bloodshed and civil war. Upon you, then, must rest all the guilt and responsibility of this contemplated revolution. You will be justly chargeable in law and in conscience with all the blood that may be shed in this contest, and upon you must fall the punishment. You have elected your officers under this charter, and instructed them to enter upon the immediate discharge of their duties, including the adoption of ordinances and the execution thereof, under an authority having in itself no legal existence, and established in direct defiance of the Government of the United States."

Further he says to them:

"Your purpose, if carried into effect in the mode designated by you, by putting your laws forcibly into execution, would involve you in the guilt and crime of treason."

And again:

"If your proceedings are not arrested, you will necessarily destroy the peace of this Territory, and involve it in all the horrors of civil war."

Again:

"As all arguments heretofore so often addressed by me to you have failed as yet to produce any effect upon you, I have deemed it necessary for our own safety, and that of the Territory, and to save you from the perilous consequence of your own acts, under the authority vested in me by the President of the United States, to order an adequate force of the troops of the United States into your immediate vicinity, to performing the painful duty of arresting your revolutionary proceedings."

Further he says:

"I will accompany the troops to Lawrence with a view to prevent, if possible, any conflict, and in the sincere hope that the revolutionary movement contemplated by you, and now so nearly accomplished, will, ere it is too late, be abandoned by you."

"If you can be influenced by no other motives, the evident fact that the power of the Government is adequate to prevent the accomplishment of your purpose should induce you to desist from these proceedings."

On the 25th of July, Governor Walker sent to Mr. Cass a confidential telegraphic dispatch, written from Camp Cooke, near Lawrence:

"Copies of military orders one and two, by General Lane, acting under direction of the Topeka convention, to organize the whole so-called free-State party into volunteers, and to take the names of all who refuse enrollment, have just reached me. The professed object is to protect the polls, at the election in August, of the new insurgent Topeka State Legislature.

"The object of taking the names of all who refuse enrollment, is to terrify the free-State conservatives into submission. This is proved by recent atrocities committed on such men by the Topekaites. The speedy location of large bodies of regular troops here, with two batteries, is necessary. The Lawrence insurgents await the development of this new revolutionary military organization. Whenever the judicial authority orders arrests the troops will be required as a posse comitatus."

I shall not read any further. I have read enough to show that the executive officer of the Territory appealed, in the various stages of the troubles existing in Kansas, to the President of the United States, through the Secretary of State, for the use of the troops, that he objected to the removal of any portion of the troops, and he presented the conclusive argument that the removal of those troops would result in civil war. No Senator can be more reluctant than myself to maintain troops within the limit of any Territory or State to enforce laws against the will of the people thereof. It is a melancholy evidence of the decadence of the political morals of our times that it has been necessary to employ the troops of the United States to secure the execution of the laws. It gives melancholy forebodings as to the capacity of our people for self-government; but yet the fact is not to be denied.

In the Territory of Kansas was presented an anomalous case. If the President had there relied on the militia, and had called the militia from the Territory, he must have mustered either one side or the other of the then existing contestants. If he had called the militia of any neighboring State into the service of the United States, to execute the laws within that Territory, he would have been but swelling the number of combatants who would have been mustered on that field, for the people were divided throughout the country on the question there pending. The collision in Kansas was but a miniature of the division of opinion throughout the United States. If he had mustered in regiments from the different States, he might have increased the Army to the whole capacity of the Government to maintain them, and it would have been merely bringing more troops to meet each other face to face in blood. It was an exceptional case, and fortunate for the President was it that he was able to use the Army of the United States, as was shown by the result; for not one drop of blood was shed by the army of the United States, thus maintaining the peace in that Territory. Wherever they came, belligerents on the very instant of conflict paused. They respected the persons of the troops of the United States, and they brought peace wherever they went. They arrested men coming fraudulently under the guise of emigration into the Territory, upon the borders of the Territory, announcing that their wagons were filled with agricultural implements. Those wagons were inspected, and instead of plows, hoes, and grain, they there found sabers, muskets, shot, shell, and all the appurtenances that belong to a military campaign. These men were stopped before they entered the Territory, by a small number of troops, and with no other coercion than when they refused to be released, sending them down to a place where they would answer for their attendance.

Whatever might have been the opinion of Senators before the fact, it seems to me that after the army in that Territory has prevented civil war, after it has stopped belligerents in the moment of conflict, and preserved order at every place where it was present, they should now abandon any censure which they might have passed on the proposition as a general one before the facts were developed. When connected with the Department to which reference has been made, but one act was performed by the troops in Kansas which I found it necessary to disapprove, though many received my highest official commendation. That one act was the dispersion of the so-called Topeka Legislature. I looked upon them as men assembled without authority, men who could pass no law which should ever be put in execution, that the crime would be attempting to put the law in execution; and, in the mean time, it might be considered as a mere town-meeting. I was compelled to disapprove the dispersion of that Legislature by the army; and, as my memory serves me, I met criticism on the other side of the Chamber, for that act.

But the Senator from Maine, in his remarks, says, that no argument has been produced to show the necessity of this increase. That is the want of ability. I cannot hope to convince the Senator. He has an opinion which I take it for granted he does not intend to surrender. He says, however, that he cannot adopt the mere opinions of the Secretary of War, or of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. Surely I did not expect that of him. I did not expect any one to adopt an opinion because it was announced by myself, though I think some respect is due to the Secretary of War, because he is charged with the administration of military affairs. When he announces that certain means are necessary to perform the duties with which he is charged, I think it is but fair that we should favorably consider his application, and that the inquiry should commence with the expectation that he had justifiable reasons for making the call; but, if that inquiry should lead us to the opposite conclusion, then of course we ought to reject his proposition. The Committee on Military Affairs entered on the investigation, and came to the conclusion that it was not necessary to add five regiments to the Army. They also came to the conclusion that the Secretary had justifiable cause for asking an increase of the Army.

The Senator from Maine, as I understood him—and I am sure I did not there misunderstand him—said that the opinion of the Secretary of War was the whole basis of our action; and he referred to there being no military recommendation to sustain him. If so, he must have overlooked the report of the Commanding General of the Army, who states, as his opinion, that five regiments are necessary—I quote from memory—without any reference whatever to the troubles in Utah. If the Senator overlooked that, I may offer that additional information. But then he asks, why should not the chairman of the committee state how and where the troops are to be used; at what stations, and for what purposes, against whom, &c. That is not the business of the chairman; it is not within the power of the Senate. The committee have no right to inquire and determine where troops shall be stationed; the Senate have no power to prescribe where troops shall be stationed. It is a total reversal of the whole theory of our Government to assume that power.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator misunderstands me. I did not attempt to assert or to intimate that it was the business of the committee, or the business of the Senate, to prescribe where and how the Army should be used. What I desired was, that we should have some statement from some authority, from some persons acquainted with the subject, to let us know the particular points and purposes for which an increase was required.

Mr. DAVIS. The report of the Secretary does not go into minute details on that point. He refers generally to where they are to be used. Nor could he for six months tell himself where he would wish to use them. That will depend on a party with whom he has no binding contract. It must depend on the good peace of the Indians; it must depend on the conduct of the people of Utah, now known to be in a state of rebellion; it must depend on those who are in a state of rebellion also in the Territory of Kansas; and if reports be true, there are difficulties in other Territories. It must depend upon how far interference with our settlers along the British boundary shall arise from the instigation of the half-breeds of that country, known to be one of the most formidable powers in proportion to their numbers on the continent, and who have long been instigated to hostility on our people in that region. The Secretary could not possibly tell for six months where he would use the troops and state the numbers and regiments that he would have at particular places. It must depend on contingencies. All he could state would be to give to us his plan of campaign for the spring, how many men he expected to send to different places, and with what organization he expected to send them; but I take it for granted the Secretary did not suppose the Senate wished him to do so.

Some other points have been urged against this bill, which I will notice with the hope of removing at least some of the objections. One which seems most frequently to have been presented, is the amount of expenditure; and the conclusion is drawn, as though it were a necessary sequence, that in proportion as you increase the Army you increase the expenditures of the Army. That is not so. If you use one man to perform the duties of five, you must then supply an amount of transportation which makes that man equal to five. If you move troops, as they have been moved, over remote points on the frontier, distances greater beyond the depot of supplies than any European army has ever made a movement, you must expect that it will cost money, and money in no small amount. If you move them to meet emergencies as they arise, unprovided with the means of transportation, other than the military transportation which is kept at the posts, then you must keep that military transportation up to a standard that involves very heavy expense; and hence it is that this year you have a very large deficiency on account of transportation. The pay of the Army is constant; most of the expenses are constant after you fix the point at which the disbursements are to be made, except the transportation. That is the great variable quantity, and in proportion as you move the men, so you must increase, and rapidly increase, the expenditures of each man who is so removed. I am not able, and have not attempted, to make the calculation; I have not the elements on which the calculation would depend; and I am not able, therefore, to state what increase would counteract this great expenditure for transportation; but it may be stated, as a general proposition, that there is a certain increase in the number of men which would relieve us from those expenses of transportation, so that they would cost us less than the use of the same number of men at many points where the transportation is very expensive.

As to the reduction, I think that follows from the law; but if it does not, I have no objection to adopt any provision which in the minds of Senators may be necessary, as soon as the exigency of the public service will permit, (they may fix a day, or they may fix it by an event,) to reduce the number of men per company as low as I think any one here will say it should be reduced.

Mr. SEWARD. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I will suggest a modification of my amendment to remove one difficulty in the way, and make it read thus:

Such officers and men as shall be enlisted or raised under this act, shall remain in service only until order and tranquillity shall have been established in the Territory of Utah; and whenever that object shall have been established, in the judgment of the President of the United States, the said officers and men shall be disbanded.

That avoids the difficulty.

Mr. DAVIS. The proposition in the first section of the bill contemplates a change of organization. I cannot accept the amendment, because it does not contemplate a change of organization; but, so far as the amendment goes to a reduction, I have no objection, if the Senate think proper to adopt the reduction in that form. I think it will answer all the purposes of the public service. I shall not insist on the mere idea of organization, though I think the addition of two companies to each regiment will be a better organization.

The other argument which I wished to notice was, that troops stationed in the neighborhood of Indians caused war. Now, I would ask from what part of our history is that assertion drawn? One incident was only alluded to, and that was an incident in Oregon; and the Senator from New Hampshire did most recklessly bring forward that incident. I waive the—I shall not characterize it further than to say the familiarity with which he made a personal reference; but his case was one in which the outrage represented was committed by troops not authorized by the United States, but sent out under the territorial government. The officer who made that very report on which the Senator relied for his argument, was then contending against the employment of such irregular or volunteer forces, and insisting that regular troops alone could preserve the peace on the frontier; that if regular troops alone were brought in contiguity with the Indians peace could be preserved; and that peace was hazarded and utterly destroyed by the presence of the territorial militia. That was his argument, and from that argument the Senator draws a single statement—being his accusation of bad conduct against those volunteers—and relies on it to show that when troops come in contact with the Indians, war is the result! The mere statement defeats his whole object.

Then we were told to follow the example of Penn, and to make treaties, and we should have peace. Sir, the very troubles we now have in Oregon and Washington naturally result from the treaties which were made. It was part of the view which I took when I first addressed the Senate this morning, that these treaties extinguished the titles of the Indians to the land, drove them back from the country in which they had lived, where they had small fertile valleys, and lived in a segregated condition. Driven back from their old homes into a country not suited for agricultural purposes, they were thus brought into a concentration that rendered them effective, and the wars are the result of that very policy of making treaties. If there had been no treaties; if the Indians had continued to live where they were, and troops had been stationed near them, I have no idea that the wars would have occurred. So far from being the advocate of treaties with the Indians, I think it is an absurdity. They are pupils, wards in charge of the United States, and liberal and humane terms should be made with them; but they have no right to treat. They have neither the intelligence nor the capacity to understand or enforce a treaty. I think the whole policy of the Government from the beginning, in making treaties with Indians, has been entirely wrong. Ours is the only Government that has pursued it, and all other Governments have held more peaceful relations with the Indians than our own. We have been more liberal to them; we have paid them larger sums of money; and, therefore, the conflicts which have resulted between this Government and its Indian tribes must be attributed to this policy.

I shall not follow Senators who have undertaken to criticise the movement to Utah. I am not sufficiently informed of the facts in relation to it. Why the movement was made at so late a period as to arrest the march of that army in the mountains, why the army was not able to reach Salt Lake before the winter set in, depend on facts which must be minutely examined before any man, I think, can hazard an opinion. The delay in starting is, known, for some portion of it, to have been due to the constant demands of the executive of the Territory of Kansas that the troops should not be withdrawn from that Territory in the then rebellious condition of a portion of the inhabitants. What other causes existed, I do not know. They may be sufficient to explain the fact that the force now is locked up in the mountains, unable to complete the campaign, and exposed to all the horrors of a northern winter in that elevated region. I think, however, it is fair that Senators should at least wait until they are in possession of all the facts, before they proceed to criticise the movement and cast censure because the campaign is arrested in the mountains at this moment.

As to the economical consideration of the number of animals lost in the mountains, I could not see the application which was made of that branch of the argument to the remark he had previously made about the maintenance of a military force on the frontier as an economical mode of protecting our citizens settled upon it. These troops on their march to Utah, as is well known, were not engaged in the duty of protecting the frontier inhabitants; and whatever expense may attend the movement, whatever loss may result from any improper administration of the campaign, certainly does not at all apply to the argument I presented of the good economy of keeping a sufficient force on the frontier to protect our frontier inhabitants.

Several Senators alluded to the use of the troops on the frontier to maintain the laws in a Territory; and one at least spoke of it as absurd to require the troops to execute a law of the people themselves. Sir, I think that is answered by the few extracts which I have read from the correspondence of the Governor of the Territory of Kansas. He there found a party in open rebellion against the Government, a party openly defying the territorial government instituted by the organic act of Congress, and all laws passed under it. That troops should be necessary to execute laws on a people thus standing in open defiance to the Government of the United States, seems to me to be a proposition so plain that I am only surprised anybody should say force was not required to maintain or execute the laws under such circumstances. What the force should be is an open question; but we all are sufficiently familiar with the history of that Territory, whilst very little of it may be known accurately in its details, to understand that if the men of either side had been employed, if those who recognized the territorial government had been mustered into the service of the United States Army, fed and paid to execute the laws on those who defied their authority, it would merely inflict a civil war, in which the United States would have been a party; and the only practicable mode in which those laws could be executed peacefully and without bloodshed, was to employ men not having the excitement which existed among the inhabitants of the Territory, to wit, the troops of the United States, who have, I believe, as leniently as possible, and with a forbearance which entitles them to high credit, maintained the peace of the Territory, and sustained the civil authorities in the execution of the laws of the land.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the clause in President Pierce's message to which I referred in order to sustain the position which I assumed in regard to the different policy assumed by the last and the present Administration. President Pierce's message to Congress of January 24th, 1856, contains this clause:

"But it is not the duty of the President of the United States to volunteer interposition by force to preserve the purity of elections, either in a State or Territory. To do so would be subversive of public freedom."

The occasion of that statement by President Pierce in that message, of which I read only a single sentence, was this: he was applied to on the part of the citizens of the Territory to defend the polls against invasions from Missouri. We all had heard, and we all knew, that whenever an election was held in that Territory it was interrupted and controlled by armed bands of men coming from the other side of the border, who took possession of the polls, appointed their own officers, and had their own election. In consequence of that, when the Government of President Pierce professed its willingness to do ample justice, and to see that peace and order were maintained in the Territory, an application was made to him by certain citizens, in writing, stating the facts—they have all been communicated to Congress—and requesting him to interpose, not only to preserve the peace of the Territory, but to guard the polls, in order that there might be a fair expression of public sentiment; and this is his answer. He denies that there is any power on the part of the United States by force to preserve the purity of election; that is to say, to protect the polls in order that the people of Kansas might have a fair opportunity to vote.

Mr. DAVIS. I deny that too.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well. That is what I stated was the policy of President Pierce. I did not undertake to quarrel with it; I made no comment on it; but I said the present Administration had adopted a different course. I said so, because it is perfectly notorious that the present Administration has used the United States troops for the purpose of preserving the purity of elections, and has stationed them about the polls at recent elections held in the Territory of Kansas. All I did, and I think it was a perfectly just course for me to adopt, was to call attention to the fact that, at the period when the polls were constantly taken possession of by people outside of the Territory, the Government of the United States denied its power to interfere; but the moment things were changed, and the great majority of the people of that Territory became competent to preserve the polls themselves and take control of them, the United States troops were then used for the purpose of protecting the polls. It is a very singular fact to me, that the policy of the Government should have changed so totally and so suddenly as it did. The people of the country will draw their own inferences from the facts. Such were the facts, as I understand them, and as they are admitted.

Mr. DAVIS. I cannot see where the Senator derives that position of the present Administration; nor do I possibly admit the facts which he presents, in relation to armed bodies of men being allowed to conquer and overturn the elections. Those are statements which have been controverted; but I did not intend to interrupt the Senator further than, when he spoke of these matters as being admitted, to say to him that I do not admit the facts he states.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not suppose the honorable Senator admits the fact, and I did not call on him to admit the fact, but the fact is clear enough to the country. It is not denied there. It is not denied in the message. The late President simply denies the power to use the Army of the United States for any such purpose. That was his policy; but I say the policy of this Administration, in point of fact, is different, because it is notorious that the troops have been used for that purpose since Mr. Buchanan came into power. Mr. Walker used them. He had a large number of troops stationed at Kickapoo, and at Leavenworth, and they were stationed there, as was said in the public communications that were made, for the purpose of protecting the polls of that Territory. I do not say that there was any bad motive about it. I say the fact is singular, and presents itself to the country for the people of the country to notice and remark upon as they please. I say the whole course of policy with regard to this particular point has been changed. Whether that change was owing to the different state of things in the Territory or not, it is not for me to say.

Now, sir, with regard to the statute of which I spoke, its provisions are very clear. The first statute on the subject, the act of 1795, reads in this wise:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation, or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper. And in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State, or of any other State or States, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed."

Upon these two sections connected with the law afterwards passed in 1807, the argument is founded that the President had a right to use the Army, in order to enforce the execution of the laws of a Territory. Clearly no such power is conferred on the President in this act in regard to the use of the militia. The word "Territory" is not in the act; it names no places where the militia is to be used, except the States. The President has a right to call forth the militia, for the purpose of suppressing insurrections, and he has a right to use it for the purpose of preventing obstructions to the laws of any State, or of the United States. That is the extent of his power, under the act which I have read. Then what is the second law? It is a very short one: "that in all cases of insurrection, or obstruction to the laws either of the United States or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia," &c., he may use the Army. Now, "where" is it lawful for the President of the United States to use the militia? Anywhere but in the States? There is no specific authority except as to the States. What I said was, that if he had that authority in the Territories, it was by implication, and not by any positive provision of law.

But the difficulty is beyond that. It is that the laws of a Territory are not the laws of the United States. The President assumes to use the Army under these provisions, for the purpose of doing what? For the purpose of enforcing the laws of the Territory of Kansas. I cannot find, in either of these statutes, any authority given to the President to use the militia for the purpose of preventing obstructions to the laws of a Territory. His authority to use the militia is confined to the case of obstructions to the laws of the United States; and I say that the law of a Territory, passed by a Territorial Legislature, and approved by the Governor, is not a law of the United States in any shape or form, that I am able to understand.

The point which I endeavored to make in reference to this matter was, in the first place, that there is no specific authority given to use the Army in a Territory at all; and, in the next place, that, if the President has any such power by implication, it is only a power to enforce the laws of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether he construes the word "where" to refer to the locality, or to the conditions, the circumstances, the status, under which the militia may be used?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I construe it to mean that, whenever he has authority to use the militia, in any place, for any purpose specified by the previous law, he may use the Army.

Mr. DAVIS. And the previous law recites under what circumstances he may use the militia.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. But not at what place?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; but it speaks of the purpose. I will not undertake to say, that where there is an insurrection against the Government, the President may not use the Army; but I am speaking of the specific use, and I say he has no right to use the Army by these statutes for the purpose of enforcing the laws of a Territory, or preventing obstructions to the laws of a Territory.

Mr. DAVIS. I was very reluctant from the beginning to get involved in this theory about the government of a Territory. My own opinion is, that the law of a Territory, in the early period of our history, was a law of the United States. My own opinion is, that not until you struck off the territorial bill the requirement that the laws should be submitted to Congress, and subjected to their revision, did they ever become independent laws of the Territory.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And there was no such provision in the act organizing the Territory of Kansas. Then that goes far enough for my purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. Then it became the law of the Territory, in the language of that statute.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But there is no such authority to enforce the law of the Territory. The authority is confined to preventing obstructions to the laws of the United States—not the laws of any particular State.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator, I think, has certainly not looked at this subject lately, or he would find that provision is made upon the application of the Governor or Legislature of a State to the President, for him to call out the militia, and use the Army and Navy to maintain the laws of a State within its own limits.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly, under certain circumstances; but, as I say, that is not specifically given to the Governor of any Territory anywhere that I can find. I do not know that I shall convince the Senator, as his mind is made up; but I wish to explain what I have thought myself. I say that under these statutes there is no specific authority in regard to a Territory. If there is, it arises by implication from the word "Territory" being used. My own idea is, that it was an omission in the act. I do not know that I should quarrel about it, because I am willing to give all power that is necessary. I should take no exception, even under these acts, to a legitimate use of the Army for proper purposes, if the power could be derived by any implication, and its exercise was absolutely necessary. The point I make is, that I could never see that it was actually given by the terms of the statute to which gentlemen have referred, as conferring it. I believe the Attorney General, in arguing the matter, does not derive the whole power from the first section I have read, giving a general authority—

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Attorney General's opinion was that the militia could be employed within a Territory.

Mr. FESSENDEN. By virtue of the first section?

Mr. DAVIS. That by virtue of the first act he has referred to, the militia could be employed in a Territory as a necessary consequence of the power of the Government over a Territory, and the grant within the limits of a State. In relation to the act of 1807, I do not think the opinion of the Attorney General was asked for, or that his opinion touches that question at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With regard to the act of 1807 my point is that it confers no new power and simply changes the instrumentality. The President had the power before to use the militia in certain cases and for certain purposes, and in those cases and for those purposes, conferred by previous laws, the President had by that latter act the power to use the Army. It goes no further. It makes no new cases and provides for no new purposes anywhere that I can conceive, although it might have been the intention of the act so to do.

I rose simply to state more specifically the points which I made before in reference to these matters, in order that they might be more definitely understood, as the Senator from Mississippi did not seem exactly to comprehend the ideas I intended to convey; but I wish to say one word before closing, in reply to what I understood to be the argument of my friend from New York. If I believed that this increase of the Army was absolutely necessary in order to bring about a proper state of things in the Territory of Utah, I should agree with him, and I would be willing to vote for any increase that was necessary to effect that purpose or any similar purpose; but the point I make, and the difficulty in my own mind, is, that there has been no attempt to demonstrate that anything of that kind is necessary in the Territory of Utah. The Senator from Mississippi expressly gives it up. He does not base the demand which is made for an increase of the Army upon existing difficulties in Utah at all, but upon another ground; and when my friend assumes that to be the fact as a basis for his proposed action, he assumes what is not asserted by the Administration, what is not asserted by the Secretary of War, and not contended for by the Committee on Military Affairs, who have reported this bill. It is something which he assumes for himself as the basis of his own action.

If there were any facts in the case to convince me that the proposed increase of six thousand or seven thousand men was necessary, in order to accomplish that purpose, to restore peace in that Territory, and to preserve the rights of our people who travel in that region, it might be another question; but the difficulty in my mind has been from the beginning—and I shall be convinced only when that difficulty is removed—that no facts have been exhibited to show us that this increase is necessary for any of these purposes. It rests on assertions that have been used ever since I remember anything about public affairs to authorize an increase of the Army from time to time, until it has gone from eight thousand, where it was fixed in 1842, to eighteen thousand now, and is going on upon the same principle, without any facts, or any war, in time of peace, regularly, unless we check it in the beginning, from eighteen thousand to thirty thousand, and from thirty thousand up to fifty thousand, and God only knows where it will end, if we are to receive mere statements and demands of the Administration instead of facts to show that something of the kind is absolutely needed by the exigency of the country. We must stop somewhere; we must call for proofs somewhere; we must call for facts at some point, and not go blindly on merely to register the decrees of an Administration who say to us that more troops are wanted, without telling us why or wherefore, or giving us facts to establish their opinions, if they give us any opinions on the subject.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall detain the Senate but a very few minutes upon the point which is so often renewed of the connection of the campaign to Utah with the proposed increase of the Army. It is not presented in the report of the Secretary of War as his reason for the increase. The Commanding General of the Army states that the increase is necessary without reference to the troubles in Utah. Whilst I denied in the beginning that that was the reason for the request that the Army should be increased, it is nevertheless certainly clear that the withdrawal of the troops from other service to make a campaign to Utah creates a necessity for increasing the Army. So, if it be necessary to keep troops in Kansas, the withdrawal of those troops from their ordinary duties on the frontier creates a necessity for an increase.

The argument of the Senator from New York, based on the expectation of a campaign, such as may prove to be true, would require a large increase of the Army for that purpose, and if the Army were increased to the whole extent the bill proposes, and the campaign should realize the expectations of the Senator from New York, it would probably require all our troops to carry on the service at that point. In the mean time our forts along the sea-board are wholly abandoned; all our troops are thrown on the frontier. We have now only at one or two points any artillery force to hold possession of our fortifications. This is a condition of things which I hold to be objectionable, against which we should provide. If the campaign to Utah be made by the Administration, as they have power to make it, and troops be withdrawn from other points, and it be necessary to increase the force and put troops at the other points, I do not think it is right for Congress to refuse that increase because they may not approve of the campaign to Utah. They have not the power to prevent it, and therefore they are bound to submit to it. At the same time it is possible for us to get along without any garrisons in the fortifications. I rose merely to say that the argument based on the theory of the campaign to Utah, sometimes taken on the one side and sometimes on the other, leads to a conclusion which I think is not true.

Mr. PUGH. I propose to the Senator from New York an amendment, in the shape of a proviso, to the second and third sections of the bill, which I think will accomplish his purpose. I propose to add to the second section the following:

Provided, That after the expiration of two years from the date of this act, no further enlistment shall be made for any regiment, until each company thereof shall be reduced to eighty privates.

To the third section I propose to add:

Provided, That after the expiration of two years from the date of this act, no further appointment of assistant surgeons shall be made until the number thereof shall be reduced below the number heretofore allowed by law.

Mr. SEWARD. Let it be printed

Mr. PUGH. I offer these amendments informally, and move that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 26, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM D. HALEY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

STENOGRAPHER TO SELECT COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the ordering the main question on the following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. STANTON:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to investigate the charges against members and officers of the last Congress, growing out of the disbursement of any sum of money by Lawrence, Stone & Co., be authorized to employ a stenographer, at the usual rate of compensation.

The main question was ordered; and, under the operation of the previous question, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INVALID PENSION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion for one moment, to enable me to move to refer to a committee some papers, now on file, in reference to a private claim.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I would do so with a great deal of pleasure, but that debate closes at one o'clock to-day, and every moment that I would give away now would be deducted from the time of the gentleman who has the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana, that the reference can be made under the rules of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WINSLOW in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill (No. 3) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending 30th June, 1859, Mr. ANDERSON being entitled to the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of availing myself of the present opportunity to submit to this House and the country the views that will control my action in reference to the admission of Kansas under the Leecompton constitution. But, before doing so, as I am a stranger here, belonging to neither of the prominent political parties, and having up to this time remained a silent member, it may be well enough for me, in order that I may not be misunderstood by my political friends, nor misrepresented by my political enemies, to define my position. I am, sir, the representative of a constituency who, looking to the purity and permanency of our institutions, demand that the term for the naturalization of foreigners shall be extended; who desire to render harmless all foreign influence in our political affairs; who deny to Congress the constitutional power to interfere with the domestic institutions of either States or Territories; who insist upon a strict construction of the Federal Constitution; who believe that the wisest and best relation that can subsist in this Government between the white and African races is that of master and servant; and who ardently desire the harmony of the States of this Confederacy, and their perpetual union. These are the principles enunciated by me during my canvass in 1856, and fully indorsed by a very respectable majority of my constituents. These principles shall by me be defended to the utmost of my ability, whenever and wherever assailed.

Permit me also to remark, before I advance to the discussion of the subject under consideration, that I now find myself placed in a condition where I must from necessity act with one or the other of the prominent political parties in this House upon the great subject of our domestic institutions—a subject which, from my observations here, and the known sentiments and purposes of the Republican party, I am reluctantly and painfully forced to say is hurrying us on with fearful rapidity to that point of time in the history of our country when in all probability (without divine interposition) the chain that now binds this Union together will be severed.

Actuated by a loyal and unwavering devotion to my country, I have no hesitancy in adopting the only course left me as a member of this Congress, and the representative of a just and intelligent, magnanimous and patriotic constituency; and that is, to support the Administration in every attempt to resist the fearful encroachments sought to be made upon the constitutional rights of the South. By so doing, I am satisfied that I shall faithfully represent the will of the American party of my district and State, who have no affinity or sympathy with the principles of the Republican party.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the contemplation of the important and agitating subject under consideration—a subject now engrossing the undivided attention of the American people—one that we should seek to settle wisely and judiciously; for the result of the disposition we may make of it will be either to allay or greatly increase this excitement. The lawless events connected with the history of Kansas have been the exciting theme for years; outrage after outrage has been perpetrated there; the laws of the Territory and the authority of the United States have both been contemptuously spurned and trampled under foot by a part of her population. No Territory of this Union has ever before been settled by such an ungovernable, reckless people. They have been the source of continual trouble and expense to the Government; and if I do not greatly mistake the sentiment of a majority of the people of this nation, they demand that Kansas shall now be admitted as a State and left to manage her internal affairs in her own way. Then the excitement, beyond her own limits at least, will in all probability pass away.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that no apparent cause exists in the proceedings of the people of Kansas in the formation of the Leocompton constitution, that can justify us in refusing her admission; but that we may rightfully, legally, and constitutionally permit her to become one of the States of this Union.

The celebrated Kansas-Nebraska bill, approved on the 30th of May, 1854, authorized the people of that Territory to elect representatives, make their own laws, and form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. The twenty-first section of that act provides that the time, place, and manner of conducting all elections shall be prescribed by law. The people, under this act, met and elected their representatives to the Territorial Legislature. On the 19th of February, 1857, the Kansas Legislature passed an act providing for the election of delegates to frame a State constitution. That election was held on the third Monday in June, and the convention met on the first Monday in September. Much has been said in the newspapers and elsewhere as to the inefficiency of that law to secure a fair, honest vote of the people.

Now, sir, in order to disabuse the public mind and satisfy the country that there never was an election law enacted that sought to guard more vigilantly the rights of the electors, and to secure a fair and full vote, than the Kansas convention act, I shall ask the reporters to append to my remarks a synopsis of it, and also certain parts of a letter from H. Clay Pate, indorsed by gentlemen of high respectability in the Territory of Kansas.

You will perceive, from an examination of that act, that the probate judge of each county in the Territory was required to transmit to the Secretary and Governor of the Territory, immediately after the 1st day of May, and weeks before the inaugural address of Governor Walker, delivered on the 27th day of May, 1857, a list of the voters in each county. Before the delivery of this address, it is fair to presume that Governor Walker had fully informed himself in regard to the affairs of Kansas. He knew that the registering of the voters could not by law be continued beyond the 1st day of April; and he must have known, I presume, on the 27th day of May, what counties had failed to return the lists required by law, and the reasons why that failure had occurred. In that address he uses the following language:

"But it is said that the convention was not legally called, and that the election will not be freely and fairly conducted. The Territorial Legislature is the power ordained for this purpose by the Congress of the United States, and, in opposing it, you resist the authority of the Federal Government. The Legislature was called into being by the Congress of 1854, and is recognized in the very latest congressional legislation. It is recognized by the present Chief Magistrate of the Union, just chosen by the American people, and many of its acts are now in operation here by universal assent. As the Governor of the Territory of Kansas, I must support the laws and the constitution; and I have no other alternative, under my oath, but to see that all constitutional laws are fully and fairly executed. I see in this act calling the convention no improper or unconstitutional restrictions upon the right of suffrage. I see in it no test oath, or other similar provisions objected to in relation to previous laws, but clearly repealed as repugnant to the provisions of this act, so far as regards the election of delegates to this convention. It is said that a fair and full vote will not be taken. Who can safely predict such a result? Nor is it just for a majority, as they allege, to throw the power into the hands of a minority, from a mere apprehension (I trust entirely unfounded) that they will not be permitted to exercise the right of suffrage."

Thus you find him eulogizing the act, and giving it as his opinion that a fair election will be held; he anticipates that, in all probability, a portion of the people would not vote. Now, Governor Walker was very remiss in advising himself of the affairs of the Territory if he did not know that they had determined not to vote; if he did not know that the people in those counties where no registry had been made were the warm, determined advocates of the Topeka constitution, and that they did not intend to participate in the election, and were resolved that no other constitution than that framed by the mobocratic Topeka convention should ever become the supreme law of Kansas. Had he sought information on this subject, I apprehend he would have ascertained that it was the fault of the people that no registry was made in the counties where no vote was taken. Hear the chief Executive of the nation on this subject; a man who rises above the sectional prejudices of the day. In his message, he says:

"At the time of the election for delegates an extensive organization existed in the Territory, whose avowed object it was, if need be, to put down the lawful government by force, and to establish a government of their own under the so-called Topeka constitution."

The persons attached to this revolutionary organization abstained from taking any part in this election. It was then their own choice not to vote. They had a fair opportunity to exercise the right of suffrage; but they preferred to follow the advice of partisan leaders at a distance, and to continue their resistance to law and order that had marked their rebellious course from the time they set their feet upon the soil of Kansas. The distinguished author of the Nebraska-Kansas bill, on the 12th day of June, 1857, but three days before the election for delegates, and six weeks after the expiration of the time within which the registry of the votes was by law completed, and after it was known that the "emigrant aid" agitators and disorganizers in Kansas did not intend to vote, delivered a speech at Springfield, Illinois, in which he said:

"Kansas is about to speak for herself through her delegates, assembled in convention to form a constitution, preparatory to her admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Peace and prosperity now prevail throughout her borders. The law under which her delegates are about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions. There is every reason to hope and believe that the law will be fairly interpreted and impartially executed, so as to insure to every bona fide inhabitant the free and quiet exercise of the elective franchise.

"If any portion of the inhabitants, acting under the advice of political leaders in distant States, shall choose to absent themselves from the polls, and withhold their votes, with a view of leaving the free-State Democrats in a minority, and thus securing a pro-slavery constitution, in opposition to the wishes of a majority of the people living under it, let the responsibility rest on those who, for partisan purposes, will sacrifice the principles they profess to cherish and promote. Upon them, and upon the political party for whose benefit, and under the direction of whose leaders they act, let the blame be visited of fastening upon the people of a new State institutions repugnant to their feelings, and in violation of their wishes. The organic act secures to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject to no other limitation than that which the Constitution of the United States imposes. The Democratic party is determined to see the great fundamental principle of the organic act carried out in good faith. The present election law in Kansas is acknowledged to be fair and just. The rights of the voters are clearly defined; and the exercise of those rights will be efficiently and scrupulously protected. Hence, if the majority of the people of Kansas desire to have it a free State, (and we are told by the Republican party that nine tenths of the people of that Territory are free-State men,) there is no obstacle in the way of bringing Kansas into the Union as a free State by the votes and voice of her own people, and in conformity with the great principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act; provided all the free-State men will go to the polls, and vote their principles in accordance with their professions. If such is not the result, let the consequences be visited upon the heads of those whose policy it is to produce strife, anarchy, and bloodshed in Kansas, that their party may profit by slavery agitation in the northern States of this Union."

Thus spoke Senator Douglas. The principles enunciated by him on that occasion, were just and true; and all we now demand is that they shall be faithfully carried out. He admits, and I desire to repeat it, that the election law is just and fair in all its objects and provisions, and if the free-State party fail to vote—acting under the advice of political leaders in distant States—let the responsibility rest upon those whose policy it is to produce strife, anarchy, and bloodshed in Kansas, that their party may profit of slavery agitation in the northern States of this Union. I hope, sir, that the Democratic party, as a body, will follow his advice, and enforce this responsibility though he may "back down." Sir, the position cannot be maintained that a portion of the people of Kansas had no opportunity to vote, and therefore the Leocompton constitution should be rejected. The opportunity was offered, and they refused to avail themselves of it. They did it voluntarily. They preferred to risk the consequences; let them now reap the fruit of their rebellion. Is the lawless spirit manifested by them to be sanctioned and encouraged by us, the representatives of a law-abiding people? Are we to become parties to their rebellious conduct, and permit them to triumph over law and order? No. I apprehend we know too well the paramount importance of sustaining the laws of the country.

But, sir, it is urged as an objection to the admission of Kansas that the constitution made by delegated authority has not been submitted to the people. Is that any business of ours? Are we authorized to supervise their action in the formation of their government? Had not the people the sole and unquestioned right to determine whether they would have their constitution submitted or not? They have not required it to be done in the Kansas convention act. They have demanded it by no act of theirs. Then tell me, I ask, by what authority do we demand it? The act simply declares—

"That the delegates elected shall assemble in convention at the capital of said Territory, on the first Monday in September next, and shall proceed to form a constitution and State government which shall be republican in its form, for admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatsoever, by the name of the State of Kansas."

This is the only direction given to their delegates, from which it is evident that its submission was not required. The people had the right to intrust their delegates with the entire formation of their constitution. The startling and monstrous doctrine recently promulgated in certain quarters, that the people could not delegate this power to their agents is utterly irreconcilable with the principle of popular sovereignty. If they had not the right to delegate that power, then they are not sovereign—then they have not the right to manage their affairs in their own way. On the contrary, I assert that the very highest exercise of popular sovereignty is the right to delegate power; without this power on the part of the people no representative government could exist; and I believe it is the first time in this country that I have heard it boldly asserted that the sovereign people could not constitute agents to transact their business.

Is it not absurd for you to undertake to limit or contravene their authority to act by their agents, and, at the same time, declare that they possess sovereign powers? Are we not here to-day the agents of the sovereign people, clothed by them with the most solemn and important functions? Have they not confided to us the very highest interests of the nation? Are we not exercising sovereign power in regulating commerce with foreign nations; in coining money, and regulating the value thereof; in declaring war; in raising and supporting armies; in providing and maintaining a Navy; in the enactment of all laws necessary to carry on the machinery of this mighty Government; to protect the honor and integrity of this Union; to promote and advance the great interests of this nation; and are our acts to be submitted to them for ratification before they take effect? No; our acts are their acts. If the laws enacted by us are unwise or injudicious, they direct us or others to repeal them. If the people of Kansas do not like the Lecompton constitution, they can change it any time they think proper. They possess, as all must admit, the inherent and inalienable power to alter or remake their constitution whenever they, in their wisdom, choose to do so.

Permit me, sir, to inquire how has it become so important to submit the constitution of Kansas to a vote of the people? When before in the history of this Government has it been demanded by the national Legislature that the constitution of a State asking for admission should be first submitted to the vote of the people? The constitutions of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Missouri, Maine, Vermont, and Wisconsin were not submitted. Was the great doctrine of popular sovereignty violated in the admission of each of those States? Did the great and patriotic men who then composed the national Legislature, and who, by their patriotism, their wisdom, their unequalled statesmanship, and devotion to the sovereignty of the people, reflected unfading honor upon their country and its institutions—did they permit them to be robbed of this transcendent power? No. They knew, as every disinterested statesman now knows, that the people had the right to exercise their sovereign power in the way and manner they thought proper.

But, sir, let me ask if the people of Kansas have not had submitted to them by the convention the great question that inaugurated the Kansas-Nebraska bill, the question out of which has grown all the difficulties that have for so long distracted the peace, safety, and quietude of that people? That act declares "that the true intent and meaning thereof is not to legislate slavery into any State or Territory, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to regulate their institutions in their own way." Under it, "Kansas," when admitted as a State, was to be received into the Union "with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission." The entire scope and effect of the Kansas-Nebraska bill was to render "void and inoperative the Missouri compromise line," which prohibited slavery north of 36° 30'. It reinstated a great principle; conferred upon the people a great and important right north of that line—the right to regulate their institutions as they might choose: all other governmental rights they could exercise before. Immediately after the passage of this bill, the controversy in regard to the institution of slavery in that Territory commenced. It was the great and all-absorbing question; the one that rose paramount to all others; the one that has alone convulsed that people and produced the "strife, contention, and bloodshed" that has brought everlasting disgrace upon that Territory, and given to it an unenviable name in the history of this country. It was the question that the Kansas bill designed should be settled by the people; it was the only one that the great body of that people expected ever to be submitted to them for their decision, until recently; and as evidence of this fact, I call your attention to a part of the address of the Hon. F. P. Stanton, then Secretary and acting Governor of the Territory of Kansas, published on the 17th of April, 1857. He says:

"The Government especially recognizes the territorial act which provides for assembling a convention to form a constitution with a view to making application to Congress for admission as a State into the Union. That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention; and all preceding repugnant restrictions are repealed. In this light the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention. I do not doubt, however, that in order to avoid all pretext for resistance to the peaceful operation of this law, the convention itself will, in some form, provide for submitting the great distracting questions regarding their social institution which has so long agitated the people of Kansas, to a fair vote of all the actual bona fide residents of the Territory, with every possible security against fraud and violence. If the constitution be thus framed, and the question of difference thus submitted to the decision of the people, I believe that Kansas will be admitted by Congress without delay, as one of the sovereign States of the American Union, and the territorial authorities will be immediately withdrawn."

This was the language of Secretary Stanton to the people of Kansas, after the passage of the Kansas convention act, long before the election of delegates to the convention. He distinctly informed them that the Government of the United States recognized the territorial act, which provided for assembling a convention to form a constitution; that the "distracting question which had so long agitated the people of Kansas would be submitted to a fair vote of the people." He knew their views, feelings, and sentiments, in relation to this distracting question, and he doubtless concluded that by giving them assurance that the question of slavery would be submitted, (the only question designed to be submitted,) they would be satisfied. But no, sir; as intimated by Senator DOUGLAS, there were doubtless "other actors in this controversy, far away from the borders of Kansas," who controlled and directed the movements of the reckless Abolition army that had been quartered on Kansas by the Emigrant Aid Society, who urged that that deluded people should not submit to the legally constituted authorities of the country. They obeyed; became rebels to the Government, and refused to vote upon this agitating question, fairly and legally submitted; and now have the temerity to ask us to reject the constitution and sanction this fell spirit of insubordination to the legally constituted authorities of the land. Can any one doubt the wisdom and propriety of submitting the slavery clause alone to the people of Kansas? It was the question that far transcended in importance and interest all others combined. Had it been involved with other questions, none will pretend that a fair expression of the popular voice could have been had. The constitution has been made in strict compliance with the laws of the land; it is republican in form; and we now have no other alternative left us in the faithful discharge of our duty but to admit Kansas as a State into this Union. The entire constitution is as unexceptionable in its provisions, if not more so, than the constitution of any of the States of this Confederacy. The framers of that instrument have availed themselves of the wisdom and experience of the statesmen of our country, and introduced into their fundamental law many wise provisions, found together in no one of our State constitutions. We may be individually opposed to some of the provisions in that instrument; but it is not our right, nor within the scope of our authority, to pass upon them. They alone concern the people of Kansas, not us.

But, sir, we are told by gentlemen who oppose the admission of Kansas, that a law must be passed by the Congress of the United States to enable the people of Kansas to elect delegates and form a constitution. My first reply to this proposition is, that Congress did pass such a law when it enacted the Kansas-Nebraska bill. That bill confers upon the people the right to provide by law for all elections, and to manage their affairs in their own way; and under it, if authority was necessary to make a constitution, they derived it. But, sir, when once organized as a territorial government, I deny that any such necessity exists. Cannot the sovereign people act without our authority? Must they have permission from us to make a constitution—to exercise an inalienable right—a power neither conferred upon us by the people themselves nor the Constitution of the United States? Under what provision of that once sacred instrument do you find such authority? If it exists as either a granted or implied power, under any clause in that instrument, it has altogether escaped my observation; and I think but few, if any, of the great constitutional lawyers whose names are conspicuous upon the pages of our country's history, have ever contended for any such power in Congress. Suppose you reject this constitution, and pass what you denominate an enabling act, and the people of Kansas should hold an election and adopt a constitution without any reference to its provisions: would you feel authorized to refuse them admission for the simple reason that they did not choose to follow your directions as to the form by which their constitution was made? I apprehend not. Why the necessity, then, of an enabling act for Kansas? Congress, at different periods in our history, has admitted States that had formed constitutions without enabling acts. The States of Tennessee, Iowa, Michigan, Texas, Arkansas, Florida, and several others, I believe, were admitted without any authoritative act on the part of Congress.

The ablest expounders of the constitution of the United States admitted their right to form a State constitution, without the permission of Congress; and if so formed, that such State must be admitted, if the constitution was republican in form. Why, then, the necessity of any such act in reference to Kansas? One of two reasons must operate upon those who demand it: either the toleration of slavery under the present constitution, or a desire upon the part of anti-slavery men to keep up this slavery agitation, and continue their fratricidal war upon the people of the South.

But, sir, every objection to this constitution that human ingenuity can devise is being pressed upon our consideration. We are told that the ordinance contains exorbitant demands from the general Government, on the part of Kansas, as regards the public lands. Admit it: and what then? I suppose no gentleman here will seriously contend that the ordinance is any part of the constitution. Surely no statesman will insist that we cannot accept the constitution and reject the ordinance. I confess that I am altogether unwilling that we shall accede to the propositions contained in that ordinance; and if Kansas enters the Union, she must do so without any such exactions. I am willing to give to her the same portion of the public domain within her territory that we have given to other States; but no more.

But, sir, disguise it as you may, the real opposition to Kansas is the slavery aspect it presents. We have been told by the leaders of the Republican party in this House that the submission of the slavery clause of the constitution was a "swindle and a cheat;" that even if that part of the constitution which was submitted to the vote of the people of Kansas had been stricken out, that still slavery was perpetuated there. What disposition would those gentlemen have had the convention to make of the slaves already in Kansas? Would it have been right, just, and constitutional to have deprived the owners of their property in them—to have declared them free? Would it have been just and honest to do so? How came they in Kansas; and under what guarantees were they taken there? The Territory of Kansas was the joint property of the entire people of the Union. It had been purchased with common treasure, on the joint account of the whole nation. The people of the South were equally interested with the people of the North, in its ownership and joint occupation, and had the unquestionable right to take to that Territory any species of property recognized by the Constitution of the United States; and no power there or elsewhere had the right to deprive them of that property, without first paying them a just compensation—nor even then, unless it was needed for public use. It would, in my opinion, have been a monstrous outrage for the majority of the people of that Territory to have deprived the minority of property taken there under the protection of the Constitution of the United States, and guaranteed and sanctioned by that instrument. I should like to know by what code of morals, or upon what principle of common honesty, the Kansas convention could have liberated the slaves already in that Territory? Permit me to say that when the Constitution of this Union ceases to protect the property of a large portion of the people of this nation against the ruthless hand of a wild fanaticism, then that Constitution fails to accomplish the great purposes for which it was designed—then this Government becomes tyrannical, unjust, and oppressive, and this Union valueless.

Why this continued effort to outrage the rights and exasperate the people of the South to alienate forever those fraternal feelings that bind together the hearts of this entire nation? We of the South make no assault upon the people or institutions of any portion of this wide-spread Confederacy, and all that we ask or demand is, that you let us and ours alone. If slavery is either a moral, social, or political evil, the responsibility rests upon us, not you. We of the South recognize it as an institution, established in the early ages of the world, under the express authority of Heaven, and neither condemned nor interfered with by the Savior of mankind in his glorious and benevolent mission to earth—an institution introduced and perpetuated by the descendants of the Pilgrims for more than one hundred years before the Declaration of Independence.

Brought to these shores in large numbers by the people of New England, under the operation of the slave trade, and held in bondage by them until they became satisfied that they were unprofitable in their northern climate and the culture of their barren hills. Then, and not till then, a large portion of them were sold to the people of the South; and the money invested in other property. An institution ratified and indorsed by our revolutionary fathers; sanctioned and guaranteed to us by the Constitution of the United States; that instrument, framed by the noblest, purest, and wisest body of patriots, statesmen, and philanthropists that ever assembled on earth. An institution that has elevated the negro from barbarism to civilization and Christianity; that has placed the race in a better and happier condition than they ever occupied before. An institution better adapted to their nature and capabilities than any ever devised by that disinterested philanthropy exhibited by a portion of the northern people, who ask us of the South to liberate our slaves and permit them to remain a part of our population, and at the same time refuses to allow them to emigrate to their own States.

Great sympathy has been expressed for the negroes of the South, and the institution of slavery denounced in this House in the most bitter terms, by gentlemen representing the North. If I am correctly informed, I apprehend they would find a much more commendable field for their operations and the outbursts of their philanthropy in first seeking to elevate in the scale of being that part of the race within the limits of their own States. Go to the cities and towns where the free negroes congregate, and you find them a lazy, miserable, poverty-stricken people, sunk into the lowest depths of moral degradation. Go, then, disinterested philanthropist, and contrast their social, moral, and physical condition with the negroes of the South. There you see, as a general thing, a happy, contented African race, well fed, well clothed, well treated, well taken care of in sickness and in old age.

And now, sir, while upon this subject, I desire to correct a false impression that has been made in the North by the public press, in reference to the feelings and sentiments of the people of Missouri on the subject of slavery during and since the gubernatorial election in that State, which took place in August last. You were told in substance that the citizens there were upon the verge of emancipating their slaves. That public sentiment was rapidly tending in that direction; that the candidate who ran in opposition to the nominee of the Democratic party was a Free-Soiler, and the closeness of the contest between him and the Hon. Robert M. Stewart, the Democratic candidate, was evidence of the disposition of the people of Missouri to rid themselves of slavery. A more unfounded statement was never published to the American people. Major Rollins, the candidate of the Opposition, received a majority of the votes in many of the largest slaveholding counties of the State. He was regarded by the American party as a pro-slavery man. He proclaimed in his public speeches that he was the owner of twenty-five slaves; and but four days before the election he announced in a public speech in my own city that he believed the wisest and best relation that could subsist between the white and African races was that of master and servant, and that he was violently opposed to the emancipation of slavery in Missouri. In the very county in which I have the honor to reside, in northeast Missouri, one of the strongest pro-slavery counties in the State, he received a majority of four hundred and ninety votes. In my opinion, the great body of the people of Missouri have never at any time since the organization of the State been better satisfied with the institution of slavery, or more determined to resist all assaults upon it. The people of the North need not delude themselves with the idea that Missouri will yield up this institution. It is with the people of Missouri, as I apprehend it is with the other slave States of the Union—the more bitter and violent the assaults of the common enemy of the South, the more closely will they cling to it, and the more determined their purpose to defend it against every foe from within and from without.

Permit me, also, to say a few words in defense of the citizens of Missouri against the denunciations they have received from the people of the North, and their representatives, for their interference in the affairs of Kansas. The people of Missouri watched, with intense interest, the settlement of that Territory. I willingly confess that they were exceedingly desirous that it should become a slave State. Considerations of momentous importance were involved in its occupation. They deemed it of vast moment to their peace, safety, and quietude, to have upon their border a neighbor that would not interfere with their property; that would not, by incendiary publications and speeches, spread disaffection among their slaves, and render insecure their habitations. But notwithstanding the intense interest and anxiety felt by them upon this subject, they never would have interfered had it not been for the unwarrantable and unjustifiable means resorted to by the Abolitionists of the North, in the organization and machinery of emigrant aid societies. Had these Abolitionists permitted Kansas to settle in the quiet, usual, and ordinary way in which the other Territories of this Union have been supplied with population, the citizens of Missouri would have submitted without a murmur to any regulation they might have made in reference to their domestic institutions. But when they saw the people of the North impelled by a spirit of mad fanaticism, organizing large moneyed associations, under the authority of one of the States of this Union, for the purpose of sending to that Territory, "to prevent the introduction of slavery," a population such as they might gather principally from the purlieus of their large cities—such as had recently landed upon our shores, unacquainted with our laws and Constitution, unimbued with the spirit and genius of our institutions, for the purpose of molding and controlling the institutions of that Territory, and for the unjust and unconstitutional purpose of dispossessing the people of the South of their legitimate interest in it; with the undisguised object in view of compelling those who had gone, or might go, with slave property, under the protection and by the authority of the Constitution of the United States, either to forsake their homes and flee the country, or yield up their property to the unconstitutional demand of this predatory army, whose next field of operations, as announced by many of them, was Missouri; then, and not till then, did the people of Missouri think themselves excusable at least, if not justifiable, at the commencement of this unholy crusade, in aiding in the protection of their rights.

Let me also say, Mr. Chairman, that when this excitement shall pass away, and when the faithful historian shall commit to paper the stirring events connected with the settlement of Kansas, the people of this country will learn, and coming generations know, that the emigrant aid societies of the North—by the character of the population they sent there, with the avowed purpose for which it was sent—superinduced the outrageous and unlawful acts that have been perpetrated upon the soil of Kansas.

And let me say to the gentleman from Massachusetts who spoke so eloquently the other day in favor of the efficiency of this new mode for the "Americanizing of Central America and the settling of the Territories of this Union," that it may perhaps be safe to apply his policy to foreign semi-barbarian countries; but let me advise him in all sincerity, if he is a lover of peace, law, and order, never to advocate such an attempt in reference to the Territories of this nation for the accomplishment of the same purpose that it was resorted to in regard to Kansas; for fear that the reenactment of the same scenes might be produced in a more aggravated form.

It is but right and just, Mr. Chairman, for me to say that when I speak of this improper and unjustifiable interference on the part of the North with southern rights and southern institutions, I do not mean to include a large portion of that people. No; I cherish the belief that the great body of them love this Union, respect the Constitution, and are disposed to do equal justice to every portion of this Confederacy. Would, from the bottom of my heart, that I could say so in reference to the whole people of the non-slaveholding States. Then I should feel assured that this glorious Union was safe; that the stars and stripes that now command the respect and elicit the admiration of the whole civilized world, would float perpetually over this Capitol; and we should be able to transmit to our posterity the priceless heritage we received from our illustrious and peerless ancestry. Hitherto, the North has treated us with fairness and justice in the admission of new States. Until recently, one slave and one free State came into this Union together; but the non-slaveholding States now have the vantage ground—a majority in both the Senate and House of Representatives, with two free States asking for admission, which must still increase that majority. The South, I apprehend, if treated fairly, will make no objection to their admission. They have been settled in the usual and ordinary way, without the illegal and improper interference of emigrant aid societies, and have been left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. But when Kansas comes with her institutions and constitution, adopted under all the forms and sanctions of law; and after the people of that Territory, both free-State and pro-slavery men, in the election of State officers under the constitution, have recognized it as the supreme law of Kansas, we are still told she cannot enter this Union. It may be so, but I cannot believe it. I still entertain such an abiding confidence in the justice and patriotism of the American people, and their representatives here assembled, as assures me that the fearful act of rejecting Kansas will not be consummated.

[APPENDIX.]

Synopsis of the Kansas Convention Act.

The act provides that the sheriffs of the several counties shall, between the 1st day of March and the 1st day of April, 1857, make an enumeration of all the free male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years, with power to appoint deputies; and, in case of a vacancy in any county, the duty to devolve on the probate judge. The list thus made is required to be filed in the office of the probate judge of each county, on or before the 10th of April, 1857. The list of the voters of each county is to be posted up in three of the most public places in each election district. Said probate judge is required to remain in session each day from the time of receiving said returns, until the 1st day of May, 1857, to hear and determine all questions concerning the omission of any person from said returns, or the improper insertion of any name in said returns, or any other question affecting the integrity or fidelity of said returns; and as soon as said lists have been revised and corrected, said judges are required to make out full and fair copies, and, without delay, furnish one copy to the Governor, and one to the Secretary. The Governor shall cause said returns to be printed and distributed among the people, and one copy deposited with the clerk of each court of record in the limits of said Territory; also, a copy delivered to each judge of the election, and at least three copies posted up at each place of voting.

It further requires the judges and clerks of the election to be sworn, duplicate returns of the poll-books made out and certified by the judges and clerks—one deposited with the board of county commissioners, and the other transmitted to the Secretary of State.

It also provides that every bona fide inhabitant of the Territory of Kansas, on the third Monday in June, 1857, being a citizen of the United States over the age of twenty-one years, and who shall have resided three months next before said election, in the county in which he offers to vote, and no other person whatever, shall be entitled to vote at said election.

It further provides for the punishment of any person who, by menace, threats, or force, or by any other unlawful means, shall, directly or indirectly, attempt to influence any voter in giving his vote, or deter him from going to the polls, or disturb or hinder him in the free exercise of his right of suffrage at said election.

It further provides for the punishment of any person holding said election who shall, willfully and knowingly, commit any fraud or irregularity whatever, with the intent to hinder, prevent, or defeat a fair expression of the popular will at said election.

It also requires all officers to make oath before entering upon the discharge of their duties, that they will faithfully and impartially discharge them.

Extract of a letter from H. Clay Pate.

"At the October election in 1856, a majority of five thousand votes were cast in favor of a convention, and at the session of the Kansas Legislative Assembly, which met on the second Monday of January last, [1857] 'all necessary provisions were made for that convention. A law was passed, taking for its basis the principles of the celebrated Toombs bill, which Senator DOUGLAS helped to make, and for which he voted. It provided for the registry of all the legal voters of the Territory by the Sheriff of each county and his deputies. The probate judges were required to hold courts or sessions in convenient parts of the counties, and add to the lists returned by the sheriffs any names accidentally or wrongfully omitted. It also provided that in cases where there was no probate judge, or he would not act, then the sheriff should, and if there was no officer at all to perform the duties specified, then the people might petition the Governor to appoint some one to carry out the law. The Governor says that 'fifteen counties' were entirely disfranchised, 'and by no fault of their own.' Let us see. In Franklin county, one of the 'oldest organized,' Esquire Yocum, probate judge, was driven away by the Abolitionists, as was also Richard Goulding, sheriff of said county; each of these officials was threatened with death should they attempt to perform the duties conferred upon them by the registry law. Under the same circumstances, George Wilson, judge of probate for Anderson county, was prevented from executing the law. So with Allen county; Passmore Williams had to leave in order to save his life. J. J. Barker, probate judge of Breckinridge, being a free-State man, refused to act. These four were the only organized counties not represented in the convention. Why not represented? It was the fault of those who now complain, and 'on their heads, and theirs alone, will rest the responsibility.'"

"It is well to observe that, of the nineteen counties spoken of as not represented, the census was not taken in four for the reasons stated; the other fifteen were, for civil purposes, attached to organized counties, as follows:

"Two, Richardson and Weller, to Shawnee;
 "Three, Madison, Butler, and Wise, to Breckinridge;
 "One, Coffey to Anderson;
 "One, McGee to Bourbon;
 "Six, Greenwood, Hunter, Dorn, Wilson, Woodson, and Gregory, to Allen;
 "One, Brown to Doniphan;
 "One, Davis to Riley.
 "The counties of Brown, Washington, Clay, and Dickinson, were organized at the last session of the Legislature; in the last named three there were no inhabitants.
 "The registry law was executed, and voters were registered in the following counties: Johnson, Lykins, Lyon, Bourbon, Douglas, Shawnee, Doniphan, Atchison, Leavenworth, Jefferson, Nemaha, Calhoun, Marshall, and Riley.
 "It will thus be seen that the only counties really disfranchised were the four in which Abolitionists would permit no registry to be taken; and it is an established fact that many factious people refused to tell their names, and otherwise obstructed the officers—some giving fictitious appellations, and others threatening the lives and property of census-takers.

"These officers were political partisans; and they refused or neglected to take any census or make any registry, and therefore they were entirely disfranchised, and could not and did not give a single vote. Why did they not compel the officers to do their duty? It was possible; but if not, they could have petitioned the Governor for redress. If the people of those counties could not and did not vote, it was 'a fault of their own,' and on 'their heads, and theirs alone, will rest the responsibility.'"

"From first to last, every opportunity has been given for an expression of the will of a majority; and now if the principles of a minority, as alleged, are to triumph in Kansas, by the neglect or factious opposition of the so-called majority, 'on their heads, and theirs alone, will rest the responsibility.'"
 H. CLAY PATE.

"We concur in the foregoing:

"FRANCIS J. MARSHALL, Democratic candidate for Governor.

"WILLIAM G. MATHIAS, Democratic candidate for Lieutenant Governor.

"WESTPORT, January 4, 1858."]

Before the conclusion of the above remarks, the time fixed by the House for closing debate upon the bill before the committee, arrived.

The bill was then read by paragraphs, for amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON moved to amend by reducing the appropriation in the last paragraph $1,000.

He then proceeded to finish his remarks, as above printed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, the Chairman (Mr. WINSLOW) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill (No. 3) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had directed him to report the same back to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question upon the engrossment of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLINGMAN. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I desire to send a resolution to the Speaker's chair, and have it referred to a committee.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I cannot give way. I am very anxious to get along with the appropriation bills. If I yield to one I must to another.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ENGLISH in the chair.)

DEFICIENCY BILL FOR PRINTING.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire that the committee shall take up the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, and referred to this committee, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for printing in former Congresses. The general debate can go on upon that bill, and I desire that the House shall act upon it at as early a day as practicable. I therefore ask the unanimous consent of the committee to take up that bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is an appropriation bill, and you can move to take it up.

Mr. PHELPS. Very well. I move to take up that bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was taken up for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read by sections for amendment. The first section of the bill was read, as follows:

That for the purpose of defraying the deficiencies in the appropriations for the paper for the printing, and for the binding, engraving, and lithographing ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, the following sums of money are hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, in seeking the floor, I do not desire to inflict upon the committee a speech, but simply to give a brief explanation of the bill; and I shall endeavor to confine my remarks to the subject-matter now under consideration, leaving to other gentlemen who are desirous to deliver their opinions on other questions of importance, which will come before this House, the exercise of the privilege of occupying the floor for that purpose.

At the first session of the last Congress, Mr. Chairman, a joint resolution was passed to supply deficiencies which had occurred in the appropriations for the printing ordered by the two Houses of the Thirty-Third Congress. That joint resolution was, in fact, an appropriation bill; for it diverted a portion of the amount appropriated for defraying the printing of the first session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress and applied it to pay for the printing ordered by the Thirty-Third Congress. The joint resolution attracted no particular attention at that time. While it did not diminish the deficiency, yet, to a certain extent, it has placed a deficiency on the Thirty-Fourth Congress which was in part incurred by the Thirty-Third Congress. I am not going into the inquiry where blame or censure ought to rest—I mean, to say which Congress is to blame for the creation of this deficiency, which we have felt it to be our duty to recommend should be paid. Every dollar which this bill appropriates has the sanction of resolutions passed by the House of Representatives, or by the Senate, or by joint resolutions.

Sir, one of the heaviest items of expenditure provided for by this bill, as we are informed by the Superintendent of Public Printing in his report made at this session, is caused by the printing of the report of the results of the United States naval astronomical expedition to the southern hemisphere. This report was made by Lieutenant Gilliss, and was ordered to be printed before it was written—before it was communicated to either House of Congress, and consequently before its probable cost could be ascertained. A resolution was reported by Mr. STANTON, then chairman of the Committee on Printing, providing for the printing of six thousand extra copies of the report for the use of the House. Several years before, it was deemed important that an officer of the Navy should be sent to the coast of Chili for the purpose of making certain astronomical observations; and Lieutenant Gilliss was assigned for the discharge of that duty. I was a member of the Thirty-Third Congress when his report was ordered to be printed; but I had no expectation that the history of Chili was to be written by that gentleman. Yet if gentlemen will examine the report they will find that the first volume is a history of Chili. If the House of Representatives desire to employ a historian to write the history of this or any other nation, I desire to have a voice in the selection.

Some two or three volumes of this work have been printed, and I understand that in all it will embrace six or seven volumes quarto, with large plates, and many engravings. Engravings and lithographs accompany the written matter already published; and for the volumes yet to be issued, engravings have already been executed, and others are in the process of completion by those who have the contracts to furnish them under the joint resolution directing the Superintendent of Public Printing to enter into contracts for furnishing maps, drawings, illustrations, &c., to accompany works which have been ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I would be glad if the gentleman would furnish to the House, while upon that subject, some information in regard to the cost of the different plates in those works. There have been some strange rumors in the country on the subject. I have heard it stated that the plates of parrots cost $10,000. Now how much do the other plates cost—of lizards, &c., &c.?

Mr. PHELPS. If the gentleman expects that I can tell the cost of every engraving or plate which may be prepared for Gilliss's report, he is mistaken. It is impossible for any one man to attend to every detail in such matters. It is impossible to tell how much every cut or illustration costs by itself, or how much they cost in the aggregate, unless by a member of the special committee raised to investigate the cost of the public printing, who may require such specific statements to be furnished by the Superintendent of the Public Printing, to communicate it to the House, in compliance with its specific order.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. If the gentleman does not possess the information, I think he ought to before he asks this House to vote for this appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Let me make a remark.

Mr. PHELPS. One at a time. If the gentleman from North Carolina expects that I can tell the cost of any block of marble of this Capitol, although I am a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, whence the appropriation to pay for the extension comes, he is mistaken. That is a matter of detail which no man can inform himself unless he has all of the documents before him appertaining to the contracts which may have been entered into. For several of these works, sir, there are at least one hundred plates, engraved or to be engraved. For Emory's report one hundred and thirty-six plates have been contracted to be engraved in Paris. A portion have been engraved and furnished to the Superintendent of Public Printing. Another portion have recently arrived and are now at the custom-house in New York, and the remainder of them are being engraved. These are the plates for the report of the Mexican boundary commission.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will ask the gentleman a question, which he can answer, I have no doubt. Is this appropriation designed to complete the work not yet begun? Is it designed to complete any volumes of Gilliss's report not yet commenced to be printed? Can any of them be dispensed with?

Mr. PHELPS. Whether any of the volumes of the report of Lieutenant Gilliss can be dispensed with I am not prepared to say. The appropriation embraces the money which is deemed necessary to complete Gilliss's report so far as it has been furnished to the Superintendent of Public Printing, and so far as the plates, engravings, and illustrations necessary to accompany the report have already been contracted for.

But, sir, so far as manuscript, hereafter to be furnished, is concerned, there are no data upon which any estimate could be made, for you do not know the amount of manuscript which Lieutenant Gilliss may yet furnish to the Secretary of the Navy to be transmitted to the Superintendent of Printing, nor do you know how many maps and illustrations he deems advisable shall accompany that work.

I was remarking, sir, that this extraordinary expenditure has been brought upon the House and upon Congress by the heedless (I use the term heedless, and I mean it) and reckless manner in which both Houses of Congress have voted for the printing of public documents.

Mr. BRANCH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question before he leaves that point. I understand the gentleman to say that this printing of Gilliss's report is in pursuance of a resolution adopted long ago. Now, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri whether there is any restriction placed upon Lieutenant Gilliss in the preparation of that book; or whether there is any existing law requiring that, when Lieutenant Gilliss prepares another volume of that work, it shall be handed to the Public Printer, and the Public Printer be compelled to have it printed, without further action of Congress?

Mr. PHELPS. I will answer that question by reading the resolution of the House under which this report of Lieutenant Gilliss was ordered to be printed. During the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress, the following resolution was reported from the Committee on Printing, and adopted by the House:

"Resolved, That there be printed and bound, by the Public Printer and Binder of the House, six thousand copies of the report, and two thousand copies of the observations of the United States naval astronomical expedition to Chili—five hundred copies of the report and observations for the use of the Secretary of the Navy, two hundred and fifty for the Superintendent of the expedition, and the remainder for distribution by the members of the present House; said work to be printed in quarto or octavo form, as the work will admit and the Committee on Printing may direct."

That, sir, is the resolution under which the printing of Gilliss's report was ordered by the House. The House delegated its authority to the Committee on Printing to make a contract for the printing of that work, either in octavo or in quarto form; and for the binding of that work in such manner as the committee might direct it to be bound. That was an innovation upon the law providing for the binding of public documents; for you have a resolution upon the statute-book which directs that all public documents of two hundred pages of printed matter shall be bound, provided the cost of binding does not exceed a certain amount; and there is no order made by the House for the binding of such documents. But the Committee on Printing reported that resolution to the House during the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress, and the House of Representatives sanctioned the innovation which it was proposed to make, and the mandate went forth to the Public Printer to print the work either in octavo or quarto form, and to print the number of copies specified in the resolution. In pursuance of that resolution of the House, the Committee on Printing directed the work to be published in quarto form, and to be bound in the style in which it has been bound, and in which it has been furnished to members for distribution.

Mr. NICHOLS. I desire to correct a statement which the gentleman has just made. The Committee on Printing of this House has no power to change the character of any work. It is the joint committee of the two Houses.

Mr. PHELPS. When I spoke of the Committee on Printing, I meant the Joint Committee on Printing. I am aware that it is a joint committee.

Mr. NICHOLS. So I presumed. I merely wanted to prevent misapprehension.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether the appropriations which the Committee of Ways and Means recommend is intended to cover expenses already incurred or prospective expenses?

Mr. PHELPS. In reply to the inquiry propounded to me by the gentleman from Louisiana, I will state, as I have already stated, that it is for the purpose of paying for work already executed by the Public Printer; it is to pay for paper already furnished by the contractors, and which has been received by the Superintendent of Printing, and issued to the Public Printer; it is to pay for engraving, electrotyping, and lithographing already executed and now in process of being executed.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there was another work ordered to be printed during the Thirty-Third Congress. I refer to the report of the Pacific railroad surveys. That work was ordered to be printed, and the Committee on Printing on the part of the House was clothed with authority to direct it to be printed in quarto form, and did so direct; they also had power to direct the printing of the maps, engravings, and illustrations to accompany those surveys. When that report was ordered to be printed, it was supposed it would only make some two or three volumes. Such, at least, was my expectation. We had appropriated money for the survey of the several routes, for the purpose of determining upon the practicability of those proposed routes for a line of railroad to the Pacific ocean, and I was desirous that those explorations should be published; for even if they gave us no valuable information upon the subject of a line of railroad, still they were explorations of unknown regions of our own country, and ought, therefore, to be published on that ground. They were Government explorations of the country inhabited by Indians, lying to the far west of the Mississippi, and of passes in the mountains, of which we had, then, very meager and scanty information.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to know of the gentleman from Missouri, if he can tell this committee how much of the appropriations asked for in this deficiency bill is for work yet to be done?

Mr. PHELPS. The inquiry of the gentleman cannot be answered. If an engraver is engaged in engraving a plate and it is but half executed, how can you obtain information of the exact amount that that work has cost up to that point? Again, how can you ascertain the exact amount of expense which has been incurred by the Public Printer, who is, perhaps, engaged at this very time in executing work which you have directed him to perform? Can you stop the press when a volume has been half or two thirds completed, and make a computation of the cost? Before you could make the computation and then get reports from the lithographers and engravers, employed in the cities of Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Albany, you would find that the work would be executed.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman asks me a question, and I will answer it. It strikes me that, when the estimates were furnished him by which he made out this deficiency bill, it would have been a very easy matter to ascertain what part had been commenced, and what part had not been. We are asked to vote $790,000 as a deficiency for public printing; and I am unwilling to vote that unless I know what it is for. The first information that I want to get from the gentleman from Missouri is, how much has been executed, and how much the Government actually owes. And then I want to stop that part which has not been furnished or commenced. Hence my inquiry, and hence my desire to have this information.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask the gentleman—

Mr. PHELPS. One at a time, if you please.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose to ask the gentleman for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is not in order. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware that the gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor; and, that unless the gentleman thinks proper to yield for a question—

Mr. PHELPS. I cannot submit to be catechized until I answer the questions already put to me. If the gentleman from Alabama will wait a little while, we will get along faster.

Mr. HOUSTON. Very well; we will see.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] makes an inquiry of me as to how we came to submit this estimate, when, by obtaining information from the Superintendent of Public Printing, and by obtaining information from the Clerk of the House—

Mr. BURNETT. That is not my inquiry.

Mr. PHELPS. I always like to be allowed to make my own speech, and in my own form; and I do not like gentlemen on the floor of the House to direct me to proceed to a certain portion of that which I intend to comment upon, before I reach it in my own proper time. If the gentleman inquires in reference to the report of Gilliss, I tell him, just as I have told other gentlemen in regard to that report, that it is impossible to fix the amount of the work done on an uncompleted volume. But we do not propose in this bill to appropriate money for work where the manuscript has not yet been deposited with the Secretary of the Navy, or sent to the Superintendent of Public Printing. That is the answer in reference to the work of Gilliss. So I say with reference to the work of the Pacific railroad surveys and explorations.

On that point I was going to invite the attention of my friend from Kentucky, and also of my friend from Alabama, [Messrs. BURNETT and HOUSTON,] to the fact that here are some seven volumes of this report that have been completed, so far as the printing is concerned. Seven volumes have been executed by the Public Printer, and a portion of them have been bound; a portion has not yet been bound; and yet we propose, in this appropriation bill, to appropriate money for the binding of these volumes that are yet unbound. As to the reports of explorations and surveys to ascertain the most practicable and economical route for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean, ordered at the second session of the Thirty-Third Congress, the printing of seven volumes of this report has been completed, four of which have been bound, and the other three are nearly ready for the binder. The letter-press and most of the illustrations for the eighth volume are printed; but some delay will be occasioned in its completion, in consequence of the destruction by fire, in Philadelphia, of ten of the copperplates. It is estimated that the entire work, when completed, will make eleven large quarto volumes, including one volume of maps and profiles.

Here are eleven volumes, including maps and profiles. A portion of these maps and profiles have been executed. What portion yet remains to be executed, I cannot inform the committee; but I am informed that a large portion of them have been executed. The completion of them has been delayed in consequence of the destruction of some of the plates in the fire at Philadelphia.

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, my question to the gentleman from Missouri is this: he speaks of seven volumes being complete so far as the printing is concerned, and says that the eighth volume has progressed, and that the whole number of volumes will be eleven. Then, I understand from him that there are three volumes not yet commenced at all? Now I ask the gentleman to state to us what these volumes cost each to the Government of the United States, and the relations between the volumes; whether, if the publication stop where it is, including the eighth volume, or excluding the eighth volume, the information is not as perfect, or nearly so, as if the whole eleven volumes be printed?

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Alabama is a little mistaken in assuming that I have conceded that there are three volumes of this work yet untouched. The gentleman misunderstood me. I stated that seven of them were entirely printed, and that a large portion of the eighth volume was printed, with the illustrations to accompany it. I stated that the whole work would amount to eleven volumes, including one of maps and plates, and profiles; and that a large portion of the engravings of this volume were already executed. Thus there are but two volumes left unexecuted; and I cannot inform the gentleman what they consist of. I desire to invite his attention, and the attention of the committee, to the resolution under which the printing was executed. The following resolution was adopted at the second session of the Thirty-Third Congress:

"Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House, ten thousand copies of the reports of surveys for a railroad to the Pacific, made under the direction of the Secretary of War, embracing the report of F. W. Lander, civil engineer, of a survey of a railroad route from Puget Sound, by Fort Hall and the Great Salt Lake, to the Mississippi river, and the report of J. C. Frémont, of a route for a railroad from the head waters of the Arkansas river into the State of California, together with the maps and plates accompanying each of said reports necessary to illustrate them."

This resolution directed two reports to be printed, together with the plates and illustrations to accompany them, which were the history of an exploration not authorized by Congress—not undertaken in pursuance of the act making appropriations for the survey of a railroad to the Pacific.

Mr. Lander accompanied my friend, the present Delegate from Washington Territory, [Governor STREVELS,] in his exploration of a route from the Mississippi river to Puget Sound, in the year 1853. Mr. Lander, however, returned by an entirely different route, but the report of his return route was not then communicated to the Secretary of War, nor was he employed by the Government, nor was he acting in pursuance of any instruction from the Secretary of War, in his exploration from Puget Sound, by Salt Lake, to the Mississippi river. His report was not written when this resolution passed the House; nor was it submitted until six or eight months thereafter—perhaps I might say twelve months thereafter, though my memory may not serve me correctly. About nine months after this resolution passed, I had a conversation with the Secretary of War, (Colonel Davis,) who informed me that Mr. Lander's report had not then been submitted to him, nor filed in the office of the Pacific railroad surveys.

Again, the report of John C. Frémont was ordered to be printed. That expedition was undertaken by himself, solely with his own means, and without being authorized or sanctioned by the Government; yet the House of Representatives then had such a desire to have the information which he might contribute, that they ordered the printing of a document before it was even requested, and even before the House had any information that Colonel Frémont would write such a report.

I say the fault rests with Congress itself, in ordering the printing of documents before they have been communicated to either branch of Congress. I shall prescribe for myself, in future, a rule to prevent these extravagant expenditures, that until a report shall be presented to Congress—one branch or the other—I will not vote for its printing or its publication.

Mr. GARNETT. I find, sir, in Miscellaneous Document No. 36, addressed to the Committee of Ways and Means, from the office of the Superintendent of the Public Printing, in reference to the deficiencies in the public printing, engraving, and lithographing, and paper, statements marked Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, each containing distinct items of account.

I find in No. 4, that the amount of deficiency, according to the report of the Superintendent of Public Printing, for paper, due and unpaid, is $104,000. The remaining $65,000 is for paper yet to be furnished.

I find in No. 1, that the work ordered by the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, done and unpaid, amounts to a little over seventeen thousand dollars. The amounts in Nos. 2 and 3 are, in the aggregate, $105,000, which is for work not yet done. Now the question which I propose to the gentleman from Missouri is this: Suppose this bill is amended so as to pay for the work already done, but make no appropriation for the work not yet done: will not the effect be the very thing the gentleman from Missouri has indicated that he desires? And will not this Congress thereby put a restraint and check upon the extravagance of its predecessors?

Mr. PHELPS. I have two answers to the question of the gentleman from Virginia. The question of the gentleman seems to presuppose that it is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to provide for stopping the publication of these works; and, in reference to this matter, I have this reply to make, and it is in order to repel the presumption of delinquency upon the part of the Committee of Ways and Means: the Committee of Ways and Means has, for several years past, been charged with absorbing the whole business of the House; that nothing could take place unless it emanated from the Committee of Ways and Means, or was accepted as an amendment to their bills.

In the next place, the gentleman from Virginia is aware that it is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means, in an appropriation bill, not to provide for legislation, but for the appropriation of such money as may be needed to meet the expenses arising under existing laws, or authorized by the resolutions of one or the other branches of Congress. That is made our duty; and hence, acting as we did, under that authority, we have made the recommendations which appear in this bill.

And moreover, the gentleman from Virginia will bear in mind that a select committee was raised by a resolution introduced by his colleague, [Mr. SUMNER,] for the express purpose of inquiring into the expenditures which had been incurred on account of the public printing, and to report to the House what measures are necessary to curtail those expenses. Then, as we find a committee specially charged with this subject, and as we find that these appropriations are necessary to meet the obligations of the Government, which had been assumed and contracted for, we could not report for curtailing these expenses, or for stopping the execution of the work.

Now, as to the specific inquiry of the gentleman. The gentleman from Virginia calls my attention to a tabular statement numbered 4 in this report of the Superintendent of Public Printing, in which there is reference to the fact that there are certificates issued by the Superintendent of Public Printing to the amount of $104,000, which is on account of paper furnished to the preceding Superintendent. But since this report was made by the Superintendent of Public Printing, and even at that time, there was an additional amount of paper which had been used in printing the second volume of the Commercial Relations. Gentlemen will recollect that the first, third, and fourth volumes of that report have been printed and distributed; and the question arises, could you stop the printing of the second volume? But, sir, I am informed that nearly all the second volume has been printed now, and that it is nearly ready to be delivered to the binder.

Again, in reference to the amounts which are due the Public Printer according to the statements marked 1, 2, and 3, to which the gentleman has called my attention, I have this to say: that no bill is considered by the Superintendent of Public Printing as due the Printer for any portion of a volume until he shall have executed the entire volume. For instance: he may be engaged upon the eighth volume of the Pacific railroad report, as he is at this time, and he may have printed all but the last ten or twenty pages of the work. There is nothing due now; but when he shall have finished these few additional pages, when he shall have printed all the manuscript which has been furnished for the work, he is then entitled to the sum to which the work amounts according to the law regulating the rate of public printing; so that if we had appropriated simply the amount due at the time the bill was reported, by the time the House had acted upon the bill another sum would have become due, and we should have been compelled to raise the figures, if we had followed the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia. These remarks are applicable, I think, both to the first, second, and third tabular statements.

Mr. GARNETT. I presume, then, that it is impossible, from this report of the 5th of December, to distinguish between the work already executed, and the work still to be executed. I learn, with astonishment, I may say, that it is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to register all of the extravagant estimates from every Department of the Government, instead of recommending to a Democratic House a reduction of these estimates to the proper and Democratic economical standard.

I am ignorant of the rules of this House, if the proper object of a deficiency bill is not to provide for the payment of work already done, and for which no appropriation has previously been made. I would ask the gentlemen whether prospective expenditure is a proper subject in this bill? Is it not the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to inform this House what part of the estimates submitted by the Departments of the Government is really for a deficiency, and how much is for a debt that we ought to sanction in a deficiency bill?

Mr. PHELPS. I will answer the gentleman. He has asked me already whether we can dispense with volume third. I will refer him to a report which sustains the answer I gave him. Is the gentleman prepared, if the Printer of the House has executed two thirds of a volume, to dispense with the work, and refuse to pay for the work already done?

Mr. GARNETT. I want to know what the Printer has done; and what work is not yet done?

Mr. PHELPS. It is that question which I am proceeding to answer. The gentleman should have looked a little further than he has done into the report of the Superintendent of Public Printing, made to Congress on the 5th of December last. The second volume of the commercial relations is nearly finished. It was not commenced at that time. The Superintendent of Public Printing then, in the gentleman's view, will have to go to the Public Printer every little while—for these works are progressing all the time—to ascertain what is finished and what is not. The second volume of the commercial relations is finished excepting trimming, which can soon be done. I will read the resolution ordering the printing of these commercial relations.

Mr. GARNETT. While the gentleman is looking for the resolution, I wish to put a question or two to him. The paper for this second volume of the Commercial Relations, upon which he rests so much stress, was estimated by the proper Department at $14,000, and the printing at $12,000, making an aggregate of $26,000, out of the sum of $200,000.

I will call his attention to another point. He stated, in the beginning of his remarks, that a portion of this appropriation was to pay for work not only not done, but the manuscript for which is not yet in the hands of the Printer.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman misapprehends what I stated. I stated when the inquiry was put to me whether this embraced an estimate for the publication of that portion of Gilliss's report, of which the manuscript was not in the hands of the Printer, that it did not embrace any such portion of that report. As the gentleman from Virginia finds so much fault with the printing, let me call his attention to some of the incomplete works. I will take for instance the second volume of the Japan Expedition, which was not printed at the time this report was made. It is printed now, and has been distributed, and the cost for printing that one volume, embracing paper, illustrations, and binding, was only the modest sum of $99,000. The gentleman has the report of the Superintendent, and can read for himself. That report was made on the 5th of December last, and was printed in three or four days thereafter. He must know that the printing of these works is a continuous matter, that when the manuscript is handed by the Superintendent of the Public Printing to the Public Printer the latter proceeds with all dispatch to execute the work; and I will tell the gentleman, sir, that much of the expense arises from the cost of engravings ordered to accompany these works. Artists are and have been engaged in their execution for works printed and works yet in press.

Now, sir, a word in reference to the report of the United States commission to run a boundary line between the United States and Mexico. The order for printing this work was made at the first session of the last Congress. Money had already been appropriated to run the boundary line between the Republic of Mexico and the United States. Major Emory was appointed the commissioner on the part of the United States. The first volume, a part of his report, was submitted at the first session of the last Congress, and the House ordered that it should be printed with the accompanying illustrations. This volume, when printed, was sent to the gentleman from Virginia, and all who were members of the last Congress; and these gentlemen were informed that the maps and illustrations designed to accompany it, had not then been printed. The second volume is in process of execution. I am informed that some of the plates to accompany this work, are in process of execution at Paris, in pursuance of contracts heretofore made by the Superintendent of Public Printing. As I remarked once before, a portion of these plates have arrived in this country and been printed, and that another portion was at the custom-house, New York.

I am as desirous as any member, Mr. Chairman, to check extravagant expenditures for public printing; but if gentlemen will look at the tables, they will see that a small portion only of the total amount goes either to the Printer for the House or for the Senate. I will call attention again to the report of the Superintendent. The cost of printing, folding, gathering, and inserting maps and plates of twenty-three thousand nine hundred and twenty copies of the report of explorations and surveys for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean, volume second, was $10,921 54, and the cost for dry-pressing, was $1,900, about thirteen thousand dollars in all; whereas the cost of paper was $16,300, and the cost of illustrations $21,786 for that volume.

But the cost of the paper upon which these works were printed was $16,300 for that one volume, the paper itself costing more than the mechanical work bestowed on it. What next have you? The cost of the illustrations for that volume amounted to the sum of $21,786 77. By whom are those illustrations prepared and printed? Not by your Public Printer, but they are prepared by engravers throughout the United States, who have been employed by the Superintendent of the Public Printing in pursuance of the order of the two Houses of Congress. The cost of binding this work actually exceeds the cost of printing it. The cost of binding the extra copies of that one volume was $17,116 08, and the total cost of that one volume, as reported by the Superintendent of Public Printing at $70,829, and of that sum the Public Printer only receives about $13,000.

I will briefly refer to the cost of the third volume of the Pacific railroad surveys. There was paid to the Printer, or will be when he shall have been paid for the work, about $12,000. The paper for the printing of the work has cost $15,712; the illustrations for the work have cost upwards of $40,000; and the binding of the extra copies only has cost upwards of $17,000. The reason why I make these remarks in reference to the amounts paid to the Public Printer is, that from the clamor which has been raised in the public press in regard to the profits of the public printing, one might be led to suppose that millions of dollars were annually paid to the Public Printer, whereas when you come to examine the items of the expenditures which go to make up the cost of these works to the Treasury, you find that the Printer generally receives but about from one sixth to one twelfth of the cost of the works so profusely illustrated.

But I desire to invite the attention of the committee to a singular resolution which was passed by this House during the last Congress, concerning the publication of the report on Commercial Relations. The President transmitted a message communicating the report, in compliance with an act of Congress; and thereupon the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the answer of the President of the United States to the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 14, 1853, upon the commercial relations of the United States with all foreign nations, be printed by the Printer of this House, in quarto form, under the direction of the Secretary of State, who is hereby authorized to cause all corrections therein which, in the course of printing, may be found requisite to be made, and also to cause to be added all additions thereto of commercial information which, subsequently to the transmission of said answer to the House, may reach the Department of State, which shall by him be deemed of sufficient importance."

That resolution was adopted by the consent of the gentleman from Virginia and myself; because the Journal does not show that either he or I voted against it. And when my vote is not recorded in the negative, whether I voted for a proposition or not, I stand here to bear my share of the responsibility.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE obtained the floor.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I presume the gentleman from New York desires to make a speech upon some political question?

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will he allow me, before he proceeds, to introduce an amendment to the bill?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Let us get in our amendments.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I must decline to yield for any purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I propose, Mr. Chairman, for the brief period to which I am limited by the rules, to speak mainly to that part of the annual message of the President which relates to the Territory of Kansas.

The statements and positions therein assumed are so extraordinary, and, in my judgment, unwarranted in their character, and the policy therein distinctly indicated, if not recommended, must prove so disastrous in its consequences, if forced into practical effect, that no apology can be required, as it seems to me, for calling to them, here and now, the attention of the House and of the country.

Before proceeding to the discussion proposed, I desire, sir, to state one or two facts which recent events in the Territory have placed beyond debate. The whole number of votes returned and counted as having been cast at the constitutional election held under the provisional government of John Calhoun, on the 21st of December, was 6,712—as follows: for the "constitution with slavery," 6,143; for the "constitution with no slavery," 569; leaving the majority for the constitution, in the form it prevailed at that election, 5,574. Of these, more than one half were false and fraudulent. At the election ordered by the Territorial Legislature, and held on the 4th of January, the majority against the constitution was 10,226.

We have then, sir, the great fact that the people of Kansas have voted down the Lecompton constitution by an overwhelming majority. By a vote of at least four to one have the citizens of the Territory, in legal and solemn form, recorded their judgment against it. This is the only additional fact that has transpired since the organization of the present Congress, entitled to any considerable consideration in the proper solution of the question presented to us. On arriving at this point the whole issue is made up.

The result of the election for the Legislature and State officers, under this rejected constitution, whatever that result may be declared to be, in no manner affects the real question in controversy here.

So far as that people are concerned, it may influence the possible consequences, but cannot relieve the responsibilities of our action. It may aid or it may hopelessly embarrass the victim in recovering from the wound; but can neither justify or mitigate the infliction of the blow.

As to the policy of participating in that election, the people were not agreed. The alternatives presented were well calculated, balance them as best they might, to lead to divided councils. If they went to the polls they were to be doomed; if they staid away they were to be doomed. If they voted, they were to be charged as having acquiesced; if they refused, they were to be condemned as factious, and so deserved their threatened fate. Notwithstanding the difficulties by which their position was surrounded, a portion of the people resolved, as a measure of defense, to go to the polls; and they did so, with a ballot in one hand and a solemn protest in the other.

The strait in which they were shut up by the tender mercies of the usurpers, laid between Scylla and Charybdis, and they determined to venture upon the hazard of the passage. That the free-State candidates were elected, there is no manner of doubt. That they will be counted out, is, in my judgment, no less certain. To make up by fraud what was wanting in numbers, was the precise reason for the Calhoun dictatorship.

But the great fact remains, that the constitution has been voted down. That it is loathed and abhorred by three fourths of the citizens of Kansas, is known to the whole country; and the issue here and for us is, whether we are prepared to force a government upon a people, not only without their assent, but against their express will.

The question extends higher and deeper than any and all mere questions of partisan politics, any and all ordinary measures of public policy, and reaches the fundamental structure and essential principle of free government itself. It involves the original and basal idea which underlies and characterizes our American institutions, and upon which the Republic was started on its adventure of free empire.

We may sacrifice much to peace, to union, and to conflicting opinion; but we may not either sacrifice or impair those elementary principles by which, as a people, we are known and distinguished among mankind. We cannot do this without infidelity to the cause of freedom and the race; without blotting from the country the great element of its identity; preserving, it may be, the form, but changing the nature of the government. To force Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, as proposed by the Administration, would be to do this very thing.

Mr. Chairman what is this great American idea, this vital political truth, the proposed and practical denial of which tends to the subversion of the Government? It is, sir, that Government, whether State or Federal, local or general, "derives all its just powers from the consent of the governed;" that all political sovereignty resides in the people; that the will of the majority is the ultimate and supreme power in the State; that the rights of man are inherent and inalienable, undervived from society or any of its organic forms; the free bequest of God, and not the gift of Government; and are, therefore, exempt from invasion by any human power or authority whatsoever. To secure, not to impair, these rights, Governments are instituted among men.

The doctrine to which I have referred constituted the platform upon which the struggle of the Revolution was organized, and which the colonial army was commissioned to vindicate and establish. This Republic was inaugurated and rests upon it. It is the simple right of self-government—the inherent claim of men to construct the government to which they are expected to yield obedience.

To impose the Lecompton constitution upon the people of Kansas would be a plain, flagrant, and violent breach of this principle; so plain that no sophistry can obscure it; so flagrant that no considerations of public policy can palliate it.

Is it not your faith and the faith of the country, settled and unalterable, that the foundations of all rightful empire can be laid alone in the popular will? Government is not the creator, but the creature of power, of which the people are the original and only legitimate source. Political institutions are modes of procedure, not objects of pursuit—means which the people originate and employ to achieve the ends of social organization, namely, freedom and security. And, as the fundamental structure of the State derives its existence and the tenure of its duration from the free action and consent of the people, it follows, as the President justly observes, that no human power can rightfully prevent them from changing it at pleasure; but the people have the right to alter their constitution, because they have a right to make it. The right to abolish is derived from and depends upon their earlier and prior right to ordain and establish. If they have no antecedent right to make, they have no subsequent right to change.

If you can impose a constitution upon the people of Kansas without their authority and against their consent, for a day or a year, you may for all time. The question is one of power, not of duration; of principle, not of policy. You can do this only, sir, by subverting the principles of the Government and denying the traditional faith of the country.

What is a constitution in the American sense of such an instrument—what is an American constitution? It is not only the fundamental rule of the State, originated and adopted by the people as their mode of administering the Government, but also a limitation upon the sovereign power of the people self-sought and self-imposed; not an iron harness sprung upon the limbs of a commonwealth by a foreign despotism or an internal faction. If there is anything upon which freemen may vote, it is the organic law under which they are to live. If popular sovereignty means anything—if self-government has any significance—it requires that the constitution proposed for the government of a people shall be fully and freely submitted for their acceptance or rejection.

Before Congress can receive Kansas into the Union as one of the sovereign States of this Confederacy, we are bound to be satisfied that the sovereign people have made application; that the majority, and not the minority, ask admission; that the constitution with which she comes unmistakably embodies the assent and judgment of her people. Not that the Kansas-Nebraska act has made any new revelations, or imposed any new requirements upon Congress in reference to the doctrine of self-government, as seems to be supposed in certain quarters, but because considerations with earlier and higher sanctions than the Kansas-Nebraska bill, or any act which Congress ever has, or ever can pass, demands this at our hands. The common and conceded rights of man require it; because you have no right, legal or moral, under any necessity whatever, to impose a constitution upon a free people against their will. And this is precisely what the Lecompton conspirators ask you to do. Their whole proceeding was a deliberative and studied scheme to force an obnoxious constitution upon an unwilling and resisting people; and you are now asked to consummate the wrong.

This Lecompton swindle, the work of a meager minority, and coming up here reeking with fraud and branded with the popular condemnation, is commended to our approval by the Federal Executive; not on the ground of justice but upon the plea of tranquility. That same old plea, sir, that made the compromise of 1820 and broke it in 1854; that has already nationalized slavery and localized freedom; changed by construction the organic law of the Federal Union from a free Constitution into an instrument by which the institutions peculiar to the southern portion of the Confederacy are carried into all the Territories of the Union heretofore or hereafter acquired. So that the music of the Union, with which we are required to keep step, is the clanking of chains and the rattling of coffles.

We may not forget, Mr. Chairman, that the Pierce Administration came into power upon the statute of repose. There had been a great finality in 1850. The slavery question had been definitely settled. There was to be no more agitation upon that subject, in or out of Congress. We were to have a good time generally, and, I may add, indefinitely. Well, sir, that Administration had scarcely entered upon the responsibilities of the Government, and had time to reaffirm its doctrines and pledges of repose, before these same Union-savers and tranquillizers—without cause, necessity, or invitation—reopened the slavery controversy both in and out of Congress, by striking down the Missouri settlement, to the end that slavery might be extended over the Territories from which, for a consideration and by the solemn stipulations of both sections of the Confederacy, it had been forever excluded. That act—so unjust and unfair to the free people and free laborers of the North—never had and never can have but one solution: its design was to make Kansas a slave State. So we believed and so we charged.

The argument of popular sovereignty, put forth with all the zeal and pretense of a new revelation, was but a tub thrown to the whale. A mere device, delusion, and snare, in order to allay the public excitement, and prepare the country for the next aggressive step in the progress and consummation of the wrong. So we also believed, and so we likewise charged. Less than four years have passed, and those predictions have become history, and those charges are more than verified. In the past history and present attitude of Kansas, I submit to the House and the country, we have all the elements of entire demonstration.

A bold and reckless minority of her people, intent on a purpose to be accomplished only by a cheat, have framed a constitution to suit themselves, and in known and shameless defiance alike of their own pledges and the public will. How have they done all this? Under the protection of the Federal Army, commissioned and sent there to enforce the will of the minority. Majorities in a free land like ours, can enforce their own will. It is only the necessities of minorities which require the aid of dragoons. That minority, affecting to represent the people of Kansas, are now here with their slave constitution, asking admission into the Union as an equal State. That constitution is a fugitive from justice. It has been smuggled from the Territory under the cover of the Federal bayonets, and now appears here naked and unadorned not only, but with the dust and odor of the grave upon it, to which it had been committed by the votes of more than ten thousand freemen. Shall we breathe into it the breath of life? Shall we attempt to give it force and vitality, or return it, a corpse as it came, for final burial in the soil it was created to enslave?

Well, Mr. Chairman, the President tells us that the Kansas-Nebraska act did not require the whole constitution to be submitted, only that part which relates to the "domestic institution of slavery;" that the Kansas-Nebraska act is satisfied by such a submission. Who made that act the standard by which to measure the rights of American freemen? The right of our people to self-government—to decide for themselves the institutions under which they are to live—is derived from higher sources than the Kansas-Nebraska bill—their own intrinsic manhood; a right not conferred, but vindicated and guaranteed by the constitutional structure and maxims of the Republic. I am free to confess I do not know what the Kansas-Nebraska act does require. It has received so many different and successive interpretations from its friends, in order to meet the new exigencies of the Democratic party and the slavery question, it is difficult to say what is its present, or what is to be its final construction. At the time of its imposing advent, it was claimed, at least by the national Democracy North, that, under it, the people of the Territory might exclude slavery while in the territorial condition. By its interpretation in the Cincinnati platform, the people might exclude it when they came to form a State constitution. By the President's message it is understood to mean—and this is the last interpretation—that the people may exclude it after they become a State. So far, then, we have three interpretations.

1. The people may exclude slavery while in the territorial condition.

2. The people may not exclude it while in the territorial condition, but may when they come to form a constitution preparatory to their admission into the Union.

3. That the people may not exclude it before their admission into the Union, but may in a short time afterwards, provided they can.

This, then, is the Kansas-Nebraska bill; it "hath this extent; no more." This is the great doctrine of popular sovereignty; the new revelation; the "stump speech in the belly of the bill." What the eloquent gentleman from Mississippi called the "second Declaration of Independence." Are the Democrats from the free States, are the Democrats from the slave States, satisfied with this "lame and impotent conclusion."

But, again, sir, the President says that the question of slavery "has been fairly and explicitly referred to the people, whether they will have a constitution with or without slavery." The infirmity of this statement is a radical one; its entire want of foundation in fact. I affirm, sir, that no such question was submitted, or intended to be submitted at all by the Lecompton convention. No matter which form of ballot the people voted, whether "the constitution with slavery," or "the constitution with no slavery," they had a slave constitution still, and could not have anything else or different. Did these Lecompton despots suppose that the rest of mankind were fools and could not detect the fraud, bold and patent on the very face of their record? No, sir; they knew it was a cheat—they confessed it was a cheat. They intended to do just what they did; and expected it would be known and read of all men. It was the last desperate throw of the dice; and they meant to frame a constitution so odious in itself, and contrive such agencies and modes of submission as necessarily to exclude every man not in the conspiracy, whether Republican or Democrat, from the polls; and rely upon the Administration and its majority in Congress to see them through. Did they count without their host? We shall see. I can assure gentlemen of one thing; if the expectations of the Lecomptonites are realized in this regard, the Democratic party, so-called, will become, geographically, what it is in fact, a mere sectional party.

The members of the convention who were opposed to the sham proceeding, and in favor of sending the constitution as framed directly to Congress, without committing it in any form to the ordeal of the public judgment, did not hesitate to denounce the scheme of affected submission as a "lie, a cheat, and a swindle;" as "wearing falsehood upon its face in letters of brass." What these men, and such men, thus characterized, the Executive head of the Republic has commended to us as "fair."

Had "the constitution with no slavery" prevailed at the election of the 21st of December, as it did not, it would have been, to all intents and purposes, simply and legally a slave constitution. It guaranteed and perpetuated slavery in Kansas forever. It provided "that the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with," and prohibited to the people of the proposed State any and all power, through legislative action or the processes of constitutional reform, to control or impair that right in any manner whatsoever.

By the fourteenth section of the schedule, which graciously permits the people after the year 1864, if they shall so order, to assemble a convention to revise the constitution, it is expressly declared "but no alteration shall be made to affect the right of property in the ownership of slaves."

What is this right of property in slaves thus exempted from all criticism and control, as that right is now understood and defined by the powers that be? It is the absolute right of property in all slaves in esse and in their increase forever. If this does not constitute a slave constitution the fault is in the infirmity of the English language.

The question then, Mr. Chairman, which the President informs us "has been fairly and explicitly referred to the people," is plainly and simply this, whether the slave owners of Kansas shall import their domestics or raise them, and no arts of argument or of rhetoric can make it anything more or different. The alternative presented to the people of Kansas, is precisely the choice the white man commended to the Indian: "you may have the crow and I will have turkey, or I will have turkey and you may have the crow."

This submission, the President tells us, satisfies the organic act of the Territory. This is allowing the people "to form and regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way." This is the great doctrine of popular sovereignty as recast, improved, and promulgated in the Kansas-Nebraska bill. For four anxious years has the Democratic mountain been in labor, and this is the progeny. And, Mr. Chairman, what a little thing it is.

In attempting to justify what he calls the reservation of the "rights of property in slaves now in the Territory," the President employs the following extraordinary language:

"To have summarily confiscated the property in slaves already in the Territory would have been an act of gross injustice, and contrary to the practice of the older States of the Union which have abolished slavery."

Was there no way of providing against a summary confiscation of the property in slaves except by a constitutional guarantee of that property and its increase in perpetuity? The object of that convention, in inserting these provisions, was not to prevent "summary confiscation," but its open and avowed purpose was to secure, in defiance of the public judgment, a slave constitution, with perpetual and unalterable guarantees—and this, whether submitted or unsubmitted, whether the slavery article was voted out or voted in—and this they accomplished.

Had I been a member of a constitutional convention of Kansas, fairly elected and constituted by its people, I might have accorded to the owner of this species of property, as was done at Topeka, a reasonable time to remove his slaves from the Territory, to be disposed of in any manner he thought proper; but I should have done it as a matter of favor, and not conceded it as a claim of right. I deny that any such right exists. No such claim is recognized by any rule of justice or equity. "The practice of the older States which have abolished slavery" has nothing to do with the case under consideration, either by analogy or otherwise. The justice of this claim is to be determined by the Kansas-Nebraska act. As this act was put forth as inaugurating a new policy in respect to the Territories, we have a claim to know, though not responsible for the measure, what are the rights, if any, of the people under it? Is it conceded that the people of a Territory, when they come to form a State government, may exclude and abolish slavery? Then, sir, every person who carries his slaves into the Territories, carries them with notice of this unquestioned right of the people, and subject to the exercise of that right. He goes knowing and acknowledging that the people may say, whenever they proceed to form a constitution, that property in human beings shall no longer exist in the Territory, and he goes at his peril. If the people say, "we give you time to remove and dispose of your slaves elsewhere," very well; if not, he has no cause of complaint whatsoever.

I concede that with those who believe, as the Lecompton constitution declares, that the right of property in man is above all constitutional sanctions, and therefore exempt at all times, and in any manner, from the reach of the popular will, this argument can have no force. If the doctrines of the message are to prevail, the question will be, not whether there shall be any more slave States admitted into the Union, but whether there shall be any more free States admitted into the Union.

We are told that no matter how great the number of slaves in the Territory, "the provision would be equally just and reasonable." What "provision," Mr. Chairman? The provision in the Lecompton "constitution with no slavery," whereby the right of property in slaves already in the Territory, and in all children of them born, is guaranteed forever. If this is to become the policy of the Government, in respect to Territories—if this is the practical working of the Kansas-Nebraska bill—then, sir, is the age of free constitutions past, and the triumph of the slave power upon this continent is already universal and complete. Such heresy is entitled to no respect here or elsewhere. The Administration in laboring to defend this great wrong, proves itself an accomplice in its commission. In assuming the championship of this scheme to legalize and prolong the reign of terror and tyranny in Kansas, it could not, but for its official patronage and power, survive for an hour the merited judgment of popular condemnation.

I have said that the modes of submission were artfully contrived for the very purpose, and that purpose avowed, of driving the free-State men from the polls. I affirm the people of Kansas could not have voted without sacrifice of their honor, integrity, freedom, and self-respect. I have no time to enter upon the details of proof. I take a single illustration.

The Lecompton convention met in September, and adjourned until after the October election, to see what might then turn up to render unnecessary the coup d'état which they otherwise contemplated.

Through the just intervention of Governor Walker, for which he has since been compelled to resign to prevent decapitation, the Johnson and McGee county frauds did not prevail, and the result was a free-State victory by overwhelming majorities. The effect of this victory was to be got rid of, and the Lecomptonites reassembled. Enraged at Governor Walker—from whose proslavery antecedents they had expected better things—for rejecting the Oxford returns, they took those very returns, known and admitted to be palpable and undisguised forgeries, and placed them in the constitution as the basis of legislative representation for the county of Johnson. According to her population, that county is entitled not to exceed one representative; by the constitution she has four; entitled to neither senator, by this constitution she has two; and thus made equal with the county of Douglas with more than five times the population.

Now, sir, on the day of election a citizen of Douglas county approaches the polls, and we have this colloquy between himself and the inspector: "I want to vote against the Lecompton constitution." "You cannot do it, sir." "I want to vote to make Kansas a free State." "You cannot do that, sir." "Well, then, what may I vote for?" "You may vote whether the owner shall import his slaves or raise them." "Well, this is a close question; but, on the whole, I will vote against importation." "Very good; then first vote for the constitution." "But," says the voter, "the constitution sanctions and sanctifies the Oxford forgeries, by which my county is defrauded of its relative weight in the councils of the proposed State, and I cannot vote for it." "So I supposed," answers the inspector; "you may as well leave, and go home."

Mr. Chairman, need I multiply arguments to show that this whole pretense of submission is a bold and infamous mockery? It can deceive no one. The whole plot, in its entire deformity, is exposed and patent to the world. Its origin, its development, and its memory, await but one doom—the common execration of mankind.

Governor Walker, speaking for himself and from Federal instructions, said to the people of Kansas: Surrender all other modes and settle your unhappy controversies by the arbitrament of the ballot-box—that sacred and magic spot where freemen go to execute their will—and I will see fair play. The Administration said the same thing, speaking directly and independently for itself; and the free-State men of Kansas, relying upon these pledges of protection, said amen. They went into the election and won—triumphantly, overwhelmingly won. And here is the rub; hence the clamor against Governor Walker, hence the backing down of the Administration, hence the violation of pledges, hence the Lecompton constitution, hence the desertion of Walker, the decapitation of Stanton, and the attempted ostracism of a distinguished Senator at the other end of the Capitol.

Why were not the common rights of freemen accorded to the people of Kansas in respect to their organic law? Why was not the whole constitution honestly submitted to the people for their acceptance or rejection? There is but one reason, one only answer. The answer given first by the convention itself, and afterwards taken up and repeated by the Washington organ of the Administration. The people would have voted it down. The majority were factious and unreasonable. They did not like the Oxford plank, the Know Nothing element, the bank project of the constitution. They did not like to acknowledge the usurpations of the convention, or very much fancy the outside barbarian sources from which it had its origin. The eleven jurymen were stubborn, and majorities are not always to be depended upon. This argument sounds well upon Democratic lips. It comes with peculiar grace from an Administration recently elevated to power upon the vehement pretense of superior devotion to the cause of popular sovereignty. Could anything more completely demonstrate the utter desperation of a cause, than such utter prostitution of all the consistencies of debate, employing against submission the precise considerations which make submission imperative?

Mr. Chairman, this Lecompton conspiracy is not an isolated wrong—falling upon that people with the startling effect of an unanticipated calamity. It is but the culmination of a system of atrocities. The last of a succession of outrages whose unity of design and execution is as traceable as the milky-way. The latest act of a drama of despotism and fraud, in which local barbarism and Federal intervention have combined in acting the same part looking from the first and invariably to the one end, the subjection of Kansas to the dominion of slavery. Hence the Federal Government could find no power in the Constitution to employ the Army to protect the people from organized invasion, by which the polls were seized and the government usurped in March, 1855, but found the authority so soon as the necessities of the usurpation required the Army to enforce its administration and execute its code of laws—a code in comparison with which the worst edicts of the worst of the Cæsars were the embodiments of a generous humanity. Hence northern emigration was for months blockaded along the whole eastern borders of the Territory by bands of armed men; and the navigable waters affording access to her soil—waters which nature had provided as free channels to the tide of empire—patrolled with all the jealousy of Austrian despotism. The people at every turn hunted and plundered by the aid of Government officials. And lastly, have we seen this Lecompton convention guarded by the Federal soldiery, finish the work, and now that work accepted and defended by the national Administration. Accepted and defended not as entirely satisfactory, but as a measure of peace.

Unable to justify the Lecompton constitution upon any ground of reason, consistency, or justice, the ancient and heretofore prevailing argument of repose and amity is again invoked. The peace and quiet of the country have suddenly become objects of paramount importance, superior to all questions of faith, honor, or justice. Kansas we are told, has for some years occupied too much of the public attention. Granted.

Who is responsible for it? Not this side of the Chamber. Not the people of Kansas. Not the people of the North. The people of Kansas two years ago applied for admission into the Union under the Topeka constitution; a constitution which had been submitted to the people and received their ratification. Beyond all question it embodied the then popular will. Why did you not tranquilize Kansas and the country then? Why did you not localize the quarrel then? The Topeka was a free constitution, and the country did not need repose. The Union was not in danger except by admission. Kansas had not occupied sufficient of the public attention, and you did not propose to localize the controversy.

Then, if I recollect the speeches of gentlemen on the other side of this Hall, they wanted evidence that the constitution embodied the popular will. They were not, and wanted to be, satisfied as to this; and, besides, there was no hurry. Kansas had not sufficient population, and could afford to wait. It is only when she comes with a slave constitution—no matter how achieved—that she needs pacification, and the arguments of repose become prevailing.

Mr. Chairman, peace does not lay in the direction of the further oppression of the people of Kansas. If the recorded will of the majority is to be cloven down; if the fetters made to order by the Lecompton architects are to be fastened upon a whole community of American freemen, it will be after a struggle such as this country has never yet seen. If peace is secured in the mode proposed, it will be the peace of Warsaw, after the national heart of Poland had ceased its pulsations, and the power of resistance had perished.

But a distinction is taken between the legal people and the real people. I suppose the precedent for this is derived from our revolutionary era, when a similar distinction was taken. It is claimed that the Lecompton was a legal convention, and those who sustain it are the legal people, as distinguished from the real people. I deny, sir, that it was a legal or legitimate convention; its political genealogy is directly traceable to the Missouri invasion. One branch, at least, of the so-called Legislature, which provided for calling this convention, was elected by outsiders, and not by the people of Kansas, and was simply a usurpation.

The Lecompton convention can have no higher authority than its source. Moreover, it was vitally defective in its organization; it represented territorially but half of the counties of Kansas, and numerically but an insignificant fragment of that half.

In its inception, in its proceedings, in the provisional government and dictatorship which it establishes in order to override the real voters by fraudulent voters, the real people by unreal people, it was simply an illegal despotism. Away with your miserable distinctions between your legal people and your real people; no matter whether constitutions are framed by conventions called with or without legislative intervention, provided they have been indorsed and consecrated by the public will. Away with forms, and modes, and technicalities. The question is, have the people spoken, and to what results?—not through what conduits have they spoken.

Modes, and forms, and technicalities are often but cobwebs which mar the beauty without adding to the strength of the logical structure.

Through and beyond the dust and drapery rises the great temple of argument, resting upon the people's will as the everlasting hills upon their foundation.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, obtained the floor. Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I understand that the gentleman from Mississippi does not desire to speak this evening, and I therefore, with his permission, move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. KEITT. Will the gentleman from Indiana withdraw that motion for a moment, to allow me to ask a question of the gentleman who has just spoken?

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. KEITT. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE] a question, which, as this discussion is gathering to a head, may enable us to avoid some misrepresentation or misunderstanding.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I must insist on the regular order. The gentleman from South Carolina can ask his question at some other time. Let the gentleman from Mississippi proceed, if he desires to do so.

Mr. KEITT. I only want to ask one question. The gentleman from Mississippi does not desire to speak this evening, and has yielded for a motion to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I do, for a moment only.

Mr. KEITT. The gentleman yields for me to ask one question, honestly put, with a view of eliciting information. I wish to know of the gentleman from New York, who has just spoken, whether or not he would vote for the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution?

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I answer very frankly that, if I had evidence that it embodied the public will, I should do so.

Mr. KEITT. Did not the gentleman say in his speech that it did embody the public will?

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. Yes, sir; at the time it was adopted.

Mr. KEITT. Then, in connection with that, I wish to ask the gentleman this question: if the whole Lecompton constitution had been submitted to the people, and the whole vote of the Territory, embracing all the voters there, had been thrown for that constitution, with slavery expressly and unequivocally established, would he have voted for the admission of Kansas under that constitution?

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. Not since the repeal of the Missouri compromise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I now renew the motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ENGLISH reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 202) to appropriate money to supply deficiencies for the paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DELAWARE BREAKWATER.

Mr. WHITELEY, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House with the estimated cost of the completion of the Delaware breakwater by the construction of a mole, or pier, upon the shore of the Delaware bay, opposite the breakwater.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY, ETC.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the consent of the House to introduce the following resolutions, for the purpose of having them referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, designated as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, being, under the interpretation placed on it by Great Britain, an entire surrender of the rights of this country, and upon the American construction an entangling alliance without mutuality either in its benefits or restrictions, and having hitherto been productive only of misunderstandings and controversies between the two Governments, ought therefore to be abrogated.

Resolved, That since the acquisition and settlement of our territory on the Pacific, certain portions of Central America stand to us in a relation similar to that which Louisiana, prior to its acquisition, bore to our territory in the Mississippi valley, and, therefore, ought not to be subject to the control of any foreign Power that might interfere materially with our interests.

Resolved, That inasmuch as the Government of the United States has heretofore taken steps to suppress the African slave trade, and is at present subjecting itself to a considerable annual expense to keep up a squadron on the coast of Africa to prevent the same, we feel it to be our duty to protest against the trade in white men, commonly called the Cooly trade, not only on principles of humanity with reference to the subjects of that traffic, but also because it is eminently injurious in its ultimate effects to the countries to which they are transported.

Mr. BLISS. I object to the resolutions.

RAILROADS THROUGH SOUTH PASS.

Mr. BLAIR offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish this House with any information that may be communicated to him by F. W. Lander, Esq., engineer of the wagon road, as to the practicability of railroads through the South Pass, and the best method of constructing a road, and any other information in respect to the same obtained during his late exploration.

MAJOR GENERAL WOOL.

Mr. OLIN offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public service, so much of the correspondence between the late Secretary of War and Major General John E. Wool, late commanding the Pacific department, relative to the affairs of such department as has not heretofore been published under a call of this House.

THE MORMONS.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution for reference.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I think we all ought to have fair play; and I ask, therefore, that the States be called for bills and resolutions. Till that be done, I must object to everything coming in.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I believe the gentleman himself has got in a resolution.

Mr. KEITT. No; it was objected to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. My resolution is in the hands of the Clerk. Let it be read.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw my objection to that; but I will object to everything else.

Mr. LETCHER. Let us hear what the resolution is.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to appoint three commissioners to negotiate with the Mormons in Utah, for the purchase of their possessions, on the following conditions, to wit:

1. That they shall peaceably remove by the 1st day of June, A. D. 1859, from without the limits and jurisdiction of the United States.
2. That they shall keep the peace towards all the people of the United States.
3. That the money to be allowed them for their improvements shall be paid at such times and in such amounts as they and said commissioners may agree.
4. That said Mormons shall not depreciate in value their real possessions after an arrangement for their purchase shall have been concluded.
5. That until the removal of the Mormons from without the limits of the United States they shall submit to and be governed by the laws thereof.
6. That all hostilities between the Mormons and the United States shall cease after they shall have concluded an arrangement with the said commissioners to remove from without the United States, as contemplated in this resolution, and on the basis thereof: Provided, That the President of the United States shall keep such force within the Territory of Utah as, in his judgment, the public interest may require.
7. That the Mormons as a community shall be responsible to the United States for the value of its property, or that of any of its citizens destroyed by them, or any of them—the amount of which, when ascertained, in the manner said commissioners may designate, shall be deducted from the amount said Mormons may be entitled to receive as aforesaid from the Government for their possessions.

Resolved, That the commissioners hereby authorized to be appointed, shall receive dollars per day and all necessary expenses for their services; and that they be, and hereby are required, upon being notified of their selection by the President, to enter at once upon the duty assigned them. They shall proceed to Salt Lake City, where they shall commence the negotiation provided for in the preceding resolution, and report their action in the premises to the President as soon as practicable.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I move an amendment to it, that the Mormons shall not have more than one wife.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses for the present session, on Monday, the 7th day of June next ensuing, at twelve o'clock, M.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that that is not a question of privilege.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object. It fixes the time too far off.

And then, on motion of Mr. LETCHER, (at twenty minutes past three o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, M.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 27, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. ALFRED HOLMEAD.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the petition of insurance companies, owners of vessels, and others, at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of a law to regulate and establish a system of lights, to be carried by sailing vessels navigating the lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Janesville, Wisconsin, praying for the adoption of some practical measure for peacefully extinguishing slavery, and providing compensation to the owners of slaves for their manumission; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of Phebe Smith, widow and executrix of Oziel Smith, praying for indemnity for property destroyed by the enemy in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Frances Ann McCauley, widow of Daniel S. McCauley, late consul general at Alexandria, in Egypt, praying for compensation for certain judicial duties performed by her husband under the act of August 11, 1848; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FOOT presented the petition of William C. Fowler and others, praying to be allowed bounty land for services in the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of James A. Glanding, praying for a pension for a wound received in the defense of Baltimore in 1814; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Eliza Gerry Townsend, widow of David S. Townsend, late a paymaster in the Army, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BIGLER presented the memorial of Henry S. Crabbe, first clerk to the commandant of the navy-yard at Philadelphia, praying Congress to correct an error in relation to his compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of James Suddards, a passed assistant surgeon in the Navy, praying to be allowed a balance of pay which he alleges to be due to him; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SLIDELL presented a memorial of the register and receiver of the land office at New Orleans, praying that the compensation of registers and receivers may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES presented a memorial of citizens of Fort Dodge, and a memorial of citizens of Iowa Falls, in the State of Iowa, praying that a grant of land may be made to aid in the construction of a railroad from some point on the Missouri river, westward, in the direction of the South Pass, in the Rocky Mountains, with a branch in the direction of Oregon and Washington Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of John M. Chase, for himself and others, owners of the bark Attica, praying that certain money paid on account of that vessel, under an act of Congress, may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MASON. I present the petition of J. K. Kane, and many other citizens of Philadelphia, asking that some provision may be made by law for the relief of the widow of the late Commodore Foxhall A. Parker, of the Navy. The memorial states the services of Commodore Parker and the circumstances under which he died, some of which were known to me, and presents a very earnest prayer that provision may be made in pursuance of the prayer of the petition. It has been intrusted to me, I doubt not, from the fact that Commodore Parker, although he died at Philadelphia, was a citizen, and a very valued citizen of Virginia. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Bancroft Woodcock, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion of Mr. BIGLER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Joseph Paul, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Noah Smith, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. SEBASTIAN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Elizabeth Monroe, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of Jehu Underwood, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Joshua Mercer, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. YULEE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, be directed to consider if any changes are advisable in the organization of the Post Office Department.

ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HARLAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of the passage of a law making it the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to send abstracts, quarterly, of all entries of public lands, lying in each State and Territory, to the Governor of each respectively, applying for the same, and report by bill or otherwise.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. HENRY, his Secretary, announcing that he had approved and signed an act (S. No. 27) to detach Selma, in the State of Alabama, from the collection district of New Orleans, and make it a port of delivery within the collection district of Mobile.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred the memorial of the corporation of Georgetown, relative to the improvement of the navigation at that place, and the memorial of the said corporation relative to improving the harbor of Georgetown, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of the directors of the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind, and the petition of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to amend "An act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the support of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind," approved the 16th of February, 1857. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 14) authorizing the appointment of commissioners to examine into the difficulties in the affairs of the Territory of Utah, with a view to their settlement; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. BENJAMIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 15) authorizing a renewal of certain contracts for carrying the mails on the Mis-issippi river; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BRODERICK, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 98) to authorize and direct the payment of certain moneys into the treasury of the State of California, which were collected in the ports of said State as a revenue upon imports since the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and prior to the admission of said State into the Union; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. DAVIS submitted, as presenting the views of the minority of the select committee on the Pacific railroad, the form of an amendment, which he gave notice of his intention to move as an amendment to the bill (S. No. 65) to authorize the President of the United States to contract for the transportation of the mails, troops, seamen, munitions of war, Army and Navy supplies, and all other Government service, by railroad from the Missouri river to San Francisco; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GWIN. I desire to have printed with the substitute of the Senator from Mississippi, some copies of the original bill which was some time since reported by the select committee. The edition which was printed is exhausted; and as copies will be required when the bill comes up for consideration on Monday next, I move that the usual number be again printed.

The motion was agreed to.

OHIO LEGISLATURE ON KANSAS.

Mr. PUGH. I present resolutions of the General Assembly of Ohio, relative to the affairs of the Territory of Kansas. As my colleague wishes to make some remarks upon them, I move that they lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I do not propose to make any extended remarks on these very extraordinary resolutions at this or at any time; but they are extraordinary in their character, incongruous in themselves, and, I fear, not very reputable to the State.

Mr. HALE. Let them be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolutions relative to Kansas Affairs.

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That we still have entire confidence in the disinterestedness, the integrity, and the ability of the present Chief Magistrate of these United States, and that his administration commands our cordial and undivided support.

Resolved, That we still adhere to and reaffirm all the doctrines of the Cincinnati platform.

Resolved, That we regard the refusal of the Lecompton convention to submit the constitution framed by them to the bona fide people of that Territory, as unwise, and unfortunate for the peace of that Territory, and we hereby declare it to be our unalterable judgment that every constitution of a new State, unless otherwise directed by the people, ought to be submitted to the bona fide electors of such Territory for their approval or rejection.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress are hereby instructed, and our Representatives are hereby requested, to vote against the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton, or any other constitution that has not proceeded from the people by a clear delegation of power to the convention to form and put in operation such constitution, without a further sanction of the people; or which has not been submitted to, and approved by, a vote of the people.

Resolved, That the Governor be hereby requested to forward to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, a copy of these resolutions forthwith.

WILLIAM B. WOODS,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MARTIN WELKER,

President of the Senate.

January 20, 1858.

We hereby certify that the within resolutions have passed both branches of the General Assembly, have been enrolled and signed by the respective presiding officers thereof, and deposited in the office of the Secretary of State.

CHARLES W. BLAIR,

Clerk of the Senate.

JOHN W. KEES,

Clerk of the House of Representatives.

January 21, 1858.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I have said that I feared these resolutions were not reputable, because they do not speak out with that manly independence with which the Legislature of a sovereign State should ever speak upon any question sufficiently important to elicit their observation at all. Why do they go on to indorse the President, and say they have special confidence in his Administration, and pledge themselves to support every jot and tittle of that Administration, when they intend finally to instruct us here to go against the only great darling measure the Administration has ever presented? Why could they not have come directly to the question at issue, and, with that calm dignity which becomes a sovereign State, declare and announce their purpose and their instructions and their will, in reference to any matter pending here which it became the duty of their representatives to act upon? Why declare that they have the fullest confidence in all its measures, while it was the purpose and end of their resolutions that with a stern determination their representatives here shall beard him, and oppose him to the death on his one great darling measure? They are disreputable because they have not spoken out like men conscious of their independence.

I did not rise for the purpose of arguing the reasons that led to their instructing us at all; they have been argued by others: in my judgment the question is not a debatable one. I never proposed to debate it at all. It is no less than this: The President, in his message, announces a determination not only to prohibit the people of a Territory from making the constitution under which they are to live, but that it is his purpose to force upon them one made by their enemies and sought to be crammed down their throats, if necessary, by Federal bayonets. When such a proposition as that is made, I leave others to debate it. This old issue was joined in the Revolution, and the argument was made on Bunker Hill; and I propose, if it comes to that, to resume that same argument where our fathers left it. It will not bear an argument at all. When any portion of the American people are so lost to all spirit that they would for one moment stand off to argue a question of this kind, their liberties are not worth preserving. I do not rise to argue such a question as that; but it was such a question, looming up in the distance, that attracted the attention of the Ohio Legislature and led to the making of these instructions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend his remarks for a moment. The Chair, under the rule, must announce that the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. WADE. I have nothing further to say of any consequence. I shall not take more than a few minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent the Senator will proceed.

Several SENATORS. "Go on."

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, bowing the proud head of a sovereign State, they descend to speak of party platforms, to which they show their devotion. I should not have alluded to party policy in connection with the acts of a sovereign State, if these resolutions had not introduced the subject. Why, sir, did they step aside from their legitimate business, to reindorse what they call "the Cincinnati platform?" Is that in accordance with the dignity of a sovereign State, when she undertakes to instruct her Representatives and Senators in relation to their duty here?

They show their devotion, too, to the Executive! Why, sir, if he shall persist in what they intimate is his purpose and intention, he is a tyrant, and deserves the frowns and reprobation of every man. They tell us that they have the utmost confidence in the Executive, and that they will adhere to all his measures; yet, in the next place, they tell us that what he is attempting to do is unfortunate; that it tends to a breach of the peace, and to stir up civil war. They do not lose their confidence in him; they say they have the most perfect confidence in his ability and his integrity; that they adhere to all his measures; and then they instruct us to throw his message in his face. I am ready to do it, sir. [Laughter.] Unfortunate, indeed, it was that the attempt was made to frame a constitution behind the back of a people, and to fasten it on their necks without their assent. They say that this was "unfortunate;" and that it is "unfortunate," also, in the President to announce it as his purpose to carry out the fraudulent design. Yes, sir, it was exceedingly "unfortunate." Was it not a little worse than unfortunate, if the President of the United States is responsible? I do not know that he is considered responsible for his acts; but we will hold those responsible who act upon his suggestions, and go forward to fasten on the necks of an unwilling people a constitution with the making of which they have had nothing to do. On that principle of law which holds a man responsible for committing crime through an irresponsible agent, we hold them responsible. If, indeed, the President is unfortunate in not having the spirit and the power to dictate his own measures, then we will hold those responsible for his acts who may be supposed to move him to action.

These resolutions refer to a platform outside, and they indorse it. We know, then, who it was that passed these resolutions; and, in justice to the Republican party, let me say that these resolutions have had no countenance, no support, no acquiescence, from them. They were crowded down the throats of the Republican party there by a majority, who dared not face the scorn and contempt that would have been heaped on them had they permitted the liberty of speech.

So much as to the manner exhibited in the adoption of these resolutions. As to the matter of the last one, I find no fault with it. If they had confined themselves to that; if they had thrown aside all party platforms; if they had refrained from bespattering with flattery the President of the United States; if they had abstained from the indorsement of outside partisan creeds, they would have found no division of sentiment in the Legislature nor out of the Legislature; for, in the State of Ohio, there is but one side to this question. The brave and generous people of Ohio would speak out directly, without obsequiously seeking the favor of any man, President though he be. Boldly and independently they would announce their will, and ask us to act in accordance with it. Those who passed these resolutions have felt compelled at last to come to that, and, in their final resolution, they instruct their representatives here to go to the death against your Lecompton constitution, or any other constitution that is sought to be fastened upon the necks of an unwilling people by a tyrannical Executive. So far, all the people of Ohio, of all parties, are agreed.

What I object to is the manner in which this subject has been approached. These resolutions were carried through our Legislature under the gag rule; and what is very singular, although I think it is more than ten days since they were passed—and on the plea that there was the most absolute necessity they should be crowded immediately through, no argument or debate on the subject was allowed—they have slept in some man's breeches pocket from that day to this. They are unwillingly here, and I do not wonder at it; for I believe that any man, when he looks at these resolutions—the workmanship of his own hands—will not be ambitious to figure with them on the theater of the nation. In the manner in which they are presented, they are not in accordance with the wishes of the people of Ohio. They are an honest, generous, and brave people, and they speak their minds without any condition or qualification. They are not a people to flatter a tyrant before they dare order their troops to resist him.

I have thought it was due to myself to say thus much on account of the incongruity and the very extraordinary character of the resolutions. Do they ask me to indorse that portion of them which bespatters the President with fulsome flattery? Is that my part of them, or is that the part of my colleague? I can hardly go that part of the resolutions. And, again, I can hardly indorse the "Cincinnati platform." I do not know but that may be for me, [laughter,] but there I shall be found unwilling, and shall require the very strongest instructions. [Renewed laughter.] But when you come to the "unfortunate" part of it, that is too mild for my temperament altogether. It may suit my colleague to say that the President is unfortunate in persisting in forcing on the people a constitution which they detest and abhor; but I say it is downright tyranny and knavery, and demands the sternest rebuke of every man. If persisted in, it will demand not argument, but action.

Then they approach a subject on which I am with those gentlemen, and I hope my colleague is so too. I am ready to go with the Legislature of Ohio, in resisting unto the death your Lecompton constitution, or any other constitution that is sought to be fastened on an unwilling people, against the votes of more than three fourths of them; for at this day, there is no mist hanging over this question at all. We know how it is. The people of Kansas have measured their strength too often to leave us at all in doubt as to what is the will of the people; and whoever is the advocate for fastening on them this Lecompton constitution, does it in cold blood, from his own tyrannical impulses, and a determination to deprive the American people of that which has never been sought to be taken away from any portion of them from the revolutionary period to the present. It is the first attempt, and, Mr. President, I say it must be the last.

Mr. PUGH. It is only necessary for me to say that I shall not detain the Senate at this time, with the special order before it, to make any observations on these resolutions. My purpose is, when the Lecompton constitution shall be presented, to express my views at length. I shall then say what I have to say on the subject-matter of these resolutions, and I shall probably find it my duty to correct my colleague in one or two little matters of fact connected with their passage.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order is before the Senate.

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. BAYARD. I rise to a question of privilege. The Committee on the Judiciary reported a resolution to the Senate, on the 21st of January, which has lain over until the present time. I do not see in his seat the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] who is opposed to the resolution; but, unless it is the desire of those who are opposed to it that it should stand over further, I conceive it my duty to call it up, because it is a resolution simply to authorize the taking of testimony, and I am not willing that the delay should rest with the majority of the committee. It is a privileged motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will give his impression to the Senate on the point of order. The special order (being the bill S. No. 79) is before the Senate, and has been taken up. These other proceedings were had by unanimous consent. I suppose it will require a motion to postpone the special order before the privileged question can come up.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the debate on the bill to increase the Army will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no wish to press the matter, if those who are opposed to the resolution which has been reported by the committee desire that it shall stand over until the honorable Senator from Vermont is in his seat.

Mr. FOSTER. I will state that the Senator from Vermont, to whom the Senator from Delaware alludes, is confined to his room by sickness, and requested me, if the resolution was called up, to ask that it might lie over for a day or two. He will undoubtedly be able to attend in his place by to-morrow, or the next day at the furthest. He is now confined by illness.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to postpone the consideration of the special order, if there is no probability of the honorable Senator from Vermont being here.

Mr. FOSTER. He will not be here to-day.

Mr. FOOT. I will say to the Senator from Delaware, and to the Senate, that I called upon my colleague just before the meeting of the Senate this morning, and learned from him that he is detained solely by indisposition. I think, however, and that was his own opinion, that he will be able to be in attendance in a day or two, and he desires to be present when that subject shall be brought up for consideration.

Mr. BAYARD. I will let it stand with pleasure until the honorable Senator from Vermont comes into the Senate.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Toombs to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. GWIN. Is it in order to offer a substitute for the whole bill now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No, sir, not at this moment.

Mr. GWIN. Can I not move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a new bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the practice of the Senate has been to give an opportunity to perfect the bill first.

Mr. TOOMBS. The amendment will not be in order until the original bill be perfected; but I am perfectly willing to test the Senator's amendment, if it be the pleasure of the Senate. Now, however, it is not in order, the parliamentary rule being that the original bill must be perfected before a substitute for the whole can be offered; but if it be the pleasure of the Senate, I am content that the question shall be tested on the Senator's amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In addition to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, now pending, there is an amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. GWIN. I send my substitute to the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read for information.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am willing to waive my amendment. I want a vote on the proposition of the Senator from California. We can probably legislate more properly after we have put our opinion on record as to the addition of five regiments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the substitute intended to be proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will withdraw my amendment, and probably the Senator from New York will withdraw his, for the purpose of enabling the Senator from California to move his amendment as a test question. It is unnecessary to go on perfecting the bill, if that amendment is to be adopted. I want a decided expression on that point, so that we may know what we are to do.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw my amendment for that purpose, with that understanding.

Mr. GWIN. I now offer my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California proposes to offer an amendment; to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That there shall be added to the Army one regiment of dragoons, one regiment of mounted riflemen, and three regiments of infantry; five surgeons, and ten assistant surgeons.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, herein authorized to be appointed or enlisted, shall be governed by the rules and articles of war which have been established by law, or by such rules and articles as may hereafter be established by law, and shall be subject to all the provisions and entitled to all the benefits of all laws applying to officers, troops, or corps, of the same denomination in the existing establishment.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, it is known that the Secretary of War has recommended the proposition which is embodied in my amendment. He asks for an increase of the Army by the addition of five regiments. He thinks that addition is necessary to enable him to conduct the military affairs of the country, and I think it is proper there should be a direct vote of the Senate on the proposition, as brought before us by the head of the Department. I confess I would prefer, if we could so approach the subject, that these five regiments should be raised during the war, if there is a war with the Mormons, rather than add five regiments permanently to the standing Army; but I prefer, if we are to increase the Army, that we shall add full regiments, instead of agreeing to the proposition reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. I believe we want more staff officers. It is well known that on the reduction of the Army, at the termination of the war with Mexico, we had twenty-five general officers, by brevet and by original rank. Sixteen of those are dead; one has resigned; one has been dismissed from the Army, and we have but seven now. If we are to have a war with the Mormons, I think we shall need more staff officers than we have at present. It is well known that a number of regiments in the Mexican war were commanded by majors and captains; there were no colonels for many regiments. If we are to increase the Army, I think it had better be done after the manner proposed by the Secretary of War. I have offered the amendment for the purpose of having a vote on it, not intending to go into the discussion.

Mr. FOOT called for the yeas and nays on the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. PUGH. It seems to me the Senate may well pause before voting on the amendment of the Senator from California, because it involves the whole principle of the bill. If this increase of the Army is to be permanent, I prefer the original bill; it will be much less expensive. Five regiments added to the Army will require us to pay five colonels, five lieutenant-colonels, and probably ten majors; and the pay of those officers is a very serious item of expenditure. It will require us also to increase the number of surgeons of the rank of captain and major, as proposed in the amendment. All these things are avoided in the original bill. There will be no increase of field officers by the original bill, except fifteen additional surgeons. If there is to be a permanent increase of the Army I infinitely prefer the original bill. If it is to be a temporary increase, it seems to me that the number of the regiments demanded is beyond the necessity shown, and I would prefer, as to a part of the force, to accept the services of volunteers.

Mr. TOOMBS. So would I. Let us vote it down.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Green, Gwin, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Polk, and Stidell—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hammond, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Jones, King, Mallory, Pearce, Pugh, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—38.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. TOOMBS. I now renew the motion which I made to strike out the first section of the bill after the enacting clause.

Mr. BELL. I confess, Mr. President, that when this bill was first taken up, I supposed it would be my duty on public accounts to vote for it; or, if not for that, at least for such a proposition as has just been voted down by the Senate. I supposed, from the earnest recommendation of the Government, that there was really such a demand existing for additional troops, that we were bound by considerations of the public interest connected with the exigencies existing on the frontiers and in the Territory of Utah, to vote, as indispensable, an addition to the present military force of the country.

But, sir, before the debate closed yesterday, I found that I had been laboring under a considerable misapprehension as to the real state of the question and the exigencies of the case. My opinion now is, unless I shall be better informed before the discussion finally closes, that there is no absolute necessity for any such addition to the Army. It was considerably increased two or three years ago. Our force authorized by law is admitted to be about eighteen thousand men, rank and file, at present; and the addition of four, or five, or seven thousand men, according to the exigencies of the case, as provided by this bill, seems to me uncalled for at this time. I am of opinion, however, that some increase—say two or three thousand, or perhaps even four or five thousand—may not, at some early period, be an unnecessary addition to the military establishment of the United States. I think there is a great deal of force in the argument which has been made, founded upon the low condition of our finances. Although it might be desirable on many accounts to have some additional regiments authorized by law, yet at the present moment there is no such exigency as makes it absolutely necessary; and we may as well afford to wait two years at least before we enter upon such an increase of the standing Army.

I had supposed that the exigency now calling on us to act was really the Mormon war. The statement of facts elicited yesterday, and the opinions of gentlemen better acquainted by far than I am with the forces which may be ordered properly by the Government to increase those of Colonel Johnston, who is now in command of the detachment which is arrested by the snows of the Rocky Mountains, show clearly, it seems to me, that there is a sufficient force at the disposition of the Government to reinforce them adequately. If five or ten regiments were necessary to rescue those gallant officers and soldiers from the condition in which they are now placed, I should feel myself constrained to vote them. Whatever I might think of the indiscretion and the imprudence of the Government in precipitating those men into these difficulties, ordering them to enter upon the expedition at a season of the year when it was known to be almost impossible that they could pass the gorges of the Rocky Mountains until next spring, thus, of course, in the mean time exposing them to all the hardships, and privations, and severities of a Rocky Mountain winter, I would vote for the force demanded, if it was necessary, to rescue them. Whatever I might be disposed to say in reference to this indiscretion and want of foresight, and though, as it seems to me, (notwithstanding the fact I do not pretend to have a sagacity or judgment superior to the military gentleman who may have advised the expedition,) it was ill advised, and was entered upon with a spirit of temerity for which I cannot imagine any reason, in the existing state of things in Utah, I shall be willing to vote for any increase of force demanded at the hands of Congress to rescue these brave men.

But from the debate yesterday I am led to believe that no such exigency exists, and that there is an adequate and all-sufficient force ready to be sent in aid of that command, and at a time anterior to the probable enlistment of the men provided by this bill. I should like to know from the honorable Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, whether it is actually supposed that the additional number of men authorized by the bill before the Senate—the thirty additional companies—can be raised and organized, if the bill shall pass, in time to overtake Colonel Johnston's command in the Rocky Mountains before he may be expected to move upon Salt Lake. I have heard no gentleman state yet that it was supposed this force, even if authorized by Congress, was expected to be raised in time to unite with Colonel Johnston before he moves upon Salt Lake. I have seen it stated in the public papers that several volunteer regiments have already tendered their services to the Government, particularly in Missouri; and I should like to know from the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether it is contemplated to accept the services of those volunteer companies, now said to be tendered in the western part of the State of Missouri? Is it proposed to send them forward in the spring to the relief of Colonel Johnston?

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer the Senator. I have no information from the Administration that they have any such purpose. If he will permit me, I will add that the period for recruiting is now so very favorable that I think, notwithstanding his remarks, if this bill were to pass speedily, it would be possible to raise all the additional force for which it provides before the period at which they could move on the plains. I think they might be in a position to move as soon as it would be possible to start from Fort Leavenworth to the relief of Colonel Johnston.

Mr. BELL. I would like the honorable Senator also to state whether, in his opinion, there is not a sufficient force of regular troops now at the disposal of the War Department to enable it to send a competent reinforcement to Colonel Johnston, as soon as the spring opens and the grass appears on the plains?

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator will not fail to perceive, having been Secretary of War himself, on a former occasion, the delicacy of my undertaking to express such an opinion as that in relation to my successor. Whether he has the disposable force to send or not, will depend on how he distributes the force which he has. I have not the information, and have not sought to obtain the information which would enable me to answer the Senator's question with accuracy, because I have never claimed for myself the right to criticize, in these details, the conduct of my successor in office.

Mr. BELL. I will ask the honorable Senator another question, if he will allow me.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. BELL. I was once familiar with the condition of the Army at a particular period; but I have given so little attention to it of late that I have not the knowledge which authorizes me to make a statement on the subject to the Senate. I have already stated that the military force now authorized by law is eighteen thousand, within a fraction. Now, what is the average percentage of that force which the experience of the last eight or ten years shows can never be said to be effective? Is it ten, or twelve, or fifteen per cent.? Do not resignations, deaths, and other casualties reduce the actual force to far less in amount than the nominal number of troops authorized by law?

Mr. DAVIS. That is a very variable quantity. It depends on the condition of the country. At this moment, I suppose the force to be unusually large, on account of the sudden check which has been given to public works, and the number of men thrown out of employment. This has enabled the recruiting officers to get men with greater facility than usual. Under a different state of circumstances, the disproportion between the actual number of effective troops and the amount nominally authorized, would be much greater than it is now. I give the Senator the benefit of that answer. The former adjutant general, General Jones, stated that a company of fifty-two would rarely give more than thirty-two effective men to go into action. I think, at this time, a larger percentage could be obtained. That is the answer.

Mr. BELL. I should suppose, then, from the statement of the honorable Senator, that the effective force of the standing Army, at present, is about fifteen thousand men.

Mr. DAVIS. It is so reported.

Mr. BELL. That is more than the usual average proportion of the number authorized. Well, sir, if in the present circumstances of the country the present effective force, the actual number of the rank and file of the Army amounts to fifteen thousand men, I cannot conceive that there is a demand for additional force to reinforce Colonel Johnston at this time. Unless there is a larger force demanded for service in Kansas than I suppose can in any exigency arise, there must be a sufficient amount of troops at the disposal of the Secretary of War—

Mr. DAVIS. I see the Senator does not follow exactly what I intended to convey to him. He being so familiar with the subject himself, I did not attempt to be at all minute in my answer.

Mr. BELL. I do not pretend to be familiar with it at all.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it is not fair to infer that all the troops, which cannot be sent to the relief of Colonel Johnston, are to be employed in Kansas.

Mr. BELL. I do not infer any such thing.

Mr. DAVIS. I trust there may be no necessity to employ one man in Kansas. The Senator is certainly aware (for his connection not only with military, but Indian affairs, makes him peculiarly well informed on the subject,) that difficulties have arisen on our extreme northern border; that difficulties have, for some time, existed in our Pacific possessions—in the Territories of Oregon and Washington. He is probably also aware that recent incursions have been made by the Indians along the southern border; that the town of Mesilla has been recently attacked; that parties, passing between towns at a short distance from each other, have been attacked and robbed on the road. The people there have recently sent in a petition signed by a large number of persons, asking for an additional mounted force for their protection: He is also aware that we have memorials from Texas, asking that a regiment of mounted volunteers may be called into service for the protection of their frontier. He is also aware that hostilities are still existing in Florida. Let him run the whole circuit of our country and pass into the interior, and with difficulty he can put his finger on a spot where troops are not required. Why argue it, then, as a question affecting only the Mormons and the people of Kansas?

Mr. BELL. I had the knowledge of some of these things which the Senator has brought to my notice, though I had seen no statement of them, even in the public papers, or by public rumor. I have a pretty general knowledge of the statements in regard to our Indian frontier; and by long observation of the progress of things here, I have come to the conclusion that there must ever be many difficulties occurring on our Indian borders, and on our frontier lines in connection with Mexico, in all probability. My long observation has assured me also, that there is no perfect security to be afforded on any of these lines by any multiplication of the regiments of the standing Army. You send regiment after regiment to one of these frontiers if you choose, if you have them at your disposal, and still the Indians will commit depredations; murders and robberies will be committed; they will slip in between our military posts, between the camps of our regular troops and volunteers; and then the clamor arises from them, "regular troops are not fit to guard our frontier; we are entitled to protection from the Government under which we live, and we must have it: our volunteers, our own men, our boys, our border settlers, or whosoever they can be raised within the State, are the men; let them be organized, admitted into the service and mounted, and they can protect our borders." Still they do not do it absolutely. I understand that part of the argument.

Now, sir, the lenient practice of the Government, though, I think, inexpedient practice in many cases, though not in all cases, the indulgent practice of the Government, or rather the relaxation of all discreet exercise of executive control, has led to many of those Indian wars, not only on our frontiers in the interior, but upon those nurselings of ours—the Territories on the Pacific coast. Money enough has been spent on them, if I have not been misinformed, within the last two or three years, to give a start to the trade, the enterprise, and the business of those communities—such a start as they could not, in the ordinary state of things, have given to themselves by their regular industry in ten years. This is on account of the distribution of six or seven million dollars; and some have said to me, and I stated it a year ago, on this floor, that there was no certainty that $10,000,000 would cover the whole amount of the responsibilities of this Government for these irregular wars in that region. It would be a great misfortune to those Territories, materially speaking—speaking in reference to the sources of their power and prosperity, and increase in population and wealth—if you should adopt any policy that would cut off the prospect of renewed Indian wars upon their borders. Such is human nature. I do not say that I find fault with human nature; but where there is no adequate and stern government in such cases, its tendencies will always preponderate. Possibly, if I were there, I might gloat over the prospect of the country in the way that many gentlemen do there; I do not say that I would, but it is not improbable. We are the creatures of the circumstances by which we find ourselves surrounded, in a case of that sort.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi has spoken of a difficulty between the Hudson Bay Company's traders and some of the Indians on the Red River of the North. I have heard no exposition of that, and I do not know how it is in fact; but my experience—as the honorable Senator has alluded a little to that familiarity which I ought to have with some of these subjects, if I have it not—has been such on these questions here, and my observation has been such, that I do not adopt every piece of information I hear on subjects of that sort as true. I have been rendered suspicious; and I doubt whether there is any particle of foundation for that rumor. What is the reason I doubt it? I found an effort made last year to establish a fort there; we were asked to vote some fifty thousand dollars for the construction of a fort on the Red River of the North, on the ground that it was a very fine territory, and very desirable for settlement; that some of our western pioneers had already penetrated into it; that it was exposed to sudden attacks, not only of Indians from our own border, but from the Canada border; and I am not sure that my opposition to it did not contribute somewhat to its defeat. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] came also in aid of me on that point. The proposition then was to establish a fort there. It was voted down; but there will be a similar proposition offered at this session. It will be said that we have not got land enough open; that we have not enough new Territories open; we have not enough new States forming in embryo, and particularly in the Northwest; that we have not got free States enough. I will say to my friend before me, [Mr. KING,] I am sure there will be a proposition to establish a fort on that Red River of the North. I have not the slightest confidence in the truth of this report that there are to be any Indian difficulties there, though it may be used as an argument for that measure.

But, sir, I am wandering somewhat from the subject. It would require half a day for me to state the results of my experience and observation and knowledge of the state of things as they existed some years ago with reference to matters of this kind. From my knowledge of the causes existing at the seat of Government, and on the frontiers, particularly with regard to the state of affairs between the traders and the Indians, I am inclined to believe that a war can be had whenever it becomes expedient to the most influential and powerful individuals on the border, who have political influence at Washington to bring it on.

All this, however, is rather apart from the subject on which I rose to speak. I meant to say that a country with such a very extensive frontier as ours, exposed, at so many various points, to sudden internal outbreaks, and external attacks, with such a vast Indian frontier—I need not enumerate all the causes—needed a larger army than we have at this time; but, before providing for any increase, I think we can afford to wait until we see what is to be the condition of our finances, especially as there is no particular demand for the Mormon war, as was stated yesterday, and pretty well exhibited. I think we may wait a year or two before we add to the expenditure of the Government eight or ten or twelve million dollars, as the case may be, which will result from the adoption of this bill.

I asked what was the ordinary average actual strength of the Army, under the present authorized establishment, in order to show that perhaps twenty thousand of an effective average sufficient force was not too much for this great country, with all our exposed points. I should have asked the honorable Senator from Mississippi for further information on this point, but for the fact that he insists that I ought to be so familiar with these subjects as not to be called upon to ask him for additional information. I once knew, according to the number of fortifications and our internal posts, how many men it required really to keep our fortifications in a proper condition, to prevent dilapidation where that goes on, and how many men were required to prevent a sudden surprise from any quarter. I formerly had some knowledge of an average estimate or calculation that was formed as to the number of troops that were required to preserve them from dilapidation, keep them clean, keep them from the decay that takes place when there is neglect of such service, and prevent them from sudden surprises. I think now that we ought to have some estimates from the War Department of the number of troops that will be required to man these different posts and fortifications to an extent to answer these objects and purposes. We have had none such. The honorable Secretary of War, I suppose, would have stated it, if his attention had been called to it.

Then I asked for information in regard to the probable average number of the Army. It has been a great deal below the present point, as I find by the statement of the Senator from Mississippi. I had supposed, according to the experience of the last fifteen or eighteen years, that out of eighteen thousand in the Army, some twelve or fourteen thousand would be about the average effective strength of the Army. He states—and I am glad to hear it—that it is greater now; and therefore I feel greater assurance in the propriety of at present rejecting this proposition to add to the standing Army.

Now, sir, with regard to the Mormon war. I do not care about logging in that question here. The only point in reference to it that attracted my attention particularly, was that this increase seemed yesterday not to be regarded as necessary for that purpose. It struck me on reflection, also, that we could not possibly, after the period when this bill shall pass both Houses of Congress, raise any considerable portion of this additional force before they would be needed, if they were to start over the plains to take the advantage of the first springing grasses. It struck me, also, that the War Department has men enough at its command, if it has fifteen thousand effective troops, notwithstanding all this array of difficulties, and the warlike disposition of the Indians on the frontier of Texas, and elsewhere, at all events to add adequately to the force now under Colonel Johnston in the mountains.

With regard to these Mormons, something has been said as to the policy and expediency of suppressing them right away, making no question as to whether they are in a condition to, author ize these military preparations on the part of the United States; whether it is expedient, whether it is a wise policy to send such a military force, with the instructions they are understood to have with reference to carrying on the war, unless the Mormons submit. I do not propose to enter into that subject. If the present state of things were retrieved, I should like to speak somewhat at large on that subject; but we have that force already in the Rocky Mountains; we have undertaken to subdue or suppress the Mormons by military force. I never doubted, when the Mormons were permitted to settle there as a separate people, that a day like this would come, sooner or later. I believed it would come; I did not much doubt that it must come. In 1830, when that people were organized into a separate Territory, called the Territory of Utah, I thought I foresaw these difficulties; I gave my voice against it, and explained my reasons briefly, and I even had the hardihood to vote against that part of the omnibus bill which attained such notoriety at that time. Another honorable Senator belonging to the same party organization at that time, whom I do not now see, [Mr. PEARCE,] and myself were the only two who voted against it. It was thought a most strange and extraordinary vote. My opinion always has been that they ought not to have been incorporated into a separate territorial organization, but combined with a sufficient extent of territory settled by people of different religious opinions from their own, which would be likely, however, to preserve the preponderance or control of them; or else they ought to be told at once that they were only to remain at sufferance; that we would attempt to organize no government for them, but leave them alone untouched, until time, their own reflection, and experience, should bring them to a knowledge of the infatuation under which they were acting, when they might either disband or disperse to different parts of the United States, where they would not be arranged in any large or effective power, or leave our country altogether.

That was my opinion then; and even now, from any knowledge that has come to my ears of the facts of the case, I have not seen the necessity of sending a military force there. It may be, however, that there is a necessity for it. I do not mean to find fault with it, for I have not a sufficient knowledge of the facts. I should have preferred that we had negotiated farther with them. I should have preferred that we had taken the step of repealing the territorial organization, and have nothing to do with them, provided we could stipulate with them that they should permit our caravans of emigrants, or troops, or what not, that we should find it expedient to send to California, to pass through their country unmolested. If they would do this, I should be willing to let them remain unmolested on our part, and govern themselves according to their own views of right and propriety.

I think the Government of the United States is under some obligation to be lenient in its policy towards these people. Why did you give them this Territory? Why suffer them by such a solemn act on your part, to make settlement in this region, when it was known to be likely from the character of the people and their peculiar religious opinions, that there would be no settlements of a different description in their neighborhood to interrupt them? You held out this encouragement to them, that they would be protected by your Government in the enjoyment of their peculiar opinions and institutions, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. These people are likely to have been greatly misled by the doctrines which have been prevalent in this country for the last two or three years, supported in high places, proclaimed by the highest authorities in our land—the doctrine that any people, by the inherent right of self-government, can do as they please in a Territory. I do not wish to go into any sectional or party question; I am only speaking of the probable effect of these doctrines on such a people as the Mormons in Utah. After they had a territorial organization provided for them, they had a right to conclude that there was a new era of principle inaugurated in the Government of the United States, which would allow them to rest undisturbed forever by any foreign influences in regard to their peculiar institutions and opinions, and give them a right to regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way and at their own discretion. Was it not likely that that doctrine would find its way to their ears, many of them being very shrewd and acute men? Was it not likely that they would catch up the cry, and say, "whatever might have been our fears when we were permitted to make our first settlement, here the Government of the United States has now adopted in regard to the Territories a principle of policy which guarantees to us forever the right to the indulgence of our peculiar opinions, and we are located in the fastnesses of the Rocky Mountains, so that it is not likely we shall ever be intruded upon by the settlement of persons of a religion different from our own; here then, in perfect safety and freedom we can expand ourselves, enjoy our own principles of religion, and whatever indulgence of any kind may belong to it, maintain our own faith uninterrupted by any nation of the earth; now that the United States have avowed principles that give us these privileges, they are obliged to concede them to us?" I do not know how far these doctrines may have been propagated among them so as to create a feeling or disposition in favor of throwing off whatever vestige of the authority of the Government of the United States might be found among them—for example, the Governor, the secretary, and the judges appointed by the authority of the United States. I will not stop to suggest the inquiry whether that perfect freedom of popular sovereignty which we announced here, might not, in the minds of such people as these, imaginative, excitable, having a strong interest to adopt such a conclusion, lead them to suppose that to have a Governor sent to rule over them as a chief magistrate, judges appointed by the President to settle the controversies between them, and all that machinery belonging to another Government, was not consistent with the principle that they had a right to govern themselves, and regulate their institutions in their own way, at least while they were a Territory.

I now only express the sentiment that I should have been glad if some other steps had been taken to propitiate these people—such as withdrawing our Government from them, stipulating that while they retained the territorial form of government, (and with my vote they should never have any other form,) they should continue there only on condition that they allowed the peaceful passage of our emigrants, of our caravans, of whatever description, cattle, household furniture, or what not, free from molestation. If they did this, they might be permitted to remain forever, so far as I cared.

Now, sir, I am not so bloody-minded as my friend from New York [Mr. Seward] seemed to be yesterday, in relation to the Mormons. I think some indulgence is due to them, particularly from my honorable friend; for what is the foundation of the difficulty between them and the United States at this moment? They are the votaries of a "higher law" than our Constitution or the laws of the United States, and they are honest too. There may be men among them, as there are in our own country, who avail themselves of the infatuation of a number of followers, to give them strength to secure themselves office and emolument, and all the advantages which arise from the position in which they may be placed; but is there the slightest doubt that the great mass of these Mormons are really thoroughly honest in their convictions? Has not that feature in their institutions which is denounced as sensual, existed from the foundation of the world, in the nations of the earliest civilization of which we have any knowledge? Does it not exist in India and in Turkey at this day, and we may say in all the Oriental nations? There is a religious fanaticism. They do not consider themselves bound by any obligations to the municipal and constitutional law of the country. They are literally and honestly the supporters of a higher law. They are religious fanatics. My honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. Stuart] is often very acute and ingenious in his discriminations here, and I should like to know from him—I will not appeal to any other gentleman—if he can discriminate between that species of fanaticism and infatuation which controls the actions of the Mormon settlers from that which controls a portion of our brethren at the North? I do not allude to the anti-slavery extension gentlemen, but to the Abolition party proper, which my friends around me here are rather obliged to sympathize with, because it brings them strength. How can you distinguish the fanaticism of the Mormons from that of a portion of the northern people, founded on that idea which disregards the obligation of municipal or organic law in political society? I have never opposed this class of people where I believed them to be honest, and to be acting under the convictions of their own conscience. I consider them as having been misled; as throwing aside everything practical, and pursuing one idea, and that alone in respect to these questions. Just such is the state of the Mormons. I do not mean to apologize for them or their institutions, especially not for that portion of those institutions which has rendered them so obnoxious to the people of the United States; but it belongs to the period of the Bible, the period of the early civilization of the world; and it exists now in Turkey, within the limits of Europe, with all its boasted light and civilization.

Why, then, should we wish to exterminate the Mormons and drive them out mercilessly? If their women may be considered as not entitled to our sympathy, what do you say as to their children. Are they to be driven into the gorges of the mountains to perish in the snows, or by starvation upon the plains? Are they to be driven out to seek new climes and new homes? Where will they go? Sir, I know of no sect of men, no class of men in the world, however they may differ with me in sentiment or doctrine, even upon questions that I regard as vital, whom I would pursue with such relentless and indiscriminate vengeance. I have great confidence in the skill of Colonel Johnston. If he is the brave man that he is represented to be, I have great confidence in his merciful feelings and disposition, and I am sure that he will not use the sword to a greater extent than he may find necessary. I have great confidence, too, in the discretion, judgment, and humanity of Colonel Cumming, who has been made Governor of Utah. If they were other men than they are, or if their positions were filled by some men even of high character, that I know, and I had the power to thwart the expedition by any course which I might take, consistent with the safety of the officers and men, I would do it before I would risk their indiscretions on that, I will not say imbecile people, but at least they are a mere handful. They cannot war upon us on equal terms of advantage in any respect. They can only resist us by retreating into the gorges of the mountains, putting their women and children in caves during the winter and summer. Notwithstanding what is alleged to be their numbers, I think this is the only mode in which they can carry on any warfare against us. They may, as bandits, range the mountains, annoying us, cutting off the supplies for our troops, harassing our troops in every way, but we know that they have not sufficient force to meet them on an open battle-field.

I did not intend, however, to go into these considerations, and I shall not extend my remarks further. I believe there is no necessity for this increase of the Army at the present time. I acknowledge that, in my opinion, an army of some twenty thousand effective men at all times would not be too great a force with the present limits and expanded territories and dominion of this Republic; but I prefer to postpone any such enlargement until another session, when we can see what is likely to be the state of our finances, and when we may learn whether the trade and business of the country have had a chance to revive from their prostrate and paralyzed condition. The proposed increase of the Army, voted in any shape, will involve an additional expenditure of at least five million dollars; and it may, according to circumstances, involve an additional annual expense of twelve million dollars. I think we had better postpone it until we see the effect of the present condition of the country on the finances. I feel confident that Colonel Johnston and his command are in no present danger, and that we have a full and adequate force to send to his relief. Under these circumstances, I am inclined not only to vote for striking out the first section of the bill, but to go against the whole bill.

Mr. IVERSON. Mr. President, as I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs that reported this bill, and gave my support to the measure in committee, as I shall in this body, I beg leave very briefly to state the reasons which commend it to my mind.

When the question was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, of course the first point to be determined was, whether there was a necessity or propriety for an increase of the Army. The committee came to the conclusion, by a large majority, that there was not only a propriety but a necessity for an increase of the regular force. I agreed with the committee, and that is my opinion now. Having come to the conclusion that an increase of the regular force was necessary, the next and most important question was, in what way that increase should be made? The President and Secretary of War have recommended an increase by the addition of five regiments. Although the President, in his annual message, called for only four regiments, the Secretary of War, in his report, asked for five, and it is to be presumed that it was only an inadvertence on the part of the Executive that five regiments were not asked for by the Government.

The plan suggested by the Committee on Military Affairs, as contradistinguished from the increase by way of additional regiments, struck my view as the most appropriate one, for several reasons. The first is, that if you increase the force by regiments, by adding four or five new regiments to the Army, to answer present emergencies, or to accomplish present purposes, when you desire to diminish or reduce the force, it will be next to impossible ever to reduce a force which contains so many officers. You may get rid of the rank and file at your pleasure; you may at any time reduce the Army by the dismissal of privates; but it is with the greatest difficulty in the world—it is next to impossible, to reduce regiments that contain officers, especially field officers. Although this increase is at present demanded, in my judgment, by the exigencies of the service, yet the time may come, and I trust it will come, when this largely increased force will not be necessary, and it may be, in the wisdom of Congress, thought proper to reduce it. If they should ever reduce it, it could be done by cutting down the rank and file which it is proposed by this bill to add to the Army; but we might find it very difficult to get rid of the additional regiments, if they were incorporated into the regular force. That is one reason why I prefer the plan suggested by the committee to that which has been recommended by the Executive.

Of course, I was controlled, to some extent, also, by the difference in the expense of the two plans. The increase by regiments, if five were granted, would add one hundred and fifty company officers—fifty captains and one hundred lieutenants—besides the field officers. Of course, that would be a very large increase in the expense of the regiments, to say nothing of the number of the rank and file. The plan suggested by the Committee on Military Affairs looks only to the addition of thirty companies, and to the creation only of ninety additional officers, and they are officers of inferior grade—captains and lieutenants. Of course, this is the least expensive mode of increasing the Army, if it is to be increased at all.

These, together with other reasons which I shall not detain the Senate by adverting to, influence my mind to adopt the plan suggested of adding thirty companies to the existing regiments, instead of increasing the Army by the addition of whole regiments.

There is another reason which has been suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the committee. It is, that twelve companies is a more convenient organization of a regiment than ten. At present, the four artillery regiments have twelve companies, but the infantry regiments and the mounted troops have but ten companies to each regiment. Having four field officers, a colonel, a lieutenant colonel, and two majors, if we have twelve companies, the regiment is then divided into three battalions of four companies each; one commanded by the lieutenant colonel, and one by each major; the colonel being the superintendent and commander of the whole. This is a more convenient arrangement, therefore, and it is one which seems to me to be entirely appropriate. It is a better organization than the one which gives only ten companies to a regiment. This, I understand, is the French organization. Their regiments are divided into twelve companies and three battalions, and there is probably no nation upon earth which has had as much experience, and arrived at so much information and usefulness in relation to the organization of the military, as the French. I believe that that is the organization, also, of the English regiments, though I cannot confidently speak as to that point; but I am confidently informed that such is the organization of the French regiments; each regiment being divided into three battalions, each battalion having so many companies. This plan has been recommended by many Army officers with whom I have conversed, and they universally say that it is the best organization which can possibly be adopted.

But, sir, the great question comes at last: whether there should be any increase in the regular force or not. I believe there ought to be an increase in the regular force; and so believing, I am satisfied that the mode suggested to the Senate in this bill by the committee, is the best which can be adopted. I believe there ought to be an increase in the regular force, not only to answer the present exigencies of the service, but for permanent employment hereafter. The present exigency is the Utah war. It is not a war in the technical sense of the term; it is a rebellion on the part of the Mormon people, which it becomes necessary and proper on the part of the Government of the United States to crush.

I ask Senators if this rebellion is to be permitted to go unpunished? if this insurrection in Utah is to be permitted to exist? if the laws and Government of this country are to be put at defiance? I ask, are gentlemen prepared to admit this imperium in imperio to exist which the people of Utah have set up for themselves? I am one of those who believe that as long as we have a Government, the laws of that Government should be enforced in every quarter of the country. I believe that the peace, good order, and dignity of the Government should be enforced and vindicated upon all occasions. I am one of those who believe that this rebellion, or insurrection, or whatever else you may term it, in Utah, should be crushed; and crushed effectually, if it shall be necessary to sacrifice every individual in that country.

What is the condition of the Mormon war? What is the condition of the Mormon country? What force will it be necessary to send against them in order to effect this important object? I consider that the Mormon force is by no means one to be slighted. We have authentic information, such as I think every Senator will believe, that a force can be mustered into service in Utah under the command of Brigham Young, to the extent at least of four or five thousand efficient troops. We are informed, I think, by Captain Van Vliet, who was sent into that country for the purpose of spying out the land, that Brigham Young has an organized, well-equipped force of not less than four or five thousand men. We are informed upon reliable authority—upon authority on which I rely at least—that he has formed alliances with neighboring Indian tribes, and that those Indians, incensed as they are against the people of the United States, and ready to strike a blow whenever they have an opportunity to do it, will readily join Brigham Young in his operations against the United States. Combine these two elements together, and I think the opposition power of Mormonism is by no means to be despised by this Government. Four or five thousand effective troops, well armed and equipped as we understand they are, fighting on their own soil, with a full knowledge of all the passways and the topography of the country, fighting for their hearthstones, and as they believe fighting for their religion, infuriated by their fanaticism, is not a force that is to be despised by this Government. With all the advantages which they will possess of a full knowledge of the country, standing behind the defiles and gorges of the mountains, I think it will require a large force to put them down.

What is the force that has been sent against them? We are told that there are only four or five regiments, the effective extent of which cannot exceed two thousand men. The probability is that the effective force of the army under Colonel Johnston, now in the mountains of Utah, does not exceed fifteen hundred men. That has been reinforced to some extent by a few teamsters and army-followers, and persons who are engaged in the contractor's service, and we understand that three or four or half a dozen companies have been united with him. How many can Colonel Johnston command in the spring? How many is he likely to have to march into Utah, against this large, powerful, and effective force of Mormons? Not more than two thousand, at the utmost extent, and that little force must be diminished before the campaign can open; death must make its mark in the ranks of our soldiers.

How far has the Government in its power, and to what extent can it reinforce the army in Utah? The Commanding General, we see, has already ordered two regiments and two companies to rendezvous at Fort Leavenworth, to join the expedition in the spring. What force is that? The first regiment of cavalry, one regiment of infantry and two companies of artillery. How many will be embraced in that number? With the fullest number of companies, and the fullest number of men in each company, none of these regiments can exceed seven hundred men. Then the force which is detailed to reinforce the army in Utah, cannot exceed fifteen hundred men, which, added to the fifteen hundred or two thousand already in the field, will make a force of three thousand, or three thousand five hundred men. Is that sufficient to overcome the formidable array of power which the Mormons are able to bring into the field? I do not believe it is sufficient.

From what source can the Government of the United States draw other troops, to add to those who are now detailed for the service in Utah? You have one hundred and ninety-eight companies in your whole Army. You have forty-eight companies in your four regiments of artillery; you have one hundred companies in your ten regiments of artillery, and you have fifty companies of mounted troops—in all one hundred and ninety-eight companies. At this moment, out of this force of one hundred and ninety-eight companies, there are one hundred and fifty-eight companies in the field and stationed at distant frontier posts, leaving only thirteen companies to garrison your interior fortifications and your whole extended Atlantic coast. From what quarter are you to draw any reinforcements to the army in Utah? Will you take them from Florida? We have a war now in progress in Florida with a hostile band of savages, who are exceedingly infuriated against the people of that country, and are seizing every opportunity to strike a blow. Will you withdraw the regular troops from Florida to send them to Utah? If you do that, you must expose the people of Florida to the scalping knife and tomahawk of the savage, or you must supply the deficiency by a volunteer force in Florida. Even now such is the smallness of the Army, that you have been compelled to employ a volunteer force in Florida; and if you take away the regulars who are there, and send them to join the Utah army, you must add to that volunteer force for the protection of the people of Florida. Are you prepared to employ volunteers? Of course they are always infinitely more expensive, and never as efficient as regulars.

Will you withdraw your regular troops from Texas? There you have the second regiment of cavalry, and one regiment of infantry. Can you withdraw any part of that force from the frontier of Texas, when you consider the exposed character of that frontier, and leave the people of Texas to the marauding incursions of hostile bands of Indians? I do not think that force can with safety be withdrawn. Can you take any troops from New Mexico? Are the people of New Mexico to be exposed to the surrounding savages who are so hostile to the white people, and who are disposed at all times to strike whenever they find the opportunity to do so with impunity? We know what is the character of the Navajo and Apache Indian, and other hostile warlike tribes that surround New Mexico. Are you prepared to allow the troops you have in New Mexico for the protection of the people there to be withdrawn to swell the army in Utah? I think not.

Then as to the Pacific coast, how can you withdraw any men from that section? You have to guard the frontier settlements of Oregon and Washington Territories, and the troops which you have there are not even sufficient to do this. The history of the last two or three years demonstrates the fact, that in order to quell the hostile Indians on the frontiers of that country, a much larger force than you have been able to send there has been requisite and necessary.

Then, looking at the position of your Army in every section of the Union, there is not a single point from which you can withdraw additional force from the regular Army to join the army in Utah. The whole available force which could be spared from the exigencies and necessities of the service in other quarters, has already been called into the field by the commanding general; and what is it? The contemptible force of three thousand or four thousand men. If, from considerations of economy, or any other considerations, the army in Utah shall not be properly reinforced by the time the campaign opens in the spring, and that army shall be cut up or destroyed by the Mormons, I ask what excuse gentlemen can present for voting against supplies and additional reinforcements? Is that gallant army to be exposed to the danger and risk of that campaign because it may cost a few million dollars to reinforce them? Is money to be put in the scale against blood? God forbid that it should! If it was necessary to send ten thousand troops to Utah, and expend $1,000,000 to crush this rebellion, I would expend it before I would suffer one hundred of your people to be sacrificed by the infuriated Mormons. What excuse could gentlemen present if any disaster should occur to this army in Utah? The miserable consideration that it may cost a few million dollars! Sir, we must reinforce this army to such an extent that they shall be safe in their operations, either by the increase of the regular force, or by calling out volunteers; and we all know the expense to which the call of volunteers always leads, and the danger to which it may give rise.

I am opposed to the use of volunteers in this Utah war. The very consideration of humanity is enough to prevent the calling out of the volunteer force. Send volunteers to Utah to suppress this insurrection! Why, sir, you know that volunteers, when they are once set in motion, are unrestrained by any order. Send volunteers to Utah, and every man, woman, and child in that Territory will be exposed to the danger of sacrifice. No, sir; let us send disciplined troops; let us send the regular Army; let us send troops who are disinterested, who are subject to the control of their officers, and will be regulated and directed by the dictates of humanity.

In my opinion, Mr. President, it is essential that the army in Utah should be reinforced. I do not think it can be reinforced without an addition to the regular Army, such as is proposed in this bill. This is the cheapest and the quickest way of obtaining recruits sufficient to throw a force into Utah which, under the circumstances of the case, may become necessary to crush the rebellion that exists in that country.

But if the Utah war were out of the question, if that were suppressed, I consider that still there is an exigency for the increase of your Army for permanent and future employment. Look at your extended country; look at the wide extent of your frontiers; look at the necessity for the protection of your people. You have a line of sea-coast extending for more than two thousand miles on the Atlantic, every city of which has a fortification, more or less; and those fortifications, and the arsenals and public stores, must be protected and taken care of by your troops. There is a demand for a portion of your Army at least. In Florida, in Texas, in New Mexico, in Arizona, in Washington, in California, in Oregon, the wide extent of your frontier requires a very large increase of the Army, to give protection to the inhabitants, whom, by your laws and policy, you have induced to emigrate to, and settle in, those regions.

Besides this, there are your emigrant routes, on which you have expended millions of dollars for the use of the people going from your Atlantic to your Pacific possessions. Are not the wagon-roads that you have prepared, inviting emigrants, to be protected? Is there to be no protection given to your emigrants who go from this part of the country to the Pacific coast? You have recently established an overland mail route across the continent. Is no protection to be given by the establishment of a line of military posts along that route, to the mails which you send, to the servants that drive them, and to the passengers that go in those coaches and wagons? Even this is a requisite which calls loudly on the Government for the establishment of military posts, and the stationing of troops, along the line of emigration.

When you take into consideration all these various demands of the Government, I think the army which you have in the field at present is by no means commensurate with the demands of the Government. Let us look at the present condition of the Army, and see what it would be with the proposed increase which this bill establishes. I think when the analysis is made, much of the apprehension which gentlemen have about the danger of a large standing Army must be dissipated. You have now one hundred and ninety-eight companies, and we propose to add thirty companies—making two hundred and twenty-eight. That is all the increase. To be sure there is some small increase in the number of officers—ninety company officers—and a small increase of the medical staff, as proposed, but that is all. There may be a few dozen musicians and non-commissioned officers attached, but that is a very immaterial point. We shall then have two hundred and twenty-eight companies, which at the ultimate amount of ninety-six, the maximum number authorized by this bill, would give your Army twenty-one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight men. That would be the entire force, with every company filled up to ninety-six men. But, sir, any one who is familiar with the condition of the Army, must know that there never are more than two thirds of the aggregate number in the companies on the average. During the Mexican war, when the maximum number was one hundred men, there never was a battle fought by the American troops in which there were more than thirty-seven men in each company who went into an engagement. That, I understand, is well ascertained to have been about the average number that went into all the engagements with the Mexicans. When the maximum was one hundred, the average number of available men in the company was only thirty-seven; and now with a maximum of ninety-six, how many do you suppose these companies will always have? They will never have more than two thirds of that number.

Let me give you an instance to show how this operates: The first regiment of cavalry was organized about two years ago. Their headquarters were at Leavenworth. The number of companies was filled up by the recruiting officers to the maximum allowed by law, and they were sent to their headquarters. In less than twelve months, over four hundred of them had deserted; more than one half of the whole regiment had deserted, and the companies were reduced to less than one half the maximum. That is the condition of a great many of the regiments. From casualties of this sort, either desertion, or death, or other cause, the companies never contain, on an average, more than two thirds of the maximum number authorized by law.

Now, let me suppose that the companies will contain, ordinarily and generally, two thirds of the maximum number, making sixty-two. If the two hundred and twenty-eight companies have sixty-two in each, they would only amount to fourteen thousand one hundred and thirty-six men. Is that a large standing army to be dreaded? Is that too much of a military force to be used in this wide extent of country, where so many demands are made on the Government for protection? Even in Texas, at the present time, when you have two regiments of regular troops stationed there, the Legislature has called, by a formal application, on the Congress of the United States to authorize that State to raise a regiment of volunteers for the protection of their frontier people. That application has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and sent to the War Department for its opinion on its propriety. Even now, in the present condition of things, the people of Texas are calling for additional protection from the Government, and so they call everywhere.

But if this force be reduced to the peace establishment of fifty-two after the exigency of the Mormon difficulty is out of the way, with fifty-two men in each company, that being the regulation according to the peace establishment, the Army would consist of only eleven thousand eight hundred and fifty-six men. I do not, of course, include the officers; I speak only of the rank and file. That is the mighty army which has created so much apprehension in the minds of gentlemen as to endanger public liberty—eleven thousand eight hundred and fifty-six men!

These are my opinions, Mr. President, in relation to the necessity of an increased force. But it has been objected by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that the Army ought not to be increased, and nothing should be added to it, no matter in what circumstances the country may find itself, because the expenses of the Army are of such an enormous character. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] yesterday told us that some years ago the expense of a soldier was so much, and that now it is one thousand or fifteen hundred dollars a year. That reminds me very much of an argument which I heard used by the Whigs in 1840, when they were objecting to Mr. Van Buren's reelection. They told the people then that in former times the expenses of the Government did not exceed ten or twelve million of dollars a year; but now, under Mr. Van Buren, it was spending $27,000,000. What a contrast! How extravagant was Mr. Van Buren's administration! It had spent $27,000,000, when the Government had, in former years, got along with at least one third of the amount! Because the expenses of the Army twenty years ago were $5,000,000 a year, the Senator from New Hampshire predicates the argument that the expenses of the Army now ought not to be fifteen or twenty million dollars! Does not the gentleman understand that this country is advancing in population, advancing in area, advancing in everything which requires expense? Is it an argument against the existence of an Army now which the country demands and requires to be kept in the field, that fifteen or twenty million dollars are expended annually when ten, or fifteen, or twenty years ago an Army of four or five thousand men was all that was necessary, and their expense was much smaller? To say nothing of the increased number of your Army, the expense of everything has increased which the exigencies of the country demands. The expense of maintaining the Army is much greater per man than it was fifteen or twenty years ago.

Upon what principle did the Senator from New Hampshire vote at the last session to increase his own pay and mine to $3,000 a year, instead of eight dollars a day which had been established in 1817? In 1817, the expense of living in the city of Washington was not more than one dollar and twenty-five cents a day. I remember when I was here, in 1830, I stopped at Brown's hotel, which was as good then as it is now, and paid one dollar and twenty-five cents a day; but now you cannot stay there for less than two dollars and fifty cents a day. Such has been the increase everywhere all over the United States in the expense of maintaining human life—the expense of transportation, the expense of provision, the expense of everything which is attendant on the operations of the Army in all its various branches. Is it an argument in favor of disbanding the Army, that it costs more than it did some years ago? I ask the Senator to take back his vote which was based on the principle that the expenses of members of Congress have so accumulated in this city that it became necessary to increase our pay, if he makes that argument applicable to the expenses of the Army.

But the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Foster] yesterday objected to the increase of the Army, and, indeed, to the very existence of the Army, because, he said, Indian difficulties and wars had been created by the Army of the United States, and not by the frontier settlers. He says that, wherever you send a body of troops and make a fortification or post in the Indian country, difficulties occur, and it is the presence of the troops that produces the difficulty. I ask that Senator to point out the instance in which troops of the United States have been sent in advance of the settlements of the people. I deny it. I say that, in no instance, has the Government ever established a fortification in the Indian country in advance of the settlements your people have made. These troops are sent, and these military posts are established after the settlements are made, and for the protection of the settlements. Is it not right that that should be done? What doctrine is it that which would leave your frontier settlements open to the incursion of hostile savages? It is true, posts have been established on the emigrant route where there are no settlements, but the reason is the same. They are intended for the protection of your emigrants who go from this part of the country to the Pacific coast. There is no instance in the history of our military operations in which the Government has established military posts, and sent your troops into Indian nations where we have no white settlement to protect.

The Senator is mistaken as to the operation of these causes. The difficulty with the Indians has been that your people are ever ready to seize upon vacant land. Their peculiar idiosyncrasy is to seize upon lands which do not belong to them, and they are always like the seas, not content with what they have, but would stretch their arms to grasp in all the shore. It is this lawless sort of emigration which characterizes the people of the northern States more than that section from which I come, that has produced all these difficulties with the Indians, and Indian wars. The Government has only used the Army of the United States in the establishment of posts for the protection of the emigrants who have gone into these new countries; and in that the Government has done right.

But, sir, it is objected by the Senator from New Hampshire, and others on the other side of the Chamber, that this increase must not be made; indeed they argue as if the Army ought to be disbanded, because they say a portion of the Army has been used in Kansas to illustrate popular sovereignty. A portion of the Army has been used in Kansas; and therefore, because it has been used in Kansas to accomplish particular ends, the Army ought not to be increased, but ought to be disbanded! Yes, sir, a portion of the Army has been used in Kansas; but for what purpose? According to my reading of the circumstances and history of the times, that Army has been employed for the purpose of keeping the peace in Kansas. It has been put there, not to control popular sentiment, not to control the elections of the people, not to put down popular sovereignty, not to set up the minority against the majority of the people; but it has been put there for the purpose of keeping the peace, of executing the laws—laws which were recognized by every branch of this Government as valid and constitutional. The use of the Army has been a matter of necessity in Kansas. It was not only necessary, but proper, that troops should be employed there for the purpose of protecting the people in the enjoyment of their rights.

Gentlemen seem to express regret that any portion of the troops of the United States were employed in Kansas. Sir, they are not singular in their regrets. I too regret that there ever was a solitary soldier sent into Kansas. If it had not been that the Army of the United States was sent to Kansas, the question which has agitated the public mind and distracted the country would have been long since settled. If it had not been for the interposition of the troops in Kansas, there would not to-day have been an Abolitionist to desecrate and disgrace the soil of Kansas; no, sir, not one of them would have been left to tell the story of his existence. If it had not been for the troops in Kansas and the interference of the Governor of that Territory with the troops as a posse comitatus, Lawrence, that sink of folly, filth, and falsehood, would long since have been razed to the ground, and there would not have been a stone left to tell the story of its existence. Its history would have been written in two words—"Lawrence was."

Sir, the troops in Kansas have been kept there for the purpose of preserving the order, peace, and dignity of society and of the Government. That is the object for which the troops have been employed and none other. They, it is true, have kept down the marauding cut-throat bands of Jim Lane—a set of Abolitionists, a band of lawless ruffians. Talk of Missouri border-ruffians! But if there be a band of ruffians more despicable than any others on the face of the wide earth, in my estimation, it was the band of Jim Lane and his followers. Why, sir, if you could rake the infernal regions from the center to the circumference and from the surface to the bottom, you could not fish up such a mass of infamous corruption as exists in some portions of Kansas. Troops have been necessarily employed there for the purpose of suppressing violations of the law.

It was the duty of the President to vindicate the laws. It was his sworn duty to execute the laws in Kansas. It was his constitutional obligation to keep the peace, if he could do it by the employment of troops. He has done nothing more than his duty. I vindicate his motives. I approve what he has done. I believe the peace in Kansas has been preserved by the employment of troops there, and I am satisfied that, but for the presence of the troops employed by the President in Kansas, the soil of Kansas would have been drenched with the blood of its people, and the civil war commenced there would, in all probability, have extended beyond its borders, and involved this Union in destruction. That is my opinion, and I will say here, what may fall, perhaps, with some jarring on the tender sensibilities of some gentlemen, that if these two results had happened, if every Abolitionist had been driven out of Kansas, and this Union, by the operation of that cause, had been dissolved, I should not have much regretted the first, nor shed many tears over the latter.

But, Mr. President, Senators object to the increase of the Army because they say it has been used here, in the city of Washington, to control and regulate elections. The Army was not used, it was a portion of the marine corps, and it has been used in Boston to enforce the fugitive slave law. The Army is to be disbanded because the marine corps has been employed by the President upon a certain exigency, to put down a lawless mob in the streets of Washington—a mob instigated and incited by a set of ruffians from a neighboring city, who came here to control the elections of the people of this place! A portion of the Army has been used in Boston to execute the fugitive slave law, to vindicate the rights of parties under the Constitution of your country, and therefore the Army is a dangerous institution and is to be put down!

I wonder, sir, that among the instances which the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber brought against the use of the Army, they did not recur to one which has not long since passed, and is familiar, probably, to all those who hear me. I wonder that the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from Maine, and others, did not recur to the Dorrite troubles in Rhode Island. If I understand the history of that transaction, the people of Rhode Island, vindicating the doctrine of popular sovereignty, desired to get rid of an odious government. When I say the people, I mean a majority of the people of Rhode Island. They desired to get rid of an old, arbitrary, despotic government which was grinding them down. They called a convention, formed a constitution, and attempted to put it in operation. The Army of the United States was called into requisition by the existing powers of the General Government, to put down this popular sovereignty in Rhode Island, and it was put down. That was all right, according to the doctrines of gentlemen on the other side. They had no objection to using the Army to put down popular sovereignty in Rhode Island, when that act was to vindicate their particular party; we heard of no objection then to the use of the Army; it was all right then. But when the President calls out a few marines in Washington to put down a lawless mob from a sister city, which attempted to control the elections, that is all wrong, and it amounts to a high crime and misdemeanor in the President, sufficient to authorize the dis-bandment of the Army and marine corps! That is the sort of doctrine which the gentleman suggests as a foundation for an argument against this necessary increase of your Army; but these considerations ought to have no influence, and I trust will have no influence, on the question before the Senate.

It is a matter of no consequence whether the power given to the President over the Army has heretofore been abused or not. It may be abused again; it may have been abused heretofore; but is that an argument why we should not have an Army necessary for the public service? Because the President has abused his power heretofore, and may hereafter do it, is that an argument why you should not increase your Army to such an extent as to protect your people, and to vindicate the laws in Utah and to crush a rebellion that exists in that Territory? I think not.

Apart from all these considerations, if the exigency of the public service, if the demands of your people, if the vindication of the dignity and honor of the Government, if the putting down of a rebellion which exists now, and which puts at defiance your authority—if all these are necessary for the increase of your Army, I say that I am ready to vote for such an increase. I cannot see that it can be done in a more economical or more ready way than that suggested by the bill now before the Senate, and therefore I shall give it my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I did not intend to participate in this debate, and certainly I never expected to be drawn into any discussion upon the affairs of Kansas in connection with a bill for raising additional troops. I am one of those who in addressing the Senate generally go, or attempt to go, directly to the object which I have in view. I heard the Senator from Mississippi yesterday deprecate with great force the introduction into this debate of the Kansas question. When I deprecate the introduction of any topic of discussion into the Senate, and want to suppress it, I generally stop speaking on it. I think that is the most effectual way of stopping it. I thought that was an improper matter to be brought into this debate, any further than to illustrate certain positions which were taken by members on this side of the Chamber, and I do not intend to say anything about it. But, sir, allusion has been made to my own State, and it is that which has called me up. I know the Senator from Georgia meant no sort of reflection upon Rhode Island.

Mr. IVERSON. Not at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. I believe that Senator will hardly disagree with me now about the Dorrit business. That, I believe, was about the first question on which I had to talk when I came into the Senate, and I have not altered my mind about Dorritism from that day to this. I tell the Senator from Georgia that he does not know one of the facts that took place there. The Army of the United States was never called to go into Rhode Island at that time, and did not go there.

Mr. IVERSON. I did not say the Army was employed there. I know the Army did not go there; but a call was made on the Executive, as I understand, and he responded to the call that he was ready to send the troops if they were necessary.

Mr. SIMMONS. I admit there were a great many things done, or attempted to be done, about that time. I have not risen to speak as to what happened here; for I never mean, during the time I may be in the Senate, to refer to the man who was then at the head of the administration of this Government. I do not mean to call his name, or refer to him, unless I am forced to do so in order to explain some fact. I took leave of that man many years ago. What I felt as a little unkind on the part of the Senator from Georgia, was his statement that the authorities of Rhode Island called on this Government to put down the people for attempting to overturn an odious government, an odious tyranny there. If the Senator had known what our government was; if he had read it lately; (for I do not mean to say that he is not well versed in history;) if he had known the character of the institutions under which the people of Rhode Island lived for two centuries, he would not have made that remark about their government. I wish I had here the book of the history of our State, so that I could read to the Senator from Georgia the origin of that government. It would put to shame all these talks about the popular sovereignty that have been introduced here in modern times. Sir, there never was a democracy established on these shores until the people of Rhode Island established one. It is in black and white in the book of history, and if I could have time to go to my lodgings, I would get the book and read it to the gentleman.

Mr. IVERSON. Allow me to put a question to the Senator. Has not that constitution, which he lauds so much, been entirely done away with, and a new constitution formed by the people of Rhode Island?

Mr. SIMMONS. It has been; and our present constitution is not quite so good a one as we had for two hundred years. That is my notion about it, though I helped to make it. The force of public opinion, as it is called, sometimes gets the better of men's judgments. Let me tell the Senator from Georgia that three months before this Dorritism began, I, myself, personally introduced into the Legislature of Rhode Island a resolution providing for the call of a convention to make a new constitution, to alter our old form of government, and make a new one better adapted to the exigencies of the times and the notions of the people about representation.

Why, sir, when I first took my seat in the Senate, my right to a seat was actually disputed by some of these modern sort of Democrats, on the ground that we had not a republican form of government in Rhode Island. I defended my right as well as I could in a speech which I made at that time. I have not seen the speech since; but it is to be found in the National Intelligencer, some time about the 18th of May, 1842. I do not read these speeches over, but I sometimes hear my children read the comments on them, for it gratifies them, not me.

Three months before the first popular meeting which was called in Rhode Island to get up a new constitution, the Legislature of that State passed a resolution calling a regular convention. For fear that constitution would be made so as to take the wind out of the sails of these modern Democrats, they called a mass meeting and roasted an ox, and got pretty well fitted up in other ways—pretty "well to do" in the world. [Laughter.] That may be a good way to make a constitution in these times, but we did not think so in Rhode Island. Mr. Dorrit himself was a member of the legal convention. Here let me say that I have a great respect for his memory—he is now dead. Let me tell the Senator from Georgia that I lost my seat on this floor for the act of taking him out of the State prison; and I have been waiting for a return to this body for ten years, and I intended to stand it ten years longer, if necessary—not by quitting my party, but by beating, while acting with, the same men and the same party I was in when I was defeated. My notion is, that you should act with the men with whom you have acted; stand by your rights; stand by your principles, and the people will come to you if you are not too much in a hurry. I am a patient sort of a man. Perhaps the Senator from Kentucky will recollect a speech which I made in the Senate in executive session some years ago upon a matter connected with our difficulties in Rhode Island, on which my then colleague (as worthy a man as ever lived) and myself disagreed; and I remember the generous proposition he made to me—not to call the yeas and nays after that speech, for fear it would mortify some other person; not me.

Mr. President, I think this reference to Rhode Island was unbecoming—I will not say it was unkind, because I know the Senator from Georgia means no unkindness towards me. So far as our intercourse has gone, he and I have agreed remarkably well. We do not talk about politics, to be sure, but I think we do not disagree very much even about politics; for I venture to say that if I could make a proposition to test the sense of the Senate on the controversy in Rhode Island in 1842, I could get a stronger vote than we have just had against the Administration, in which I certainly voted with regret. I rose simply to illustrate this matter to the Senator from Georgia, so that my right to a seat here should not be called in question now, after having waited so long, and after the struggle I had to keep it the first regular session I was here in 1842. A Senator from Ohio, three or four days in succession, had addressed the President of the Senate to institute an inquiry whether my colleague and myself had any right to a seat on the floor of the Senate, he taking the ground that Rhode Island had not a republican form of government. After he had made about half a dozen speeches on the subject, I got the liberty, through the intervention of an honorable Senator from South Carolina, and an honorable Senator from Alabama, who was, at the presidential election preceding the last, elected to the seat you now occupy, sir, to explain the Rhode Island matter, and see if we could make out any sort of titles to seats here. The explanation I then gave of our rights to seats was this: that we helped to make this Government before his State (Ohio) was born, and that was the title we had. We acted with Georgia in making this Government. I have great respect for the State of Georgia, and she ought to have respect for Rhode Island, and not call in question the institutions under which Rhode Islanders formerly lived; for one of her sons, and a Rhode Island mechanic too, defended Georgia and South Carolina in the great struggle of the Revolution.

The State of Georgia has voted to a distinguished general of Rhode Island a whole island as a generous tribute to his memory and his services in that State. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. EVANS] reminds me that his State voted that general £10,000 for his services. Are they the States which are going to question my right to a seat here, on the ground that Rhode Island had not a republican form of government when those great deeds of valor were done that made this a nation? No, sir. I go behind all these notions about Democracy, and I say we made this Government; we fought for the soil over which its jurisdiction was to extend, and we triumphed upon every battle-field. Rhode Island furnished more officers and more men than any other State of the same number of square miles in this whole country. Whom did the Father of his country refer to as his successor, if Providence should withdraw him from that controversy? The very man to whom Georgia and South Carolina voted this generous tribute as a recognition of his services—a man, let me tell you, sir, who was first in the hearts of his countrymen at that day, excepting only one, and second only to him because he was peerless among men.

I know that the remarks to which I am replying were made in a different spirit and for a different purpose; but for whatever purpose they were made, I cannot consent to sit here and hear the institutions of the State from which I come characterized by epithets so unkind and unjust as were used by the Senator from Georgia. Sir, the State of Rhode Island is almost the only original democratic government on this continent. Almost all the colonies within the limits of the old United States were organized and made bodies corporate under the King of Great Britain, under charters which emanated from the Crown; but in Rhode Island the body-politic was instituted, and declared to be formed by the people themselves. They said that, in the presence of Jehovah, they declared themselves to be a body-politic and corporate, having no reference to the Crown or the Parliament. They said further, that the government which they established was "a democracy, or popular government." And then they explained what a democracy means; and the definition has not been improved upon by time. They say, "it is the power of the body of freemen orderly assembled"—no border ruffianism, but the "people orderly assembled," or the major part of them, to make or constitute just laws by which they will be regulated, and to depute from among themselves such ministers as shall see them faithfully executed between man and man." Another article on which they agreed declared that no man should be held delinquent for any matter of religious belief, so that he did not disturb the public peace. This was as early as 1638; and I should like to know from the Senator from New Hampshire if he can get anything out of the granite rocks of his State quite as far back as that about popular sovereignty? It reads somewhat in this way:

"The 7th day of the first month, 1638.

"We whose names are underwritten, do here solemnly, in the presence of Jehovah, incorporate ourselves into a body politic, and, as He shall help, will submit our persons, lives, and estates unto our Lord Jesus Christ, the King of Kings and Lord of Lords, and to all those perfect and most absolute lawes of His, given us in His Holy Word of truth, to be guided and judged thereby."—Exod. xxiv., 4; 2 Chron., xi., 3; 2 Kings, xi., 17.

After this they went on under a single judge, as of old, for a while, and then elected officers more in conformity with later civil States, and declared these two things:

"It is ordered and unanimously agreed upon, that the Government which this Bodie Politick doth attend unto in this Island, and the Jurisdiction thereof, in favor of our Princes, is a Democracie, or Popular Government; that is to say, It is in the Power of the Body of Freemen orderly Assembled, or the Major part of them, to make or constitute Just Lawes, by which they will be regulated, and to depute from among themselves such Ministers as shall see them faithfully executed between Man and Man.

"It was further ordered, by the authority of this present Courte, that none bee accounted a Delinquent for Doctrine: Provided, it be not directly repugnant to ye Government or Lawes established."

This was the origin of our government. Was it a tyranny? They admitted every man by a regular vote, whom they allowed to have a share in the government; and when he behaved unworthily they disfranchised him by a regular and popular vote, and made a record of it. They had no pannier-basket voting as the Dorrites had in 1842, who went about to collect votes anywhere and everywhere—and the same thing has been practiced in Kansas. In our State they took the muster-roll of a company at the fort, and put it into their list of votes for the people's constitution, just as the Cincinnati directory was used for the same purpose in Kansas. Such voting is not popular sovereignty as we understand it; it is not a fair way to ascertain the will of the people.

I have adverted to the origin of the government of Rhode Island, for the purpose of correcting the impressions of the Senator from Georgia. Although it is only a few years ago since the difficulties there occurred, people seem to have forgotten them. I do not blame them for forgetting them, because they have a great many things to attend to, and platforms are made so frequently that hardly anybody can keep the run of them. If I were going to make a platform, or to advise the making of one for the opposite party, to-day, I would advise them to qualify their doctrine of popular sovereignty, and besides providing that the people should regulate things in their own way, subject to the Constitution of the United States, I would also say: "and provided further, that their institutions should conform to the ordinary proprieties and decencies of civilized society," for that would cover this Utah business. [Laughter.] Platforms certainly want such a qualification; and when you have qualified these party platforms enough, you will have qualified all the popular sovereignty out of them. I do not mean, however, to make a speech about that, it is not worth making a speech about; but I am going to stand by this Rhode Island business. I came here particularly to defend her. She is a little State to look at, but a good one for sound doctrines.

In Rhode Island, for more than one hundred years, they tried free suffrage, and yet it was said we had an odious sort of suffrage in Rhode Island. Afterwards they prescribed a property qualification, and the preamble to the law prescribing it, declared that bribery and fraud had become a scandal, and the property qualification was imposed in order to get rid of it. Looking at the result of the last elections in some of our cities, I desire to know whether it would not be desirable to put a stop to bribery and fraud? Rhode Island did not wish to live under such a scandal. We tried a system of free suffrage for one hundred years, but it became corrupted. Some things grow bad as they grow old, others grow better with age—such as the liquor we have been trying to find out about, in the committee over which the honorable Senator from Georgia presides. [Laughter.] I know I shall get a smile from the Senator from Georgia. I do not mean to let anybody get mad with Rhode Island, anyhow you can fix it. I never mean to permit myself to be provoked into any discussion that is not pertinent to the matter in hand, unless somebody assails Rhode Island, and then I am on hand at any time. Now, if the Senator is perfectly satisfied, I will go no further, and I hope he will get up when I have done and retract all he has said, and then I will indorse him; and I will convince him afterwards, if he will not be convinced now.

Mr. IVERSON. I will take this occasion to say that I did not make any statement in relation to Rhode Island on my own information or knowledge. I only said what was, at the time, the universal opinion, at least in that section of the country where I live, that there was a decided majority of the people of Rhode Island who desired to change their government; that they were not permitted to change it; that, in order to put down this popular sovereignty, it became necessary to employ a portion of the troops of the United States; or, at any rate, the troops were called for and announced to be ready to put down the majority of the people of Rhode Island, and maintain a government which the majority declared was onerous to them. That was the understanding. I may have been mistaken; popular opinion may have been mistaken; but that was the universal impression in my section, at that time.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has now taken back as much as three quarters of what he said before, for it takes all the virus out of charges when they are confessed to depend upon public rumor; and if I go on a little longer, I think it probable that he will take back the rest, so that we shall perfectly agree. I shall not say anything as to what this Government did in regard to the troubles in Rhode Island, but I will tell you what the people of Rhode Island did.

The State of Rhode Island called the convention to which I alluded. Mr. Dorr was elected to the regular convention; but the ox-roasting meeting of which I spoke called another convention, and he was appointed to that also. We thought one convention was quite enough at one time; and we went on and made a constitution providing for open suffrage, and allowing everybody to vote. I must confess I was rather against that; but I went home from this city to vote for it, because my friends thought I ought to go there and help it. They asked me to go out and make a speech in favor of it, when I got to Providence; but I told them no; I would never make a speech in favor of that alteration; I would rather have the old charter; but out of deference to their wishes, I would vote silently for the new constitution, though I thought the alteration was no improvement. There were a great many charter men who would not vote for this new form of government with free suffrage; and they, going with the Dorrites, who did not want any change unless they themselves made it, voted down the new constitution framed in 1842, and I came back here. When they voted down our constitution they had a meeting, and put theirs out to the people; or, I believe, they put it out a little before ours. They went around the State with horses, and took in the votes at the forts and everywhere, and finally counted them up. When they were short, I believe they took some of the shipping papers of vessels to see how many men had gone to sea, and voted for them, on the ground that they could have voted if they had been at home. [Laughter.] They made out just enough to make out a majority, as they counted and ciphered, and called that a decided expression of popular sentiment against the old charter! Our folks did not think much of that kind of voting; and we called a new convention, of which I was a member, and we made the present constitution.

Now I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia one question. When there is an existing Government that has gone through a revolution such as ours had gone through; when there has been no complaint of it for two hundred years, does he believe there is such a case of necessity as justifies going around with pannier baskets, and manufacturing votes to show that a majority of the people are against it? Does he believe in that kind of voting against a regularly organized and constituted government, when there was no complaint, and when the people had just rejected a proposed new constitution, although there was a large majority in favor of altering the old system of representation? I do not believe there is a State south of Mason and Dixon's line that would tolerate such a doctrine for an hour of allowing anybody and everybody to vote. That is rather a dangerous doctrine.

The Senator from Georgia thinks the State of Rhode Island called upon this Government to put down its own people. That is not so; but I will tell you why that State called upon the Federal Government. It was stated upon this floor by a distinguished Senator that unless the Government of Rhode Island yielded, the great States of this Union would crush her out, and that was the speech which I answered. There were armed bands of men organizing in the great cities. Here let me say to the Senator that he was mistaken in another respect; there cannot have grown up in Kansas in three years a city which can begin to compare with these old dens of vice and fraud. That is a work of longer growth than three, or four, or five years. You cannot get in one of the new States or Territories such great corruption in five or ten years, as that which has been collecting for centuries in these old haunts of filth and vice.

Mr. IVERSON. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island how it can be done. It can be done by establishing emigrant aid societies, and taking this very mass of corruption from the old States, and settling it in the Territories.

Mr. SIMMONS. We do not go into that. We are a conservative people; we stand by the old principle of regular voting and orderly meetings. I am not going to defend anybody else's doctrine. I do not belong to these organizations. I have a sort of organization of my own that I have had for about sixty years, and I consult my heart, when I want to know what is right and politic. I ask the Senator from Georgia if things have come to such a pass that the people of the large cities and States, through their representatives in the Halls of Congress, threaten to crush out a small State, whether it is not time to look around and see where you are to get strength? We asked nothing from this Government but a paper proclamation, and I believe that is what we got; and we asked further for a sensible man to be there in case we should need help.

I was not at home then; I was in my place in the Senate. Very many people asked why I did not go home and help to attend to that rebellion. I told them that I had left a parcel of boys at home who could take care of it better than I could. Sir, there was not one of my sons that was big enough to carry a gun, or to handle a hoe, that did not go. I had no occasion to tell them; I did not direct them. I knew where they were born; I knew they had descended directly from Roger Williams. I had one son who went with a Paixhan gun sixteen miles to meet those folks from New York that came over the line of Connecticut. He did it in a rain, a drenching rain. Then I had another son or two who went twenty miles to watch our neighbors on the border of Massachusetts. They, with others, slept on the tow path to be ready to keep men from coming in from Bellingham. They told me they had a good time; they were no more afraid of the Massachusetts people than the Kansas folks are of the border-ruffians. I would not send the Army there. Let the people alone, and they will take care of themselves. All we asked was to keep outsiders away.

I told a Senator from the big State of Ohio, that if he would let us alone we would take care of all the people in our own State, and not hurt one of them. When the proclamation was issued by our Governor for the people to repair to the lines of our State and defend the State from invasion from abroad, the men down in the county of Washington, and they were almost all Dorrites, set up their hoes in their fields and took up their guns and marched off, with no captains, no organization; and those fellows who were threatening us, when they heard that these men were coming, immediately scampered off. It was something like the song they used to sing, "The Campbells are coming." You cannot scare Rhode Islanders. We went over to Massachusetts and took some of the fellows within her territory. We played Paixhan upon them, and they sued us. They had us down to Boston to defend the suit. They said they would not have their territory invaded. We told them to keep their rogues at home, but if they disturbed us we would take them where we found them, though of course we should not go very far into the interior of Massachusetts. Our State paid the expenses of the trial, and we had more trouble about the lawsuit after fighting, than we had in licking them. [Laughter.] The greatest struggles we had in Rhode Island were in lawsuits with Massachusetts, and I believe we had some in the courts here.

I think I have made out a case in which the Senator from Georgia will agree with me. We wanted the Government of the United States to keep the rowdies out of Rhode Island, and we promised to take care of our own people, and to render a good account of them, without hurting a hair of their heads. When I was making a constitution for the State, I was for allowing everybody who was there, or had been born there, to vote; but I could not consent to have that object attained in an irregular manner. When we came out of that rebellion, a clever Governor in Connecticut would not allow us to go over there for Dorr. He went to New Hampshire; and we asked the Governor of New Hampshire to deliver him up as a bad fellow who had given us trouble. "Oh, no!" he said. The Democracy reigned there then, and they could not give up a man, no matter how much trouble he had made at home. We did not go after him; we knew he liked his home, and would come back after awhile. When our folks, I think unwisely, put him into prison, I had rather sacrifice my seat here than have him kept there; and I went for his liberation, and got turned out of the Senate for doing so. I did not blame my folks for turning me out. I did not belong to that "law and order" party which has now been dominant in Kansas for some time. I was a Whig, and I told them I had not changed my opinions because there was a little sort of tempest in a teapot there, but I should keep to the old doctrines.

Now, I hope I shall not be questioned on this matter again. I trust that I have removed from the mind of the Senator from Georgia his unfavorable impression about Rhode Island. When I get up to speak again, I shall bring the book and read to him the old organization of that State, so that he shall be satisfied that we started right, and kept right longer than any people ever did in this country. For two hundred years we got along without a change, and I believe the good judgment of the State has been sorry ever since that the change was made; but we cannot help it now; we must make the best of it. This is all I have to say.

Mr. IVERSON. If the Senator is going to bring all those old musty books to satisfy me, I shall save him the trouble, and acknowledge myself satisfied in advance. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMMONS. That is clever. I am glad of it, because I am always in favor of saving labor.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I do not propose at this time to detain the Senate; but there are two or three points of the argument of the honorable Senator from Georgia that I propose to notice. I was gratified to learn from him the object of this increase of the Army. I had been waiting in vain for the last two days to have that object declared. It was declared by the honorable Senator from Mississippi to be one of the objects, but not the great object; but the honorable gentleman from Georgia has stated that the grand object is the conquest of Utah. Now, sir, why does the honorable Senator desire to conquer Utah? Is there any proof that Utah is in a state of rebellion against this Government? I deny that there is any such proof before the Senate of the United States. No such proof has been laid upon our table. All the proof we have is that Brigham Young is laboring under a slight mistake. Brigham Young has read the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and in that bill he has found this language:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act, not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way."

Brigham Young has read that clause of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and in the innocence of his heart he has supposed that it meant something. He has supposed that when that clause was inserted in the bill, it meant that he had the right not only to regulate but to form his own domestic institutions in his own way; and if the family relation is not one of the domestic institutions, pray tell me what is. He thought he had an undoubted right to have one wife or a hundred, and he turned to the Nebraska bill to prove that right. He labored under a slight misapprehension.

Then again, sir, he had the speeches of my honorable and illustrious predecessor [Mr. Cass] upon squatter sovereignty and non-intervention, and he had read the speeches of the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] on the same subject, declaring that in no event could Congress intervene in the affairs of a Territory. Brigham Young believed those speeches to mean something. He believed, and he believes to-day, that he is merely carrying out the true intent and meaning of that act, which I have just read.

What do the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber propose? Do they propose to abandon the doctrine of non-intervention and squatter sovereignty? Do they propose to abandon the principles of the Nebraska bill? Do they propose to intervene in the affairs of the Territory of Utah? If they do, if they mean to back down and admit that they have been in error and have been doing wrong for the last four years, and will show to me that they require a force in Utah to put down rebellion against the Government, I will vote for it. I care not whether it be one regiment or one hundred regiments; but until they can show me that there is rebellion in Utah, and that Brigham Young is doing something more than carrying out the true intent and meaning of their own work, I will never vote to raise a man.

Now, sir, I suggest another remedy. I do not propose to send regiments and bayonets into Utah in this stage of the proceedings; but I propose that we employ a missionary, a sound missionary, a man known to be in the confidence of this Administration. Let him have letters patent from this Administration, showing that he does possess their confidence and represent their views. Send this man alone, without arms and without bayonets, to Brigham Young and to the people of Utah Territory; and after having exhibited his testimonials, let him say to Brigham Young, "Sir, you are under a misapprehension on this whole question." He may reply, "Here is the bill which declares that the people of the Territories 'shall be left perfectly free,' not only to regulate, but 'to form their domestic institutions in their own way,' and there is no misapprehension about it." "Ah!" the missionary can reply, "that was a mere tub thrown to the whale; that was to catch northern votes; that was to save the honorable Senator from Illinois, and the honorable Senator from Michigan, and other honorable Senators, from annihilation at home. It does not apply to the people of the Territories. You must obey the laws; and if you do not obey them we will send an army, and we will exterminate your whole race." If you can convince him that this man is the faithful exponent of the views of this Administration, and that that army will be forthcoming unless he submit to the laws, you will have no war, for he dare not resist this Government.

But, sir, why has he been led to suppose that this Administration was not in earnest? Why were not these fifteen hundred men started from Fort Leavenworth on the first day of June, instead of being kept there until it was an absolute certainty that the snows of winter would fasten them up in the gorges of the Rocky Mountains? He has been led by that act again to suppose that the Administration were not in earnest. He knew perfectly well where the troops were; he knew perfectly well that they might have been started in season to reach Utah before the frosts came on; and he knew that they were not sent. He certainly supposed that the Government were not in earnest, that they did not mean to interfere, that they still adhered to the doctrine of non-intervention.

The Senator from Georgia also alluded to the employment of troops in Kansas, and he said he wished to God—that may not be his exact expression, but it is the idea—that no soldier had ever been sent into Kansas; and gave as a reason that, had troops not been sent there, the Abolitionists would have been exterminated. I do not know exactly whom he terms Abolitionists. I do not know whether there is an Abolitionist in Kansas or not; but I do know one thing: that if the troops had not been sent to Kansas and had not been kept there, there would not have been a border ruffian now polluting that fresh and virgin soil. Never, sir, since the first drop of free-State blood was shed in that Territory has the moment existed when border-ruffianism would not have been wiped out in thirty days but for the intervention of United States troops. Take away the Army of the United States to-morrow, and I tell you, sir, the people of Kansas will settle their own affairs in their own way, will settle them for this time and for all time on the principle of free labor and freemen's rights. They not only would have wiped out border-ruffianism from the Territory of Kansas, but there would have been a terrible account to be settled with some of those border towns in Missouri. Well for you, sir, well for those ruffians on the borders, that the United States troops were there; for that account would have been settled ere this but for their presence. If he desires them to be away, why not vote with us to-day to take them away? I will most cordially unite with him in voting for a bill to remove every soldier from that Territory to-morrow. If he is in earnest, let him introduce such a bill, and I will guaranty him every vote from this side of the Chamber.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I think the last speech that has been made must be very effective on the proposition before the Senate. I do not think the United States Senate can fail, under such an argument as has been offered by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, to see that the opposition springs from the purpose, in civil war, of shedding blood on the soil of the United States. I feel sorrow—sorrow too deep for anger, at speeches which invoke civil war among the people of the United States, and at such idle boasting as vaunts the triumph of one party by the immolation of the other, and recounts who would have been killed. I have no heart for such a controversy. I have no wish that any two of my fellow-citizens should be brought in collision as combatants in civil war; and I had supposed that I but uttered a sentiment which must be common to the Senate, when I spoke in terms of gratification, that the troops had been able to prevent that collision in Kansas. If the announcement of the opposition to this bill is that the increase of the Army will but increase the means of the Government to prevent the shedding of blood in civil war, who is there that hears me who is bold enough to look his countrymen in the face, and say he voted against a bill acknowledging such to be its effect?

I hope that we shall take a vote on this bill. If the sense of the Senate be against it, let us know it. I have no desire to prolong the discussion. I have no desire to enter into subjects which are to provoke crimination and recrimination. Points have been raised in the course of the debate which I think I could satisfactorily answer, and yet I trust it is unnecessary. Again and again it has been said that no reason was offered for this vast increase of the Army. It is no vast increase.

Again, it has been said that we cannot reduce the Army, if we once increase it. Why, sir, a campaign will reduce the Army. The law itself will cause all the reduction which is necessary. Those companies that may start on the campaign with ninety-six privates in the spring, will come back with some twenty-five or thirty, and when they return to garrison posts in the interior of the country, the President will be limited by the established organization of the Army, and cannot again by recruits fill them up to this number of ninety-six. If there be any objection to that, strike out the second section. And now, if Senators will give me their attention, I will endeavor to explain what I believe will be the effect of striking out the first section. Recruits will be sent in bodies, instead of being distributed among the companies, and when those bodies of recruits reach their destined posts they will find the companies so reduced that the recruits will only bring them up to seventy-four. I think this is a fair, open proposition; but if there be any objection to this authorized strength—if gentlemen start at the aggregate number you may authorize under it, strike out the second section. I do not know that it will diminish the force really, but you will change the form. Men will be recruited and distributed in bodies as recruits, but probably the number will be about the same. But the proposition pending is to strike out the first section. That I hope will not be done, for I believe it will materially impair the efficiency of the Army.

But, sir, as to this "vast increase" which it is said we are about to make—what is it? In 1819, Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, speaking of our northwestern frontier, said, "it is on that frontier only that we have much to fear from Indian hostilities." The organized strength of the Army was then ten thousand; the extent of the northwestern frontier, reckoning from St. Louis up to the mouth of the St. Peters, thence across to Green Bay, thence to Mackinaw, and up to Sault Ste. Marie, and from Mackinaw down to the present site of Chicago, was about twelve hundred miles. This was the whole amount of our Indian frontier at that period. Now we have six thousand five hundred miles of Indian frontier. Moreover, under the old army, commonly known as the Adams's army, as far back as 1798, the strength was four thousand one hundred and fifty-nine, and in the region of country which was then garrisoned by that army of four thousand one hundred and fifty-nine, we have, by the present distribution of troops, only eight hundred and sixty-nine officers and men, all told. The increase of the Army has been the consequence of the steady increase of our territory, the rapid increase of our frontier, and the rapid augmentation of the Indian tribes with whom we have been brought in contact. The garrisons which once furnished our fortifications along the sea-board have been ordered into the interior. Posts which were advantageously and economically held up to 1821, and from that time down to 1842, have been necessarily disbanded, and an increase of the Army is necessary, under any contingencies I can foresee, to give the same relative strength we had in 1798.

Nor is this all. The garrisoning of these posts, I consider essentially necessary for safety against any sudden incursions, if we are to apprehend difficulty in the future contingency of a foreign war. We require these garrisons to be in a state of instruction. You may acquire for your troops hardihood and fortitude, by sending them to wander over mountains and vast plains against the Indians; but what becomes of your artillery instruction? What becomes of your cavalry instruction? What becomes of that thorough training and preparation which enables a country to go to war effectively, when war is declared? All lost to the employment of your military forces to perform the police duties that belong to a state of peace. If that be the only purpose for which gentlemen are willing to maintain the Army, they may say "leave our forts ungarrisoned;" but if, following the wise counsel of our ancestors, they determine to keep up the military information of the country, to maintain the science of the United States in military affairs to the standard of the European countries, it is necessary that they should have their troops so stationed that they may be all the time undergoing instruction, and preparing themselves for the higher demands of war.

I wish in this connection to refer to the authority of one who was wisest among the statesmen I have known, and who in all his public action was influenced by a policy which knew no leaning to men or to section; who was a devotee of truth, whose steps were always directed toward that as the one great object for which he strove; who because of his devotion to truth was made the object of assault throughout the long period of his life, and died without attaining that elevation which his character, his genius, his services to the country justly entitled him—need I say that I refer to Calhoun! In a report which he made when Secretary of War to the House of Representatives, in 1820, on the subject of organization, he used the following language. I shall read only a single paragraph:

"To give such an organization (on the peace establishment) the leading principles in its formation ought to be, that at the commencement of hostilities there should be nothing either to new model or to create. The only difference, consequently, between the peace and the war formation of the Army ought to be in the increased magnitude of the latter; and the only change in passing from the former to the latter, should consist in giving to it the augmentation which will then be necessary."

That is the opinion to which I alluded yesterday when speaking of the skeleton peace establishment. If I had been devising a bill to present my own individual opinion—and I shall be permitted to say so on account of the reference which has been made to my opinion—I should not have drawn exactly the bill which is before us; but I have concurred fully with the committee in the propriety of presenting the bill in this form, as that which would give efficiency to the public service, and as that which we might hope to obtain. If I had been preparing a bill merely to express my own views, I would have added three regiments to the permanent peace establishment of the Army, and would have given to each regiment, under present circumstances, twelve companies; and then have provided that when the exigencies of the service would permit, or at some particular day, if desired, each regiment should be reduced to eight companies; and this would have reduced the whole military strength to something less than it now is, but with a different organization, and, I believe, greater efficiency. Then I would have conferred on the President power, upon a declaration of war, which is the act of Congress, to add a third battalion to each regiment then in service, and thus have provided for an efficient Army in the commencement of hostilities, of from thirty-five to forty thousand men. As is argued in this report—I shall not detain the Senate by reading further from it—this would save us from the great loss, both of money and of honor, which is involved on the country by being precipitated into a war without a regularly disciplined and instructed army. Mr. Calhoun, fresh from the contemplation of all the consequences that belonged to our entering into the war of 1812 without preparation, made this report, and his mind shed such light upon it that no one since that, in attempting organization, has been able to depart from the great principles which he laid down without stultifying himself.

But, sir, it is argued that if we raise volunteers they can be got rid of. Yes, sir, and we can get rid of the Treasury of the United States in the same way: we can keep its organization, but empty its coffers. I have, since the debate of yesterday, on account of the manner in which this point was pressed, looked into the expenditures within the last few years for the raising of volunteers. Here let me state that the employment of that species of force may be considered in many instances as equivalent to a proposition to exterminate the Indians, and that the employment of that species of force, coming as they must, with all their border animosities, and excitement against the people of Utah or Kansas, would be but a means of shedding the largest amount of blood that could be drawn under the circumstances of the case.

In looking into these expenditures I find that in the last few years there have been large appropriations made by Congress. By the act of July 19, 1854, for what is known as the Rogue river war against the Indians in Oregon, an indefinite sum was appropriated, and under that act there has been expended $167,922 25. By the act of August 4, 1854, in reimbursement of the State of California, there was appropriated $924,259 65, of which there has been expended $364,008 37. The only reason why the whole of it was not expended was on account of the defective form of the certificates which they produced in some instances, and the failure to produce them in others. All of it, however, I have no doubt will go. Then the act of September 30, 1850, for the Texas volunteers, appropriated $72,000. For New Mexico, in 1851, you appropriated $135,530 20; for Texas in the same year, $236,934 34; for Florida in the same year, $75,000. In 1852 there was appropriated for Texas $80,714; for New Mexico in 1857, $223,090. Then for the pay department alone, in 1856 and 1857, the cost of paying the Florida volunteers was $273,746 85, and the estimates just prepared by the pay department for the payment of these Florida volunteers, supposing them now to be disbanded, are $385,000, and if they be again mustered into service there will be required $385,000 more. There have been expended in the Territories of Oregon and Washington, in the years 1855 and 1856 as adjudicated by the board of commissioners, $5,931,424 78. These items make a total of $8,836,397 79.

This is the expenditure which results from these men being brought irregularly into service. It is sound economy, and has been so demonstrated by reports which have been laid on the table of the Senate, to raise the regular force to whatever the exigencies of the country may demand, and I cannot admit that it is not in the power of Congress to reduce that force whenever that exigency has passed. We have too many instances in our military history to leave that question open. We have had reduction after reduction, some of them very unwisely made; as, for instance, by the act of March 3, 1815, fixing the peace establishment, the strength of the Army was reduced to ten thousand, at which it remained down to the time of the further reduction in 1821—a period when it reached its lowest figure, and from which, soon afterwards, it slowly began to rise. There was a regiment added in 1823; another in 1836; another in 1838. It went up successively, from six thousand one hundred and eighty-three, its strength in 1822, to seven thousand four hundred and ninety-seven in 1837, and to twelve thousand five hundred and thirty-nine in 1839. At the close of the Seminole war, in 1842, it was again reduced to eight thousand six hundred and thirteen; but four years afterwards it was raised to twelve thousand two hundred and sixteen, by the addition of a regiment of mounted riflemen, and an increase of the number of privates. Then came the Mexican war; after which, it was increased by raising the strength of the companies, in 1850, to seventy-four, and then by the addition of four regiments in 1855.

Thus we see that every attempt at reduction has been followed by another increase; and that the reduction was unwise was manifested by the disasters which immediately followed. Whenever the Army is above the requirements of the country, then, I think, without looking merely to the expenditure, the Executive Department (for it is unfair to question its integrity) will at once report the excess over the requirements of the public service. If it does not, and Congress shall find the occasion when our country shall cease to continue to increase its territory, to increase its frontier, and thereby to increase its necessities for military force, then I trust there can be no difficulty in the mind of either House of Congress in such reduction.

I should have no difficulty in providing a bill which would make a prospective reduction, but the manner in which it is proposed here to make a prospective reduction at the end of this campaign against the Mormons, I must protest against, because it is not for that campaign that the troops are asked by the Executive Government. I could not yesterday, when it was proposed, accept that, for the Executive Department does not present it as the reason for which it desires this increase. It is not willing to accept it as temporary, and I think fairly so, because if the Mormons should terminate the difficulties in the most speedy and submissive manner which may be imaginable, it is known that all the Indian tribes which surround them have already been involved in hostilities, and it is known that across that trail our emigration is steadily increasing; that on that and every other route, if we permit the emigration to go on to our Pacific possessions, we must give some adequate protection. Whether it be by annual campaigns, or the establishment of posts, the result is the same. If there be any one here who will say: "I wish to terminate the overland emigration to California, Oregon, and Washington," then with him it is sufficient to say, "I do not wish to protect these routes;" but if we desire the emigration to continue, I say we must continue the routes, and give security along them; and in proportion as that emigration increases, in proportion as it spreads over the various periods of the year, instead of being confined to one, so you will require an additional military force to protect it; and I am unwilling to incur the hazard of venturing an opinion that the time will come in my day when that force can be reduced. It may or it may not; I rather believe the time will not come. This interior country can never be so settled; settlements can never so extend from point to point as to assume that continuity which will give protection to the traveler across this wide space.

I am not willing to anticipate the extermination of these Indians. I look forward with hope to some partial civilization—partial it must be. Here I would say to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] that I wish to call his attention to the difference between the Indians who inhabit this country and those of the old States of the Union, with whom our former difficulties arose. These are nomadic Indians. A settlement of our own people sufficient to reduce them, if you please, cannot pursue nomadic tribes without leaving their wives, their children, and their homes, to desolation. It is not as it was with those Indians who had a local habitation; who had fields and tenements; who could be reached by a steady campaign, and brought to subjection by bringing them to want, if they continued to insist on hostilities. These Indians, too, are driven to hostilities. Their whole pursuit is plunder. They cultivate no fields. They have no certain means of subsistence. Their subsistence, derived from the chase, is every year declining. The great hordes of buffalo that once covered the western plains have now passed into the mountains. They have been compelled to live on horses, mules, and half the forays, if not more than that proportion, committed on the settlers, are to obtain subsistence—plunder for a livelihood.

By feeding them, by locating them upon territory which they may cultivate, I trust we shall steadily progress towards their civilization, bringing them into something like a condition of peace. If that ever should occur—and occur at some remote period I hope it will—then we may dispense with the protection of our emigrant route, we may dispense with keeping up these frontier posts, with keeping strong garrisons in them; but until then, I do not believe that the increase here proposed will be one man more than the wants of the service will demand. I say this with frankness, with a knowledge that it will not commend the measure. I state it on my knowledge of what the necessity of the country is. If others should differ from me, as to the necessity of giving the Government that aid which it asks, I hope their opinion will prove true, rather than mine.

Mr. TOOMBS. Having made this motion to strike out the first section of the bill, I deem it incumbent on me to state my reasons to the Senate, and more especially to answer the objections which have been made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Several Senators. Let us adjourn.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is four o'clock; and I hope the Senator will give way to a motion to adjourn. I wish to hear him.

Mr. TOOMBS. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is too late to go on now, and I move an adjournment.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire, before we adjourn, to ask the Senate to agree upon some time when the vote shall be taken, merely informally of course, as I learn from the Senator from Georgia that he does not intend to speak at length, and is willing to let the vote be taken at an early period. I ask the Senate if they will be willing to have the vote taken at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FOOT. I wish to remind the honorable Senator from Mississippi, and the Senate, that another special order is assigned for to-morrow at one o'clock, on which the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] has the floor. I have thought it proper to suggest it in his absence.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not wish to interfere with the Senator from Maryland, and I thought probably that to fix two o'clock for taking the vote would not interfere with him; but say one o'clock; I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. KING. That, I think, is too early an hour to agree upon taking the vote.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not think we can come to a resolution when to take the question. I think we never do.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not want a resolution, but an understanding.

Mr. SEWARD. We can come to an understanding; but with reference to that, I wish to say that when the vote will be taken it will depend somewhat on who will occupy the floor, and how long it may be occupied. Before taking the vote, I have a word or two to say; but I shall speak very briefly, as I trust I always do.

Mr. TOOMBS. I understand the Senator from Texas wants to be heard.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall endeavor to hasten the taking of the vote to-morrow.

Mr. HOUSTON. I presume it is not necessary at present to assign any particular time for taking the vote. I want to say something on the bill myself. I feel interested. Several allusions have been made to Texas in the course of the debate, and after I know the number and extent of them, I shall have something to say in relation to the bill.

Mr. STUART. I renew the motion to adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 27, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. CHARLES H. HALL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER announced the business first in order to be the call of committees for reports, and that reports were in order from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories to ask leave to submit a resolution, asking for information which it is important for the House and for the country to have acted upon immediately.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the regular order of business. That committee will be reached in a few minutes under the call. If not, I will consent.

EXCUSED FROM SERVICE ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I was directed by my colleague, Mr. DAWES, to announce to the House, last Friday, that in consequence of sickness in his family he would be absent for several days; since which time he has been appointed a member of the committee for investigating the official conduct and accounts of the Doorkeeper of the last House. I received a letter from him on Monday, asking me to submit a motion to the House that he should be excused from serving on that committee, in consequence of his absence from the city caused by sickness in his family.

The motion was agreed to.

THE UTAH EXPEDITION.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Objection being withdrawn, I ask leave to submit the following resolution from the Committee on Territories:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House of Representatives the information which gave rise to the military expedition ordered to Utah Territory; the instructions to the Army officers in connection with the same; and all correspondence which has taken place with said Army officers, with Brigham Young and his followers, or with others, throwing light on the question as to how far said Brigham Young and his followers are in a state of rebellion or resistance to the Government of the United States.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. PHELPS. I submit the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and I will remark, in submitting that motion, that there is an absolute necessity for the House—

Mr. SEWARD. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to it then.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. PHELPS. Very well. I then submit the usual resolution, that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on House bill No. 202, appropriating money to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for printing, binding, and paper, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, shall terminate at half past one o'clock on Friday next, if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion thereon.

Mr. SEWARD. Is it in order to move to lay that bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The bill is not before the House. The House is simply proposing to instruct the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The resolution was adopted—ayes 72, noes 55.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LEITER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Ohio in relation to Kansas, for the purpose of having them read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to accommodate the gentleman from Ohio; but the debate has been closed in Committee of the Whole on the bill now pending before it, and I think we had better go into committee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a correction of a statement in one of the papers in this city, which will not occupy more than a single minute.

Mr. PHELPS. I must insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the PRINTING DEFICIENCY BILL.

Upon which Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, was entitled to the floor.

CORRECTION OF A NEWSPAPER.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Before the gentleman from Mississippi proceeds with his speech, I ask the unanimous consent of the committee to make a statement, which shall not occupy five minutes by the clock.

No objection being made,

Mr. CLINGMAN proceeded: I am not in the habit of noticing, on this floor, articles which may appear in the papers; but when statements are made in a paper in this city, in reference to proceedings which have taken place here, I think it well enough sometimes to correct them.

Yesterday I offered resolutions here, which were objected to, and not received by the House. I find, on looking into the Intelligencer of this morning, that, in the editorial column, I am represented as having endeavored to introduce resolutions in favor of acquiring certain territory in Central America. Now, sir, my resolution proposes no such proposition. It opposes the acquisition of territory there by foreign Powers which might so use it as to interfere with our interests in a material point of view.

In the next place, I am represented as taking grounds against the coolie trade, as carried on by Great Britain and France. Now, sir, my resolution makes no reference either to Great Britain or France. And it is important that the correction should be made; because I understand there is just now a collision of opinion, or controversy between those two Governments in reference to the system of apprenticeship which is being carried out on the western coast of Africa by the French Government. I think that the French Emperor has the best of the argument. I hold that, if they are to have slaves at all, it is better to have Africans than white men, whether Chinese or East India sepoys. I look upon the negro as fitted for slavery, while the white races are not. But though my opinions are on the side of the Emperor of France in this controversy, yet my resolutions made no reference to any Power by name.

THE SLAVERY QUESTION.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the other day the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] announced the fact that, if any State in this Union should at any time seek to withdraw from the Union, the people of the North were resolved to baptize it in fire and blood. I desire this morning simply to say to that gentleman, that whenever it shall be made known that the people in the section of the Union in which he resides desire to baptize any single inch of southern soil in blood, an opportunity shall at once be afforded them; and I hope that when they visit the portion of the Union in which I reside, for the purpose of baptizing it in fire and blood, they will come in open day, and not in the darkness of night. And I desire also to say to that gentleman, and to other gentlemen who entertain similar opinions with himself, that for every drop of blood shed on southern soil, for the purpose of coercing the southern people to submit to the wrongs and injustice with which they are now threatened, there will be visited upon the North a retaliation more terrible and desolating than the sweep of a simoom.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] has, with characteristic delicacy, told us that if we continued to urge our claim to the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, it might by possibility awaken a revolution in that country which should deluge the whole land in blood. Sir, that gentleman may reserve his threats, and paint his scenes of civil war for those who are already prepared to become slaves. They are heard by the freemen of the South with indifference and contempt. I say to him, and to those who are in the habit of resorting to such threats, that we disregard them when made individually or otherwise. And, sir, whenever this revolution, now foreshadowed, shall become a reality—whenever this country shall become the theater of internecine war, simply because we of the South demand our constitutional rights and constitutional equality in the Union, we are ready for the conflict, come in whatever form it may. These threats have been sounded in our ears for years past. We have become familiar with them. Our people can no longer be excited by them. They contemplate the threatened contingency with a calm, serene, and self-sustaining mind.

I will remind gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, that it is not a question whether our portion of the Union alone shall be deluged in blood if a conflict shall be forced by the North upon the South. When that hour shall come they will find an army marching from the South across the borders into the limits of the North; and, gentlemen, your section, not ours, will become the field of strife and the scene of desolating war. I know, sir, when gentlemen talk about a dissolution of the Union, they speak of it as a light matter, a matter of no importance; but I must be allowed to tell them that there is more reality in the declaration than they at present imagine. We of the South have borne insults in times past with patience, because we have loved this Union, and desired to remain in it on account of the reminiscences of the seven years' war of the Revolution, and the glories won by our forefathers and our forefathers in their united struggle for independence. But, then, it must not be forgotten that there are limits even to Christian forbearance; that there are some things which are too oppressive to be longer endured, and that will not be longer endured by the South. And, Mr. Chairman, I feel it to be my duty to speak calmly and deliberately on this subject, and thus to announce not only my own opinions, but the opinions, as I believe, of an overwhelming majority of the entire South.

Are there, then, no reasons to fear a dissolution of this Union? I say that there are. The other side of the House is divided into two parties; one called the Abolition, and the other the Free-Soil party; and for myself, I will say that I have more respect for the Abolitionists than I have for the Free-Soilers. The one, the Abolitionist, is bolder and more open than the other; and I prefer the rude assault of the highway robber, who, holding his pistol to my bosom, demands my money or my life, to the stealthy, cat-like attack of the midnight assassin.

I shall endeavor to demonstrate in the course of my remarks, that the only difference which exists between the Abolitionists and the Free-Soilers is, that the one is guilty of a higher grade of robbery than the other. That, sir, is the only substantial difference.

I ask, sir, whether there is no real danger to be apprehended, so far as this Union is concerned? While the Abolitionists continue to make war upon the South, manifestly the South cannot and will not endure it; manifestly the fifteen southern States of this Union, with a high-spirited, chivalrous people, who shrink from dishonor as from a wound, cannot and will not submit to be robbed by men who have the meanness to violate the Constitution of the country, and disregard the sacred contract entered into between their fathers and ours. Whenever it shall be attempted to deprive us of our just rights and our equality, whenever it should be attempted to strike down the institution of slavery, then inevitably will an attempt be made to sever this Union; and if it be not successful, it will be because the South is deluged with blood, and made desolate with fire. But in that conflict, gentlemen of the North, let me tell you, who call yourselves our brothers, that there will be blows to give as well as to receive.

I ask, sir, the most bigoted Abolitionist upon this floor, to say whether he believes the South will ever submit to the taking away of their property by force, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States? Does he think that they will supinely submit to such an act of aggression, without complaint, without resenting it with all their strength? No man can entertain any such expectation. Now it is possible that that event may transpire. It is not impossible. Some twenty years ago there was only a handful of Abolitionists in this country, and the sentiments they professed so outraged the public in Philadelphia, that the people burnt to the ground the hall in which they held their meetings. The Abolitionists were then expelled from that city, because their aims were subversive of correct principles of order, and violative of the just rights of the South.

How is it now? They have grown in numbers, and have stood almost in a majority upon this floor; for, as I have said, the difference is very slight between Republicans and Abolitionists. If they have made such proffers as to unite with them those who are in favor of excluding slavery from the Territories, then it is fair to assume that the system of agitation which has been carried on will be continued in order to strike down the institution of slavery in the States. When that time arrives, it must be manifest to every man that, if a dissolution is not effected, a revolution will ensue, such as has never been seen before. It will not be like a war between the United States and any European nation, or a war between separate Powers, where the question involved rests upon some real or imaginary insult, and the parties look only to the protection of their honor. But drive us to war, if you please, under the conviction that we have been wronged, and that injustice has been inflicted upon us by those who claim to be our brothers, and it will be a fratricidal war, and will be accompanied, as I stated a moment ago, with a desolation of the most fearful and terrific character that has ever been inflicted on any people or on any country.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman permit me to put a question to him?

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Yes, sir. He can put his question, but I will not bind myself to answer it.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I want to know whether the gentleman means to carry this war of desolation into the Western Reserve of Ohio? [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Yes, sir; that is the first place where I would strike, because there, in my opinion, reside the meanest and worst of the Abolition party on this continent. [Much laughter.] But, sir, there is another portion of the gentlemen on the other side who sustain themselves in their endeavors to rob us of our slaves by a reference to the fifteenth and sixteenth verses of the twenty-third chapter of Deuteronomy, which are as follows:

"Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee."

"He shall dwell with thee, even among you, in that place which he shall choose, in one of thy gates where it liketh him best; thou shalt not oppress him."

Sir, that law was given by Moses to the people after their forty years' residence in the desert, and when they had taken the land of their enemies; and it announced to them that if the slaves of their enemies came to them, they were to take them in and keep them. I desire to know if the gentleman who quotes that passage, regards the southern people as enemies, and if he intends his minions to travel into the southern country and rob us of our lands, as well as of our slaves and other property? But I refer the gentleman especially to this verse from Exodus:

"And he that stealeth a man and selleth him, or if he be found in his hands, he shall be surely put to death."

The gentleman would perhaps come under that category.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. If the gentleman will tell me his name, I will tell him whether I will allow him to do so or not. I have not got his name yet.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Lovejoy.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Then I desire to ask the gentleman a question first. Did he ever receive a letter from one Mr. Lombard?

Mr. LOVEJOY. I did.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I send that letter to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

BRADFORD, STARK COUNTY, ILLINOIS,
July 30, 1857.

SIR: About two months since I emigrated with my family from the State of Mississippi to the county of Stark, in this State, intending to make it my future residence, to attend to my own business, and hoped I should be permitted to spend the balance of my days in peace and quiet, doing unto others as I would that they should do unto me. I brought with me a very aged and favorite negro man by the name of "Mose," whom I had refused to leave behind, as he had been honest and faithful in all things, (wish I could say the same of you,) had become infirm, and totally incapable to provide for or take care of himself. It was my duty, by the custom of the country where I had lived; and it was enjoined upon me by the laws of humanity, as well as dictated by a feeling of affection, to provide, amply, for that poor old man. He had been with me "through weal and woe," was beloved and respected by all my family, every member of which would have divided his or her last biscuit with "Old Mose." In health and sickness he was kindly cared for, and always treated with that consideration and tenderness to which his past services and old age entitled him.

It was distinctly understood between him and myself that he should accompany me to Mississippi in October next; and then, if he preferred to remain there, I was to arrange for his future support, or he was to return to this State with me if he wished to. He was to make his own selection as to his future residence. He was as free as any man in this State. He knew no care, and did very little labor for me. So far as we knew, he was content and happy; and, if he had been left alone, would have continued so. In an evil hour, the poor old man, ignorant in his dotage, listened, as I am told, and believe, to the lies and persuasions of certain rascally church members not very far from this village, and very probably consented to leave his home, and trust to the tender mercies of the vile, thieving Abolitionists. By their agency he was taken (I should say stolen, as the ignorant old man could have had very little volition in the matter) from my house during the night of the 10th instant, as I think, and early the next morning delivered over to you, at Princeton, as the properly constituted agent of said railroad; and that, by the aid of contributions, mislabeledly levied by you upon the by-standers, not by your own means, you sent that old man to Canada, or some other cold country, to seek a support from the cold charities of the world—I might, perhaps, have said Abolitionists—but no; they can wheedle, coax, and steal negroes from their homes, provided it can be done at the expense of others, and not touch their purses. They are too sordid and mean to bear any portion of the outlay.

In the North, where you and I were raised, sheep-stealing is regarded as the meanest and lowest grade of thieving—in the South, to steal a negro's support is the meanest. Now, sir, I would ask you, is either of those thefts he, as mean, as low, and as contemptible as the abducting and sending away from his home a poor and infirm old negro man? Who say you, sir? Answer out—speak—tell the world and your constituents your code of morals.

Sir, I openly and publicly charge you with having been an accessory, and an active participant, in the abducting and sending away of that old man from a better home and kinder treatment than you or any other rascally Abolitionist, with all your hypocritical philanthropy, ever did or ever will provide for a negro. You, sir, have aided in robbing an old, infirm man of his home, and sent him forth to linger out the remainder of his days among strangers who have no sympathy with him, and where he must and will suffer and die in wretchedness and want.

You have disgraced the cause of humanity and of religion, which in past times you pretended to teach; you have disgraced your district, and committed an offense which ought to expel you from the Halls of Congress, and would but for the protection you will seek in the fanaticism and recklessness of a political party whose aim and object are to sacrifice the rights of the South, even if it be at the expense of the Union; but, though your party may protect you from expulsion, they cannot screen you from the scorn and loathing which every honest, patriotic member of Congress must and will view you. They will shun and avoid you as one disgraced—contaminated. You will be the contempt and scorn of every honest man.

In conclusion, I denounce you and all who aided you in the abducting and sending away "Old Mose" from my house as knaves and rascals.

E. H. LOMBARD.

To OWEN LOYCEJOY, Agent for the Underground Railroad, Ex-Minister of the Gospel, and Member of Congress elect from the Third District in Illinois.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. No, sir; I can answer no question now.

In addition to this I now quote Exodus, chapter twenty, verses fifteen, sixteen, and seventeen:

"Thou shalt not steal.
"Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.
"Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his man servant, nor his maid servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is his."

I also quote Exodus, chapter twenty-one, verses two to six and sixteen:

"If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve, and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing.
"If he came in by himself he shall go out by himself; if he were married then his wife shall go out with him.
"If his master have given him a wife and she have borne him sons or daughters, the wife and her children shall be her masters, and he shall go out by himself.
"And if the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife and my children, I will not go out free;
"Then his master shall bring him unto the judges: he shall also bring him to the door or unto the door-post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl; and he shall serve him forever.
"And he that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death."

I also quote Genesis, chapter fourteen, fourteenth verse:

"And when Abraham heard that his brother was taken captive, he armed his trained servants born in his own house, three hundred and eighteen, and pursued them unto Dan."

And Genesis, chapter sixteen, eighth to tenth verses:

"And he said to Hagar, Sarai's maid, whence camest thou? and whither wilt thou go? And she said, I flee from the face of my mistress Sarai.

"And the angel of the Lord said unto her, Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hands.

"And the angel of the Lord said unto her, I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude."

I also quote from Ephesians, sixth chapter, fifth to ninth verse:

"Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ.

"Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart;

"With good-will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men;

"Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free.

"And ye masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening; knowing that your Master also is in Heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said that I have no respect for the Abolitionists, and you may see, from what I have said, how much respect I have for them. But I have more respect for the Abolitionists than I have for the Free-Soilers. And why? The Free-Soilers do not go quite so far as the Abolitionists do. The Abolitionist professes that he is influenced by motives of humanity to the slave; he says that he is influenced by the conviction that all men are equal and ought to be equally free; that that is the doctrine of his country, and that he acts in obedience to that honest conviction of his. I say that Abolitionists, influenced by convictions of this sort, are to be at least pitied, if not excused. They are in favor of taking the negro directly, and placing him on an equality with the white man on this continent.

But how is it with the Free-Soiler? The Free-Soiler says to us southern gentlemen: "I do not want to interfere with your slaves; I am willing that the negro shall remain in bondage; but I want to place you, the white men of the South, in a state of political bondage, by a system of unjust, unfair, and unconstitutional legislation."

What do you propose, you gentlemen of the Free-Soil party? Do you propose to better the condition of the slave? Not at all. Do you propose to emancipate the slave? Not at all. What then do you propose? You say you are opposed to the expansion of the institution of slavery; that you are unwilling that one more foot of territory shall be dedicated to slavery; but that you are determined that all territory shall hereafter be free soil. Now, who is to be benefited by that? Is the white man of the South to be benefited by it? Not at all. Is the slave to be benefited by it? Not at all. Then it is not the interests of the slave which you are after, gentlemen of the Free-Soil party. It is not humanity that influences you in the position which you now occupy before the country. But you are influenced by a desire on your part to take from us unjustly the proceeds of our labor. In other words, your desire is to reduce us to the attitude which Prometheus was made to occupy, that you, like the vulture, may fatten on the products of our soil and industry. It is that you may have an opportunity of cheating us that you want to limit slave territory within circumscribed bounds. It is that you may have a majority in the Congress of the United States, and convert the Government into an engine of northern aggrandizement. It is that your section may grow in power and prosperity upon treasures unjustly taken from the South, like the vampire bloated and gorged with the blood which it has secretly sucked from its victim.

The Free-Soiler has some motive for his policy. He has some ulterior motive. No man yet ever advocated a settled opinion without having an object in doing so. No man yet ever did any act without looking to something beyond the act. And so when you Free-Soilers organized yourselves into what is denominated the Free-Soil party, and resolved to circumscribe the institution of slavery, you looked to the accomplishment of a result, future if not immediate. What are your doctrines? You say that you are not after the slave. You admit that you are not in favor of emancipating slaves; and yet you have not the frankness to acknowledge the full extent of your principles. But what are you after? You desire to weaken the political power of the southern States of the Union; and why? Because you want, by an unjust system of legislation, to promote the industry of the New England States, at the expense of the people of the South and of their industry.

Now let us see whether I am right in saying that your Free-Soil organization is intended to lead to the breaking down of the political power of the southern States of the Union. Am I right in charging you with waging war against us for the purpose of obtaining a political ascendancy in the councils of the nation, that you might afterwards legislate for the benefit of the New England States to the prejudice of the people of the South? I think I am authorized in making this charge, by the position taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE] yesterday, in which he admitted, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KEITT], that if every man, woman, and child in Kansas had voted in favor of the constitution tolerating slavery, he would have voted against its admission into the Union as a slave State. And why? Is it from any particular feeling of respect that he had for the people of the Territory, or for the doctrine of popular sovereignty, or for the right of the people to govern themselves? Or is it from interested motives and interested considerations? Is it that the political power of the southern States may be stricken down?

I will now call the attention of the committee to the opinions of Mr. Webster on the subject, whose opinions, I have no doubt, did more to create the organization of the Free-Soil party than the opinions of any other man of the nation.

Mr. Webster says, in his speech at Marshfield, I believe, in 1848:

"In the second place, in my judgment, the interests of the country and the feeling of a vast majority of the people rejoice that a President of these United States should be elected who will use neither official influence to promote, nor feel any desire in his heart to promote, the further extension of slavery in this community, or its further influence in the public councils."

And why, sir? Because the Democracy of almost the entire North, and of the entire South, had announced the doctrine of the limited powers, under the Constitution, of the Federal Government, and he wished, by the extension in this Government of northern abolition influence, to overthrow that doctrine.

Again, he opposed the admission of Texas into the Union. Why? Was it because it would increase the number of slaves on the continent? Not at all. Whether Texas was admitted into the Union or not, she was a slave State. And if she remained an independent State, she would still be a slave State. He gives this as his reason:

"I take it that the most important event in our time, tending to the extension of slavery, and its everlasting establishment on this continent, was the annexation of Texas in 1844."

He opposed it, then, as a measure for the extension of slavery. Not that it would increase the number of slaves, but because it would increase the political power of the slave States of this Union. In other words, because it would increase the power of the southern portion of this Union—the most important agricultural portion of the Union, as it always will be.

Again, sir, he was opposed to the acquisition of California and New Mexico. And why did he oppose that annexation? In his Faneuil Hall speech he says he voted against the acquisition of that Territory, and that he should do the same thing again, with much more resolution. He would have run a still greater risk; he would have endured a still greater shock; he would have risked anything rather than have been a participator in any measure which should have a tendency to annex southern territory to the States of this Union. He had no doubt that California and New Mexico would be free territory; but still, on account of its contiguity to the southern portion of the Union, he opposed its acquisition, because, in consequence of a similarity of climate and production, the interests of that Territory would of course be similar to those of the southern portion of the Union, and they would oppose the adoption of measures for the exclusive benefit of the northern portion of the Union.

This contest, then, has, as you perceive, grown out of a conflict between the moneyed interests of the country on the one hand, and the agricultural industry of the country on the other. I see it stated, sir, as a statistical fact, that out of the twenty-three million persons in this country in 1850, there were but two millions engaged in agricultural pursuits. Twenty-one millions, then, of the people of the country, derived their entire subsistence from the other two millions engaged in agricultural pursuits. It is, then, of course, for the interest of those not engaged in agricultural pursuits, constituting as they do the great majority of the whole people, to obtain legislation that shall favor them at the expense of those who are engaged in these pursuits. I say that is their interest, and it is, therefore, their policy to break down the political power of that portion of the Union which is engaged in agriculture, and which must, perhaps, always be chiefly so engaged, and to obtain in Congress the power to favor class legislation.

Now, sir, when you have obtained the power and undertake to use it for the protection of the manufacturing, the mechanical, and other interests of the country, at the sacrifice of the agricultural interests of the country, you cannot expect that we shall submit to so unjust a system of legislation. Therefore I say that, in my humble opinion, the day is not far distant when the South will be compelled, from necessity, to protect her rights against the oppression of the North; and when that time does come, there is no people on the face of the earth more determined to preserve their honor untarnished, and their equality unimpaired.

Mr. Chairman, we now have territory enough to make fifteen or twenty more new States. Now, sir, let these States come into the Union as free States, and you then have thirty-five States, whose interest it is to secure legislation antagonistic to the agricultural and cotton regions of the country. And who can doubt that oppression against the agricultural interests will be carried to such an extent that every man will be ready to defend himself, as did our revolutionary fathers, against the tyranny of unjust legislation in the Halls of Congress?

Sir, Federal interference in the local interests of the States was never contemplated by our fathers who framed the Constitution under which we live. The primary object of the Government was to regulate all the external relations of the nation, to regulate our intercourse with foreign Governments, but not to interfere to any very great extent in the local legislation of the country. They knew very well that a law passed for the exclusive benefit of the State of Massachusetts might, from the nature of things, operate unfavorably to the interests of Georgia. They knew also that a law passed for the exclusive benefit of the State of Georgia might, from the difference of soil and climate, be fatal to the interests of the State of Massachusetts. Therefore, they left to each the right of regulating its own legislation in reference to its own local interests.

Now, then, whenever you can change this policy of the General Government; whenever you can, by combination, obtain sufficient strength to enable you to use the Government for the robbery and oppression of the State of Mississippi, or any other State in this Union, either North, South, East, or West, that moment, I hesitate not to say, that State or that section would rise in rebellion—if you see proper to call it by that name—and resist it with the bayonet if it cannot otherwise be resisted. To that, in my opinion, it must ultimately come. Why? If we appeal to your justice, what is granted to us? If we appeal to the Constitution, which is the creation of our common forefathers, what is the answer?

Sir, we are told scornfully that, by the higher law, and in virtue of numbers in the Halls of Congress, never again shall a slave State be admitted into the Union. We are told more than this; we are told that our people, however rapid the growth of their population, or however rapid the exhaustion of our soil in the production of those great commodities which constitute the basis of our commercial wealth, shall not be permitted to expand; that if they attempt it the strong arm of the Federal Government shall be stretched out to arrest upon foreign soil, where they have placed their feet, the bold pioneers from our midst, and that they shall be brought back and placed upon our shores again. Well, sir, when gentlemen have got the power, what will be the condition of the country? Do they expect us to tamely submit, when they shall pass a law advancing northern commerce, at the expense of the agricultural pursuits of the South, and when they shall pass a law to advance the manufacturing interests of the North, at the expense of the interests of the South? What then, think you, will be the condition of the country? Do you think we will longer submit to it? If you do, you are much mistaken.

Mr. Chairman, there is no man in this House who loves the Union more than the people of the South. They love it, as I have already said, for the glories which cluster round its birth, for the gallant deeds of men of the North and men of the South during the revolutionary struggles—men whose ashes now repose in a common grave, into which they went down fighting shoulder to shoulder for their common rights of liberty and equality. We love this Union; we have ever loved it; we have ever sustained it; but, Mr. Chairman, there is a point beyond which patience ceases to be a virtue, a point beyond which aggression upon us can be no longer borne. When the time comes we shall do our duty as we do our duty now.

Mr. LEACH. Mr. Chairman, it is the unquestioned right of the sovereign people to understand fully, in all its bearings, whatever is recommended to the favorable consideration of Congress by the Chief Magistrate of the nation. And, sir, it is evidently our duty, as Representatives of the people, to investigate thoroughly all matters that have thus received the Executive sanction; to receive, approve, and adopt what is just and expedient; and to expose and reject what is unjust or inexpedient. This is not simply our privilege—not a matter optional with us to be done or left undone; but an imperative duty, a faithful performance of which our constituents have a right to expect at our hands. Hence, I rejoice at the entire freedom with which the annual message of the President is examined and criticised, both in this Hall and in the other wing of the Capitol. It is necessary—highly necessary, and eminently proper, that this should be done. These annual repetitions of a close and searching examination of that important document are essential to the highest usefulness, the purity and permanence of our system of government. A fearless and manly exercise of this inalienable and constitutionally guaranteed right of freedom of discussion, cannot be neglected or surrendered without imperiling all that we, as American citizens, most sacredly cherish.

I am aware, sir, that discussions on these occasions are sometimes deemed unnecessarily severe on the Executive; but it must be remembered that when a man assumes the direction of the affairs of this great nation, he voluntarily makes himself the servant of many millions of freemen; each of whom has a right to know how he discharges his duties, and to proclaim his approval or declare his disapprobation, in such terms as he may deem most appropriate. And it should be further remembered, that ordinary men only are reached by ordinary means. Those in high places, who have power and patronage in their hands, may commit with impunity deeds which would be regarded as infamous, if perpetrated by the untitled and the weak. Hence, a more thorough exposure, a more emphatic and severe condemnation becomes necessary when men in high places make serious mistakes or commit great crimes.

The people, sir, have a high regard for the presidential office, and when worthily filled, for the President himself. But they do not always receive with confidence, and unreservedly adopt, the opinions of him who may happen to bear the honored title; for since the fathers of the Republic fell asleep, they have learned, by sad experience, how often and how far even a President may stray from the landmarks of freedom. Often has been verified to them the truth of Jefferson's declaration, that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty;" and they have learned to know that the higher the sphere in which a public functionary moves, the greater the necessity for closely scrutinizing his acts, and cautiously weighing his recommendations. No man's opinion, in matters of moment, is to be taken upon trust; and least of all that of a public officer on matters of grave political import. And the subject becomes of the first importance, and demands cautious, wise, and decided action, when that opinion bears directly or indirectly on the freedom of any part of the great family of man; or when it tends toward the establishment of rules that are liable to be construed as favorable to slavery, or as hostile to any of those "inalienable rights" which are the birthright of every member of the human race.

Hence, sir, I have a few remarks to offer upon what the President has been pleased to recommend, relative to the Africans liberated from the Spanish ship Amistad, by the authorities of the United States, some eighteen years ago. I choose to speak upon this part of the message rather than that other and more important portion which treats of "popular sovereignty" and African slavery in Kansas; for the reason, that in both branches of Congress that subject has already been ably discussed, and other gentlemen around me, I am sure, will pursue it still further, until the unparalleled iniquities practiced upon the freemen of that unhappy Territory shall be fully exposed to the view of an indignant and outraged people. At the same time, I am anxious that every word the President has uttered in his message at the behest and for the interests of slavery, should receive due attention; for I am confident in the belief that there are multitudes in the free States who supported him for the office he now holds, that did not do it designedly for the benefit of slavery, and that will repudiate with scorn his efforts in its behalf, and henceforth give their influence and their votes to men whose lives are a sufficient pledge that they will ever be found true to the cause of freedom. Hence, I pay my respects to that portion of the message which relates to the Amistad Africans.

This subject has been at least twice before brought to the attention of Congress; once by President Polk, and once by the immediate predecessor of the present incumbent. Yet Congress has not hitherto deemed it worthy of serious consideration; and I trust that since the matter has slept so long and so quietly, it will not now meet with favor at the hands of this body. And I am not without confidence that it will be permitted to sleep on; or, that if brought into the House, it will meet the fate it so eminently deserves, and be indignantly rejected by an expression so emphatic that neither the present incumbent of the presidential office, nor any of his successors will ever again venture to intrude it upon the attention of Congress. Sure I am, if gentleman will but give the subject the attention it deserves, they can arrive at no other conclusion than that it has no business here.

But let us hear what the Executive says relative to this matter. I quote entire his remarks touching our relations with Spain:

"I regret to say that no progress whatever has been made, since the adjournment of Congress, toward the settlement of any of the numerous claims of our citizens against the Spanish Government. Besides, the outrage committed on our flag by the Spanish war frigate Ferrolana on the high seas, off the coast of Cuba, in March, 1855, by firing into the American mail steamer El Dorado, and detaining and searching her, remains unacknowledged and unredressed. The general tone and temper of the Spanish Government towards that of the United States are much to be regretted. Our present Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Madrid has asked to be recalled; and it is my purpose to send out a new Minister to Spain, with special instructions on all questions pending between the two Governments, and with a determination to have them speedily and amicably adjusted, if this be possible. In the mean time, whenever our Minister urges the just claims of our citizens on the notice of the Spanish Government, he is met with the objection that Congress have never made the appropriation recommended by President Polk, in his annual message of December, 1847, 'to be paid to the Spanish Government for the purpose of distribution among the claimants in the Amistad case.' A similar recommendation was made by my immediate predecessor in his message of December, 1853, and entirely concurring with both in the opinion that this indemnity is justly due under the treaty with Spain of the 27th October, 1793, I earnestly recommend such an appropriation to the favorable consideration of Congress."

So, if the President is correct, our Minister at the Court of Spain is unsuccessful in pressing the "just claims of our citizens," partly because of the neglect of this Government to pay for the Amistad Africans. And to remove this difficulty, to put that kingdom in better "tone and temper," the President "earnestly recommends an appropriation to the favorable consideration of Congress."

Now, sir, for one, I shall not vote for an appropriation to put Spain, or any other Power, in better "tone and temper" towards our own Government. If our citizens have just claims against the Spanish Government, we are abundantly able to see that ample justice is done them. Shall we bribe Spain, or any other Power, to deal fairly by our citizens? Shall we pay her a price for rendering to our people what is equitably theirs? Shall we purchase justice at the hands of any Government on earth? As an American citizen, sir, I say no, never!

If Spain is justly indebted to the citizens of this Republic, let their demands be properly presented, with the requisite proof, and it is more than probable they will be recognized and paid. But if they are not—if they are rejected—then let her as we would let Mexico, or Central America, know, under similar circumstances, that justice must be done, without evasion, equivocation, or delay. Sir, we are not, I trust, so pitifully weak and so despicably mean as to be compelled to pay a price for the privilege of fair dealing with foreign Powers. As we grant justice to others, so we should require it at their hands; and it is not idle boasting to say, that if we firmly demand it we shall speedily receive it.

How different is the language of the President from that used by Jackson relative to another European nation, whose power is far more formidable than that of Spain. But this is not surprising, not at all; for "progress"—the "Democratic progress" of the last twenty years, of which we hear so much—has played strange pranks with American parties and politics, and wrought marvelous changes in the opinions and character of American Presidents and judges!

But, sir, if it is really desirable, as I doubt not it is, to improve the "tone and temper" of the Spanish Government and the Spanish people towards the American Republic, I can suggest a remedy easy of application, that will accomplish all the most earnest friend of peace could wish; and that, too, without drawing upon the almost empty vaults of the Federal Treasury.

Sir, let us convince our transatlantic neighbor that we are not a nation of pirates. Let us prove to her that we respect and will observe and enforce the laws of nations. Let us give her to understand that the sacred rights of property shall not be violated; that neither the strong arm of the Government, nor the bloody hand of the filibuster, shall wrest from her, or attempt to wrest from her, the beautiful and fertile islands over which she rules in this western hemisphere. Let us repudiate the false doctrine, which has found too many supporters in high places, that those islands are ours of right, are necessary to our safety, and must be secured at whatever cost of blood or treasure.

Why, sir, so bold and reckless, so lawless and rampant, has this filibustering spirit become, that it casts off all restraint, overleaps all barriers, and here, in these council halls of the Republic, openly declares in favor of "national grand larceny." Said the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HASKIN,] the other day—

"I beg the gentlemen of the South not to believe that I am in the least tinctured with any sickly sentimentality on the subject of filibustering. I am a national filibuster, but am against individual filibustering, which retards the consummation of my desire with regard to Central America and other territories which we ought to have. I believe that the time has come when the application of the doctrine promulgated by the Ostend manifesto is necessary for the protection and preservation of our Pacific possessions and the continuance of our commercial rights in that quarter."

"I am for the nation seizing upon Cuba, and, for that purpose, suspending the neutrality law. I am a national filibuster, and will go with the gentleman from South Carolina to that extent. And let me say that northern Democrats are right on the subject. They believe that they have come by this feeling naturally from their mother country, the country which gave to the South her cavaliers, and to the North a great many of her puritans and roundheads. We northern Democrats believe that the Government should, by conquest, do certain things; but that this business of Walker was committing petty larceny. We northern Democrats are rather in favor of national grand larceny."

There, sir, is what I suppose we may properly term the last revised creed of the national filibusters. That is filibustering gone to seed! That is modern, progressive, pro-slavery Democracy run mad! That is piracy reduced to system; robbery made respectable; the old tyrannic principle that "might makes right" republicanized and held up for the younger members of the Democratic family to study, and for the older ones to swear by! It is the same dogma that has been in the mouths of tyrants from the earliest history of our race till the present moment; the same that has kept nine tenths of mankind in slavery; that has filled the world with chains and wretchedness and woe, and spread darkness more fearful than that of midnight over the greater part of man's earthly heritage!

Sir, if we would put the Government and people of Spain in better "tone and temper" towards this Republic, we can very readily do it by repudiating all such unfounded dogmas, and by showing, both by our words and our acts, that we still have regard for the rights of nations and for international law. Said the Father of his country in his farewell address:

"Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all; religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it?"

How worthy these words of their distinguished author! Well will it be for us, and for those that are to come after us, if we give heed to this sage advice, and by every proper means seek to "cultivate peace and harmony with all nations." Let us do this in good faith, and that feeling of amity and good will that so long existed between the two nations, will be at once restored. The "tone and temper" of the Spanish nation towards this Republic will be changed, and all our minor difficulties can be readily and amicably adjusted.

But now, sir, let us come to the real merits of this Amistad case. The President avers his belief that "this indemnity is justly due under the treaty with Spain, of the 27th October, 1795." The ninth article of the treaty is the one mainly relied on by the advocates of this indemnity, as it was by the pretended owners of the Amistad negroes at the time the cause was tried in the United States courts. That article provides:

"That all ships and merchandise, of what nature soever, which shall be rescued out of the hands of any pirates or robbers on the high seas, shall be brought into some port of either State, and shall be delivered to the custody of the officers of that port, in order to be taken care of and restored entire to the true proprietor, as soon as due and sufficient proof shall be made concerning the property thereof."

As Mr. Justice Story well said, in delivering the opinion of the court:

"To bring the case within the article, it is essential to establish: First, That these negroes, under all the circumstances, fall within the description of merchandise in the sense of the treaty; Secondly, That there has been a rescue of them on the high seas out of the hands of the pirates and robbers; and, thirdly, That Ruiz & Montez, the asserted proprietors, are the true proprietors, and have established their title by competent proof."

First, then, do these negroes fall within the description of merchandise in the sense of the treaty? It appeared in evidence before the court, that "they were natives of Africa, and were kidnapped there, and were unlawfully transported to Cuba, in violation of the laws and treaties of Spain, and the most solemn edicts and declarations of that Government." Spain, by treaty with Great Britain, had abolished the slave trade as early as 1820; and had directed that every negro introduced into her colonies in violation of the treaty, should be declared free in the first port at which he should arrive. Again, in 1835, another treaty was made between Great Britain and Spain, for the avowed purpose of "rendering the means taken for abolishing the inhuman traffic in slaves more effective." In this last treaty it is said: "The slave trade is again declared, on the part of Spain, to be, henceforward, totally and finally abolished, in all parts of the world." And still later, by royal ordinance, on the 2d of November, 1838, the authorities of Cuba were stimulated to renewed efforts to suppress the "inhuman traffic."

Such, in brief, were the laws and treaties of Spain, when, in 1839, these negroes were stolen by pirates—pirates by the laws of our own country and worse than pirates by the laws of God—and unlawfully carried to the Island of Cuba. A few days later, while being conveyed by the Amistad to another part of the island, they rose on their oppressors, achieved their independence, and some two months afterward were captured by a United States vessel on the Long Island coast. They had never been reduced to slavery. They were free by the laws of Spain; free by the laws of nations; and free, as they ever had been, by the eternal, impartial, and unchanging laws of Heaven. They were, as they ever had been, in that condition in which a very respectable and venerable public document declares that "all men are created;" they were "free," and there was no law in the Spanish dominions or in the United States by which they could be reduced to slavery.

But, sir, I go further than this, and assert that if these Amistad Africans had been slaves by the laws of Spain, the treaty-making power of this nation had no authority to surrender them as "merchandise." It had no constitutional right to treat them as "merchandise," in any manner whatsoever.

Whence does the treaty-making power derive its authority? Of course, from the second paragraph of section two of the second article of the Constitution. It is true the language there used is indefinite, and were it not for other parts of the instrument, the President and Senate would scarcely have any bounds set to their authority as a treaty-making power. But all parts of the Constitution must be harmoniously construed; and inasmuch as it nowhere speaks of men as "merchandise," nowhere speaks of them as property; nowhere even speaks of them as slaves; it is doing violence to language, and outraging the rights of the people, to assume that it sanctions the idea that men are or can be property. Indeed, the tenor of the whole instrument is unequivocally and emphatically anti-slavery. It was "ordained and established" by "the people of the United States" to secure, among other things, "the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity." It was to secure those "inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," in defense of which they had recently parted so freely with their blood and treasure. They had just emancipated themselves from British thralldom; they had just declared to the world, in the most solemn manner, their unqualified belief "that all men are created equal;" they had at divers times and places expressed in strong terms their disapprobation of the slave trade, and, in not a few instances, their anxiety to secure the freedom of the whole people. I might quote, almost without number, instances in which southern men in revolutionary days, in eloquent terms, condemned the African slave trade—that very traffic, by virtue of which the President now calls upon us to make this appropriation. But I will not, on this point, detain the committee, as these facts are notorious. Yet I cannot resist the temptation to show, from the record, what the statesmen of Virginia and of Georgia thought of chattel slavery in the "times that tried men's souls." Listen to the patriotic voice of Virginia:

"At a very full meeting of delegates from the different counties in the colony and dominion of Virginia, begun in Williamsburg, the 1st day of August, in the year of our Lord 1774, and continued, by several adjournments, to Saturday, the 6th of the same month, the following association was unanimously resolved upon and agreed to."

"2d. We will neither ourselves import, nor purchase any slave or slaves imported by any other person, after the 1st day of November next, either from Africa, the West Indies, or any other place."

"For the most trifling reasons, and sometimes for no conceivable reason at all, his Majesty has rejected laws of the most salutary tendency. The abolition of domestic slavery is the greatest object of desire in those colonies where it was unlawfully introduced in their infant state. But, previous to the enfranchisement of the slaves we have, it is necessary to exclude all further importations from Africa. Yet our repeated attempts to effect this by prohibitions, and by imposing duties which might amount to a prohibition, have hitherto been defeated by his Majesty's negative; thus preferring the immediate advantages of a few African corsairs to the lasting interests of the American States, and to the rights of human nature, deeply wounded by this infamous practice."—See American Archives, fourth series, vol. 1, pages 636 to 696.

Hear, too, what the good people of Georgia said of the "unnatural practice of slavery:"

"Darien (Georgia) Resolutions."

"IN THE DARIEN COMMITTEE,
Thursday, January 12, 1775."

"5. To show the world that we are not influenced by any contracted or interested motives, but a general philanthropy for all mankind, of whatever climate, language, or complexion, we hereby declare our disapprobation and abhorrence of the unnatural practice of slavery in America, (how ever the uncultivated state of our country, or other specious arguments, may plead for it,) a practice founded in injustice and cruelty, and highly dangerous to our liberties, as well as lives, debasing part of our fellow-creatures below men, and corrupting the virtue and morals of the rest; and which is laying the basis of that liberty we contend for (and which we pray the Almighty to continue to the latest posterity) upon a wrong foundation. We therefore resolve, at all times, to use our utmost endeavors for the manumission of our slaves in this colony, upon the most safe and equitable footing for the masters and themselves."—Page 1136.

Such, sir, was even Georgia Democracy in 1775. What is Georgia Democracy to-day? Said a member from that State, [Mr. GARTRELL,] but a day or two since—and he said it, too, in the sacred name of Democracy—

"I hold that the institution of domestic slavery in the South is right, both in principle and practice; that it has ever been, and still is, a blessing to the African race; that it has developed the resources of this great country to an untold extent; and that, by its conservative influences, it has elevated us in the scale of morality, wealth, enterprise, and intelligence, to a point never attained by any other people.

"As a southern man, proud of the place of my nativity; as the owner of slaves; as conscientious of my moral obligations, I trust, as any gentleman on this floor, I hesitate not, here or elsewhere, to defend this institution as being strictly in accordance with the principles of right, of Christian duties, and of morality, and as having the highest sanction of laws, both human and divine."

I have not one word of comment to make on this declaration—not a word. Let it go to the people of the free North "without note or comment." I cannot make it plainer, and I know of but one way to render it more impressive than it now is. There is an illustrious namesake of mine, whose genius shines conspicuous in every number of the London Punch, who, above all men, is qualified to illustrate truths so sublime as these! Let us have an illustrated edition upon which men shall look and be converted, whether they will or not. Some men do not seem to feel the power of truth, but the artist can oftentimes make them see it. Give us an illustrated edition of modern Democracy; the theme is a grand one; the materials rich!

I have shown, sir, what were the sentiments of a considerable portion of the people of Georgia and Virginia in revolutionary days. And it is a matter of history that similar views prevailed to no inconsiderable extent in the southern half of the Confederacy at that time, while at the North the feeling was wide-spread and almost universal. And when, after the achievement of colonial independence, the delegates of the several States met in convention to form a national Constitution, this anti-slavery feeling was still strong; so strong that it carefully excluded from that Constitution "the idea that there could be property in men." Mr. Madison thought it wrong to admit such an idea. It was not admitted, and neither the treaty-making power, nor the legislative power, nor the judicial power has authority to place it there.

The Constitution was made in a better age than this, while the love of freedom and the hatred of oppression that sustained our fathers through a struggle unparalleled in the world's history yet glowed in their hearts and gave character to their deeds. It was made previous to the grand discovery that African slavery is a "divine" institution, approved of God, and destined to last forever. It was made long before the promulgation of the doctrine that slavery is the true "corner stone of republican institutions." The Constitution was venerable with age before it was suspected of being a pro-slavery instrument; and its authors had been "gathered to their fathers" before courts and Presidents attempted by gross perversion of its true meaning to crush out freedom and to force slavery upon communities and States that regard it with utter loathing. Yes, it was made in a better, a more patriotic age than this—an age when the fires of freedom, kindled during the revolutionary struggle, still brightly burned on every hill-top; when the public heart beat strong for liberty, and the public conscience was pure and just; when slavery was regarded as a national curse, forced upon us by the then recently humbled monarch of Britain, but destined to be speedily extinguished; when, in short, politicians did not ignore precedent and truth and justice and conscience, nor limit their labors to the advancement of their own interests, or the up-building of a corrupt, slavery-extension, slavery-perpetuating, freedom-destroying party! It was made in an age when statesmen were afraid and ashamed to acknowledge, in such an instrument, that man might make "merchandise" of his fellow. Afraid? Yes. Said Mr. Jefferson, when contemplating the enormities of the system—

"I tremble for my country when I remember that God is just, and that his vengeance will not sleep forever!"

And there are men now, sir, that tremble for their country, and they mean to save that country which they love so well from utter subjection to the slave power. They do not mean that a sectional institution, anti-Republican and anti-Democratic in its every form and feature, shall be nationalized; that men everywhere shall be recognized as "merchandise," sold like beasts in the shambles, and driven by the lash of the taskmaster to unwilling and unrequited toil! They mean that these things shall not be, save in the States where they already exist; and even there, we say, do them not in the name of the Federal Constitution! Such acts, in the name of that sacred charter of our liberties, are sacrilege! They are unpardonable political sins! No, sir, the Constitution does not make men "merchandise;" does not recognize them as "merchandise;" permits no inferences to be drawn from it that there is any analogy between "merchandise" and the bones and flesh and blood and souls of which men are made. It nowhere gives countenance to the idea that, by any possibility, can men be converted into "merchandise;" nowhere authorizes the Government to treat them as aught else than "persons," entitled to its support, and justly claiming its protection.

These Amistad Africans, then, were not only not "merchandise in the sense of the treaty," but they were freemen, unjustly and illegally restrained of their liberty by lawless pirates, against whom it was their right to rise in arms, and whose overthrow at their hands was a meritorious act. Yes, sir; they did as you and I, and all others worthy to bear the name of men would do in like circumstances; and the act was approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, and by unprejudiced men everywhere.

But even if it were true that these Africans were "merchandise in the sense of the treaty," it was necessary, said the court—and in this the court was unquestionably right—that the claimants should show that "there had been a rescue of them on the high seas out of the hands of pirates and robbers." This was not shown; it could not be shown. The negroes were in possession of the Amistad at the time she was boarded and captured by the United States marines. Yet they were claimed under the treaty as "merchandise" which had been "rescued out of the hands of pirates and robbers!" They were "merchandise" one day; "pirates and robbers" the next; and again, on the third, changed to "merchandise."

And here is a difficulty for the advocates of this indemnity scheme to solve: If these Africans were "pirates and robbers"—and unless they were they do not fall within the terms of the treaty, for it was out of their own "hands" that they were "rescued"—they would, by the laws of Spain, had they been delivered up to her authorities, have been subject to the death penalty, the punishment pronounced, I believe, in all countries upon those guilty of piracy. And can we for a moment suppose that in a case of robbery and piracy so aggravated as Spain has assumed to consider this, she would have failed to stringently enforce the law? Would she not have required the "pound of flesh" as "nominated in the bond?" And if so, what would the cargo of the Amistad have been worth to Ruiz & Montez? If the "pirates" had been hung, what would have been the fate of the "merchandise?" In this light, then, the liberation of the Africans by the Supreme Court caused no loss to their pretended owners.

Again, to bring this case within the terms of the treaty, it was indispensable for Ruiz & Montez to establish their title to the "merchandise" by "due and sufficient proof." On this point a brief extract from the opinion of the court shall suffice. I quote from 15th Peters's reports, page 593:

"It is plain beyond controversy, if we examine the evidence, that these negroes never were the lawful slaves of Ruiz & Montez, or of any other Spanish subjects. They are natives of Africa, and were kidnapped there, and were unlawfully transported to Cuba, in violation of the laws and treaties of Spain, and the most solemn edicts and declarations of that Government. By those laws and treaties and edicts, the African slave trade is utterly abolished; the dealing in that trade is deemed a heinous crime; and the negroes thereby introduced into the dominions of Spain are declared to be free. Ruiz & Montez are proved to have made the pretended purchase of these negroes with a full knowledge of all the circumstances; and so cogent and irresistible is the evidence in this respect, that the district attorney has admitted, in open court, upon the record, that these negroes were native Africans, and recently imported into Cuba, as alleged in their answers to the libels in the case. The supposed proprietary interest of Ruiz & Montez is completely displaced, if we are at liberty to look at the evidence or the admissions of the district attorney."

Again, the Court says, on page 596:

"Upon the merits of the case, then, there does not seem to us to be any ground for doubt that these negroes ought to be deemed free, and that the Spanish treaty interposes no obstacle to the just assertion of their rights."

Such, sir, was the view taken of this subject by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1841. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Judge Story, who has had few equals, and no superiors, as an expounder of law, in this or other lands; and there was great unanimity of opinion among the members of the Court, only one—Mr. Justice Baldwin—dissenting; a unity of sentiment that did not exist in the Dred Scott case, which gentlemen on the other side regard as a final and unquestionable settlement of an important principle. And it is beyond dispute that the President regards the action of the Court in the latter case as final. Thus, speaking in his late message of the slaves now in Kansas, he says:

"These slaves were brought into the Territory under the Constitution of the United States, and are now the property of their masters. This point has at length been finally decided by the highest judicial tribunal of the country."

Now, it is a fair inquiry, why the President should view these two decisions of the Supreme Court in lights so very different? Surely no one will pretend that there was less legal acumen, less soundness of judgment, less honesty of purpose, in the court of 1841, than in the court of 1857. No one would dare so wickedly to wrong the illustrious dead. There must be some other potent reason why the Executive "earnestly recommends" Congress to disregard or overthrow the decision in the Amistad case, and in the same document pronounces the Dred Scott decision "final." Nor is it difficult to discover what that reason is. The former is an anti-slavery decision, the latter pro-slavery. The one preserved freedom to some fifty Africans; the other entails, or is designed to entail, slavery upon countless thousands. The one was made in the spirit that governed public men in the better days of the Republic; the other was an unholy attempt to give a solemn judicial sanction to those ultra pro-slavery interpretations of the Constitution, which, although of recent origin, have already deeply stained the soil of one fair territory with the blood of many freemen, and have shaken the very foundations of the Union itself. The one was in accordance with the genius of our republican institutions, and in harmony with the principles of our religion, and the feelings of good men throughout the world; the other did gross violence to the Constitution of our country—gross injustice to the wise and patriotic men who framed it, and the equally wise and upright jurists who had so long interpreted it in a manner favorable to free labor and free men; and last, but not least, gross violence to the humane feelings, and gross despite to the common sense of nine tenths of the civilized portion of the great brotherhood of man.

It is humiliating to my pride as an American citizen to say it, (and I earnestly wish it were not true,) but I see no other, I can discover no other reason for the alacrity and earnestness with which the President hurries to conclusions so directly opposite, with reference to the respect due these two decisions of the same judicial tribunal. The slave power, "the power behind the throne," willed it, and at once its will was recognized as law. The chief Executive of the nation yielded a ready and willing obedience. He recognized this extra-judicial opinion of a majority of the Justices of the Supreme Court as the "final" settlement of a grave national political question.

Notwithstanding the Court had admitted its want of jurisdiction over this very case; notwithstanding the opinion given overturned previous decisions, made under more auspicious circumstances, and acquiesced in by the people and all the departments of the Government through a long series of years; notwithstanding the sectional, partisan, anti-republican character of the opinion itself; notwithstanding it overthrew doctrines which the President had himself held and advocated with zeal and ability at an earlier period of his life; and notwithstanding the notorious fact that this opinion was opposed and logically demolished, utterly annihilated, by two of the ablest justices on the bench; notwithstanding all these things, which should certainly have made the Executive at least a little cautious, he receives it with a hearty amen, pronounces it "final," and declares it a "mystery" how the doctrines advanced "could ever have been seriously doubted."

And then, as before stated, he "earnestly recommends" Congress to overrule the decision in the Amistad case, and pay Ruiz & Montez for negroes whom they never owned. Am I not right in saying that this can only be explained by looking at the "power behind the throne?" What other motive but a desire to conciliate that power could have induced the President to make this remarkable recommendation? But here, it seems to me, he went even further than was necessary to prove his fealty to slavery; for his position on Kansas affairs places him first on the list of the champions of that very peculiar institution. It proves the truth of all that his southern friends urged in his behalf during the canvass that preceded his election, and equally demonstrates the falsity of the positions assumed by his supporters in the free States. Why, sir, a leading southern journal, the Richmond Enquirer, declared that his record "disclosed a consistency and an efficiency of service to the South which flattery could claim for no other living man;" and that "he never gave a vote against the interests of slavery, nor uttered a word that could pain the most sensitive southern heart!" How completely has he met the expectations of his southern friends! His "consistency and efficiency of service" in their behalf continues, and their "sensitive hearts" have not yet been pained by any word or act of his!

But how is it at the North? We were everywhere told in that section of the Union that Mr. Buchanan was a northern man; that his sympathies were with those who were striving to make Kansas a free State; and that, if elected, no "aid and comfort" would be extended by him to the ruffian horde that had sought, by fraud and force, to introduce this heartless despotism, in opposition to the will of a large majority of the people. Why, sir, the watchwords of his friends in the North were, "Buchanan and Free Kansas!" Well, they secured Buchanan, but not yet have they secured freedom to Kansas; nor is the prospect very encouraging that he, whose name was thus linked with this important measure, is at all likely to promote its success. On the contrary, so open, bold, and utterly indefensible and inexcusable has been his course upon this most important of all questions now before the American people, that the very men who elevated him to the Presidency turn away chagrined and disgusted, and shake off the dust of their feet as a testimony against him. Well may the President, well may his deluded and distracted followers, well may every Democrat who formerly advocated the good old Jeffersonian doctrine of the Wilmot proviso, exclaim in that bitterness of heart which the prospective utter ruin of their party must cause—

"Oh! what a tangled web we weave,
When thus we practice to deceive."

Tangled and intricate, indeed, are the results which have grown out of the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and the specious and delusive cry of "popular sovereignty," by means of which that repeal was secured.

Yet the political troubles that now distract and threaten our country are not remediless. The disinterested patriotism, the devotion to country, the reverence for justice, the regard for human rights, which animated the founders of the Government, now warming the hearts and controlling the acts of people, President and Congress, would lead to a speedy and easy solution of all our difficulties, give peace and repose to the country, and security to all within its borders.

We of the free States, sir, are not unreasonable. Indeed, we are very modest in our demands. We ask only that the rights guaranteed to us, "the people of the United States," by the Constitution, and conceded to us during the earlier years of the Republic, be restored. We ask that the Constitution be interpreted in the same spirit in which it was made—that it be construed as the "charter of liberty," not as the bulwark of slavery. We demand that slavery be confined to the States in which it already exists; and that, as a State institution, it rely solely on State support, neither seeking nor receiving "aid and comfort" from the General Government. We demand that all the Territories, and this District of Columbia, be purged of this blighting curse, and that northern freemen be no longer required to join the chase for fugitive slaves. We demand, in short, the complete denationalization of slavery. "No slavery outside of the present slave States" is our motto.

With slavery in the States where it exists we do not propose to interfere; but we are unalterably pledged against its further extension. We shall contest its onward march at every step. We shall write it down, print it down, preach it down, vote it down. We are in earnest, sir, in this matter; and we know that we shall triumph, for truth is omnipotent. God and the hearts of the people are with us; and though the struggle may be long and fearful, the final result is as certain as the continuance of time. We shall labor on, regardless alike of smiles of derision or frowns of defiance. We trust we love our common country and the Union of these States as well, at least, as other men; but we love our country's freedom and the ESSENTIAL RIGHTS OF MAN better still. Peace we love, but we do not desire it at the expense of our inalienable rights; yet we believe peaceable remedies are best, and that by such remedies all our political maladies may be healed. We design to use them, and them only. We have faith in their efficiency, and in them we trust.

But if we, or our kindred and fellow-citizens in the Territories, cannot have peace without a base and dishonorable submission to the slave oligarchy, then we do not desire it. If money contributed by northern men is to be drawn from the Federal Treasury to reward Spanish pirates for their deeds of blood; if from the same national fund millions are to be annually drawn to sustain, perpetuate, and extend this most odious of despotisms; if we are to join in the pursuit of fugitive slaves on our own free soil, or, for refusing so to do, are to be robbed of our substance and rot in prison; if our mouths are to be closed and our presses silenced anywhere beneath the stars and stripes; if the rights of the States are to be disregarded, and insinuations which we hate unceremoniously thrust upon us; if all the departments of the Government are to make the diffusion and perpetuity of this "sum of all villainies" the primary object of their labors; if the poisoned political chalice is to be thus constantly pressed to our lips; if all that we hold dear is to be laid upon the bloody altar of slavery, I can only say that when these wrongs have reached a point no longer tolerable, the freemen of the land will rise in their strength and remove them, "peaceably if possible, forcibly if necessary."

These, sir, are not idle words. They but express what I know to be an earnest and deep-seated feeling among the masses of intelligent and thinking men throughout the free States. Most certainly they are the sentiments of the nineteen thousand freemen by virtue of whose votes I have the honor of a seat on this floor.

We feel, sir, that the point where forbearance ceases to be a virtue is almost reached. It is very near; and I warn gentlemen to beware how they press these indignities home upon the freemen of the North henceforth. I know the strength of the Government, and that its power is now in your hands. The President is with you; the Congress is yours; the Supreme Court is ready to do your bidding; and the hungry cormorants that feed and fatten at the public crib bow in abject submission, and reverently execute the will, whatever it may be, of those who hold the keys of the Federal Treasury.

But there is, back of all these paid advocates of wrong, a power, compared with which they are but as a withered leaf before the rushing whirlwind. Yes, sir; the people are a power before which Presidents, and Congresses, and courts, with all their pampered retainers and fawning sycophants, dwindle into contemptible littleness. Let those who choose to insult their intelligence, outrage all the better feelings of their nature, and trample ruthlessly upon their dearest rights, look well to the future, and prepare for a reckoning which will surely come, and which from present indications cannot be long delayed. To-day you have the power, and may do what you will. You may give these Spanish pirates $50,000 from the people's Treasury if you choose; but let me tell you, gentlemen, it will add as many thousand voters to the party of freedom in the North and West. And every aggressive act upon our constitutional and reserved rights will have a like effect. The harder you press us the speedier and more complete will be our triumph, and the more ignominious your overthrow. Choose, then, your course; but remember the impending settlement you have to make with the three million voters in the free States of this Union.

In conclusion, sir, I have but to add, that if this appropriation, so "earnestly recommended," is to be made; if some fifty thousand dollars are to be drawn from the Treasury to settle this Amistad affair, I, for one, shall insist upon its going to the parties who were the only ones wronged in that transaction. I shall insist upon its payment to the Africans who so gallantly rescued the ship from Spanish pirates, and whose property it thence became. They had a right to the Amistad, for they captured it from outlaws. It was legally and equitably theirs; and when they were liberated by the court, the property which their valor had won should have been placed at their disposal. The wrongs which these unfortunate men suffered were irreparable; we cannot fully right them now; but do not let us add insult to injury, and disgrace ourselves in the eyes of all Christendom, by rewarding their oppressors, and setting the seal of our official approbation upon an act of inexcusable and unmitigated piracy.

Mr. AVERY. I would have been glad, Mr. Chairman, at the proper time, to have said something concerning our Central American relations; but as this opportunity did not occur when the question was properly before a Committee of the Whole, I will but barely now allude to it.

I would have been pleased, sir, on that occasion—and may yet avail myself of the privilege, in connection with what I conceive to be the unwarranted exercise and usurpation of authority and power on the part of Commodore Paulding—to have spoken somewhat of the relations, present and prospective, which it is the policy, as well as the destiny, of this nation to maintain toward that country. The President has indicated in his message; that it is the destiny of our race to Americanize Central America; that it is the policy of this Government peacefully to do so; that the different transit routes across the isthmus will be opened, kept open, and protected by this Government, not only for our own benefit, but for the benefit of the world. These are all desirable objects; they are, in my judgment, objects of paramount importance to the American people, and especially so at this time.

That the effects of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—a blight, a mildew, an incubus, a nightmare upon American interests and American progress and prospects—should be speedily shaken off; that the great doctrine, known as the Monroe doctrine, should be enforced; that we should maintain our supremacy in the Gulf of Mexico; that Cuba should be ours; are all objects of vast concernment to us as a nation and as a people, and I doubt not are so regarded by the enlightened statesman who now presides over our destinies. But how all these desirable objects are best to be attained are subjects of philosophic inquiry for the statesman. Their importance, at this time, seems to me peculiarly striking. England—ever jealous and far-seeing England—sees the great benefits that would result to us in the accomplishment of these great purposes of national aggrandizement. This day she is the most filibustering nation on the globe; this day she is seeking to extend her already too broad possessions upon this continent; this day would she rejoice, did we never acquire another foot of territory north or south, and especially south. From present indications—unmistakable indications—she herself is looking forward to a formidable competition with us in the production of the great staples of the South. The most casual observer cannot fail to have noticed the wonderful recent revolution going on in the public sentiment of Great Britain upon the subject of African slavery and the slave trade. Already has the monarch of her press proclaimed that the false philanthropy of a Wilberforce has passed away; that his honest but misguided policy has impoverished her possessions; has desolated her colonies; has made her tributary and dependent, when it was in her grasp to govern and control. Listen to the language of the London Times, her great organ—the great popular organ of Britain—speaking fresh for the people, and of the people. It never molds, but reflects, public sentiment. The London Times says:

"Negroes are necessary to raise the cotton, sugar, coffee, and tobacco which the world wants. The white man cannot work under a tropical sun, and unless the African be used as a laborer, the fairest region of the New World must remain a desert; in fine, negroes must be had at any cost. And no nation has a right to impose its own scrupulosity on other free communities."

Her empire in the East, her subjugated Sepoys, are to furnish the labor, free labor as she calls it, but far worse than African slavery. And her colonies in the West, which she already holds, together with what we, by our supineness and masterly inactivity may suffer her to possess, will furnish the field. France, too, is in the fight. It behooves us, then, as a nation, to watch these encroachments upon American soil. It should be no less our policy than it is certainly our destiny, to plant by the most proper means, be they what they may, American labor, American institutions, the American banner if you please, upon every foot of soil in these rich and undeveloped regions. If the more gradual and pacific policy of enlightened settlement and civilization is the best, be it so. But if, for our own self-defense and protection, some other and more speedy means were indispensable in the accomplishment of these grand purposes—in the spirit of the celebrated Ostend manifesto of the President—then be it so. I hastily and imperfectly touch upon these points without attempting to elaborate them. My time now will not allow, nor am I prepared now, to do so even had I the time.

But, sir, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] yesterday said that the President had pressed upon the consideration of this House a question of graver significance, of mightier import, a question which concerns the honor and the life of the nation. Sir, this is about the only declaration in the gentleman's speech to which I can subscribe. I fully concur, that the question of the introduction of a sovereign State into this Union is one of this magnitude and import, and that in this instance the honor and perhaps the life of the nation is concerned. To the present phase of the Kansas question will I then address myself; for it must be acknowledged that within the past year it has assumed as many as the colors of the camelion. The public mind has long since wearied with the never-ending cry of Kansas and her difficulties.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, in the outset, that I regret very much to see the spirit and tone of speech and press which have been to too great a degree indulged in towards those of the Democratic party who have seen fit to differ with the President upon his Kansas policy, however much I may regret this difference. And especially do I not unite in the fierce denunciations which have sometimes of late been hurled at the great author and founder of my faith on this subject, as expounded in the Kansas-Nebraska act. Sir, his deeds of valor in defense of southern rights, his proud uplifting of the Constitution above the fierce fires of fanaticism, are too fresh in my memory for me to anathematize him. It pains me to see it or to hear it. Can any one forget how, but a little while ago, in every conflict we have had, with the bright battle-blade of a Saladin, one by one as they came he clove down the mailed men of Abolitionism; how he stood the Ajax Telamon of his party, and defied them all? I think it in bad taste, at least, ruthlessly and wantonly and in hot haste to hurl such giants over the battlements of party. I have seen and heard his motives assailed; it is not mine to do this; I impugn no man's motives, much less of one whose patriotism has been so lofty, whose devotion to the Constitution seemed so sincere, whose high aims have all along been for his country's good, his country's glory. The Democracy of Tennessee were proud of DOUGLAS; they will not make haste to give him up, and if needs be he must go, the parting to them I know will be a sad one.

It was argued the other day with much zeal by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM] over the way, that the President and his party not only indorsed the Lecompton constitution, but by argument, entreaty, and by threat, seek to induce Congress to indorse it, and thereby give it the sanction and force of law. But that gentleman omitted to point out the line or passage of that message containing such threat. In what part of it is it to be found? The argument of the President is to my mind clear and conclusive that Kansas should be admitted under the Lecompton constitution, not upon the ground of tranquillity only—as stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE,] but of justice. Yes, sir, it is upon the ground of stern justice as well as to restore peace and harmony to a distracted country, that the President plants himself boldly in his message.

It was also argued by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] that this constitution did not emanate from the people of Kansas, was not their will, and that its provisions are in direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States; that it was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity —without proving, or attempting to prove these bold and startling declarations. Where, I ask, is it in conflict with the Constitution of the United States?—did he show us where? Satisfy me that this is so, and it never receives my sanction. I shall show, or attempt to show, that it is the legally, and only legally-expressed will of the people—that it is in strict conformity with the Constitution.

As to the declaration that it was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, this very same, self-same, declaration more than a thousand times was made by the opponents of the Kansas and Nebraska act; and yet, an overwhelming majority of the freemen of this nation have stamped with the broad seal of public condemnation, this calumnious declaration. It was, as eloquently remarked the other day by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] "the second declaration of independence." With what cruel effrontery; then, they now exclaim that this instrument, this Lecompton constitution, was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, when they, themselves, the lawless trampers under foot of all law and forms of laws, stood by and stubbornly refused to prevent—when, according to their own showing, they had it in their power to do so—this foul thing, reeking, as they say, with fraud and corruption, from being fastened upon them! But I will speak of that more fully after a while, and in its proper place.

Mr. Chairman, I think the President deserves well of this nation for the patriotic and constitutional stand he has taken on this much vexed and distracting question. To have done less, he would have, in my humble judgment, departed from the principles of the act itself, and of the platform upon which he stood when he was borne into power. To have done more, would have overstepped and gone beyond that great doctrine which was sought to be established, and which was established for the first time in the history of this Government. The doctrine and principles upon which the great battle was fought and won—what are they? It is not necessary to enter into a minute review of all the ramified relations of the Kansas question. They have been published far and wide; they are familiar to the country; every act which has marked the brief but stirring history of that distracted Territory is fresh in the memory of the most unlettered man. But what, sir, was the great principle, the great theory which was the boast of the Kansas bill? Why, sir, it was that that distracting element which had, upon more terrible occasions than one, frightfully imperiled the Republic, should be withdrawn from the threatening theater of national legislation, and located where it properly belonged—with the people themselves. The advent of this doctrine was rapturously hailed everywhere as the harbinger of peace to the councils of the country. And peace there would have been, but for those disloyal and revolutionary spirits who cannot live in peace. Upon this doctrine the great battle upon which hung the fate of the nation was fought and won. Who were the enemies of this policy? The enemies of this policy at the North were those who were waging a fierce war upon the constitutional rights of the South, who were opposed to the equal rights of all the States, North and South, to the rightful enjoyment of the Territory which had been purchased and won by the common treasure and common blood of all the States—North as well as South.

The enemies of this measure, of this policy, at the South, were too few and feeble to deserve notice; for the whole array of opposition came from the North. Those of the Democratic party who see fit to differ with the President in his Kansas policy, contend that they do not, by so doing; oppose the great principles of the Kansas and Nebraska act; but that they are the only true upholders—defenders of that faith—the vindicators of that policy. The Republican party, opposed to the whole measure, to the doctrine, to the principles of the Kansas and Nebraska act to toto calo; the anti-Administration Democracy contending at the same time that they, and they only, represent the doctrine in all its pristine purity; and yet they stand together, united, one party, as far as this question is concerned. Here, we have presented the political anomaly of parties standing agreed upon a measure—the one swearing hostility to it, and the other claiming to be its orthodox advocates and expounders. Each started traveling in exactly different and opposite directions, and have continued traveling, and yet have come together. How can this be? If the Republican party are true to their original faith in opposition to the fundamental principles of the Kansas and Nebraska act, and stand firm upon them—and I believe they do—and the anti-Administration Democrats stand firm on their original faith in support of the fundamental principles of that act, as they say they do, then how comes it that they are agreed—stand together, fight together, and fall together, too, upon this question? The one party who have all along been alien enemies of the measure, and boasting, too, in that enmity; and the other still stronger boasting in their loyalty to them—now united.

Who have been the fiercest enemies of this constitution in Kansas? Are they not those who have made open and rebellious war upon the Constitution of the country, the rights of the people, and the laws of the land? Have they not, in open defiance of all law and order, with a heart regardless of all social duty, and fatally bent upon mischief, lighted up the torch of civil war in their own distracted borders, and well-nigh throughout the land? Is this the company our friends are found in? I know they do not feel at home there. I know that praise from that quarter sounds not pleasing to their ears.

But let us look a little into this question, and see who have departed from the great cardinal doctrines inaugurated by that policy, they or we who stand by the Administration. They say that popular sovereignty has been violated, because the constitution was not, in all its parts, submitted to the people. What is popular sovereignty? It is the supreme power of the people. What people? Why, the people of Kansas. Power to do what? In the language of the act, from which they got their power to act at all in the premises, it was to be "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." Have the people of Kansas been thus free to do this thing? Have they had an opportunity to form and regulate their institutions in their own way?

In the first place, then, what is meant by "people?" Who were the people who were thus left free to form their institutions? Why, they were that organized body of persons who composed the community of Kansas—organized body, legally-organized body—not the lawless, not the rabble, not the revolutionary, who were doing everything to subvert the free expression of the popular will; they were that organized body of persons who acted through the legally-expressed will of a majority. Why, the Cincinnati platform itself says that the people of a Territory are those in a Territory who act through the legally-expressed will of a majority; not the reckless red-republican-rabble will, expressed without law, or forms of law, but the legally-expressed will. Expressed how? Why, expressed through the ballot-box, at the times and places legally appointed for that purpose; not at those times and places appointed by an irresponsible and illegal, unconstitutional power, but appointed by law, and by those having authority under the law. When and where, I ask, has been expressed, legally expressed, any will of a majority of the people of Kansas, preparatory to the formation of any constitution but the Lecompton constitution? When and where, except at the poll taken first to know whether or not they would call a convention; then to elect delegates to that convention; then to carry out the will of that convention? Have not all these separate and distinct acts of the people of Kansas been acknowledged as legal by the present opposers of the Lecompton constitution? Were they not recognized by Governor Walker? In his letter to the Secretary of State, of the 15th of July, 1857, he says:

"Early in July I proceeded to Paoli, a town in Kansas, situate fifty miles south of Lecompton, where the land sales were then progressing. A very large crowd, not less than one thousand, assembled to hear my address, when the views heretofore expressed by me, substantially, were again repeated. I was answered by one of their favorite orators, of the name of Foster, who, among other things, accused the President of the United States of great inconsistency in opposing the Topeka movement, when it was well known that he had advocated the admission of Michigan as a State, in 1836, under what he (Foster) claimed to be proceedings similar to those at Topeka. Most fortunately I had participated, as a Senator of the United States, in the admission of Michigan, and was enabled to explain the matter satisfactorily to the people. I showed them that, in the case of Michigan, the Territorial Legislature were clothed by Congress with no authority to assemble a constitutional convention and adopt a State constitution; but that, under the comprehensive language of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, the Territorial Legislature was clothed with such authority by the laws of Congress, and that the authority of such a convention to submit the constitution to the vote of the people was as clear and certain as that of Congress itself, and that opposition to such a proceeding was equivalent to opposing the laws of Congress."

They were recognized by Governor Walker, by Mr. Secretary Stanton, and by the distinguished author of the Kansas and Nebraska act, as shown in his Springfield speech, (June 12,) a few days before the assembling of the convention, when he said "that Kansas was about to speak for herself through her delegates, assembled in convention to form a constitution preparatory to her admission into the Union. The law under which her delegates are about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions."

Kansas was about to speak through her delegates; nobody then thought of her speaking in any other way than through her delegates. Well, that is the way she did speak upon all other questions, except the all-absorbing question of slavery; and upon that she subsequently spoke through the people, as well as through her delegates.

By what authority, by what law, or semblance of law, has any other step been taken by the people of Kansas towards the formation of any other constitution? Then what was this people free to do? Why, first to form a constitution, with or without slavery. What is meant by forming a constitution? Form, to make, to create, to establish, to combine in a particular manner: the people, acting through the legally expressed will of their majority, were to do this. How were they to do it? How could they do it? Will it be for a moment contended that the whole people in a body, a mass in one grand assemblage, were to meet together and themselves to form a constitution? This thing would be impracticable. It is preposterous! It could not be done. The very language of the bill, backed as it is by the Cincinnati platform, proves that it was not intended that the mass—the people in one grand mass meeting—were to make or form this constitution. Who, then, were to do it? Who, then, could do it? By what human power could it possibly be accomplished but by and through the delegates, the legally and constitutionally appointed representatives of that people? How else have our constitutions ever been formed? This is the great distinguishing and characteristic feature between our Government and the Republics of former times—those Republics, both ancient and modern, which lived and flourished only for a season. Ours is a Government where the legally expressed will of a majority of qualified voters controls and governs, and makes the law. That will acts through the legally constituted and appointed delegates and representatives of that people. It is the firm and enduring rock upon which the stability of our Republic is based. The uncontrolled and uncontrollable will of the great body of the people—and especially unauthorized body—was one of the chief elements of the dissolution, destruction, and downfall of other Republics.

But, even had there been any other way; had some miraculous, superhuman power pointed out to the people of Kansas some other mode and manner, some other way, than that adopted by them, by which they had formed their constitution, and they had chosen that way, then that would have been the right way. Any way that they saw fit, according to the Constitution and laws, to manifest their will touching this great question of sovereign right, would have been, because of their making it their own way, the only proper and legitimate way, and the only one which Congress could recognize. Did not the people of Kansas, then, first, at the very threshold, in the inception of the exercise of this sovereign power towards the organization and putting into being a State government, enact that, at the first general election, held in October, 1856, a poll should be opened, at which every qualified voter in the Territory should have the privilege of saying whether a convention should or should not be called to frame a constitution in pursuance of that authority—the authority of that Territorial Legislature whose legal existence and power had been recognized by Congress on more occasions than one? Was not this convention convoked to frame this constitution? In this matter was not the will of the people expressly consulted? Did they not, in conformity with this recognized legislative enactment, on the third Monday in June last, proceed solemnly to elect delegates to that convention? And did not those delegates, so legally and constitutionally elected, proceed likewise solemnly to the performance of the trust with which they were thus clothed and empowered by the people—to wit, to form a constitution? That territorial legislative act said nothing about submitting that constitution for their adoption or rejection, or any part of it. The Kansas and Nebraska act says nothing about it. The Cincinnati platform says nothing about it. Well, then, did not this convention do all, if not more, than was actually required of it? What did it do? It formed a constitution. What sort of a constitution? Why, of a republican form of government. What was it required to do? To form a constitution, with or without slavery, as they please, so that it was of a republican form of government. It went further: it submitted to the people—the qualified voters of the Territory—whether they would have that constitution with or without slavery. The very same sentence of the act which leaves the people free to form their domestic institutions, also leaves them free to regulate them: first form, then regulate them; what they were to do, and then how they were to do it.

We have seen what they were to do. Now, how were they to do this thing? How? Why, in their own way. Subject to what? Subject only to the Constitution. Well, then, in what way was this constitution to be formed—their institutions to be formed and regulated? In the way of the Governor of Kansas? of the Secretary of Kansas? of Jim Lane and his lawless rebellious minions? in the way of the President of the United States? in the way of Congress or in their own—the way of the people of Kansas, acting through the legally expressed will of the majority? What was that will? Why, that a convention should be called to prepare, to form, to make a constitution? To what was this constitution, after it had been thus formed by this convention, subject? To what power was it subject? To what restriction is it confined? What contingencies were placed upon it? To what, I ask, was it and is it subject? Is it subject to the adoption or ratification of the people after it was formed? Is it subject to any future action of Congress in the passage of a so-called enabling act? No, sir, none of these; but subject only to the Constitution of the United States; that is, not repugnant to the Constitution, but in conformity thereto, subject to it; a republican form of government; to the Constitution, and only to the Constitution. What does "only" mean; why, in no other way, no other wise, no other limitation, no other condition, no other restriction—none. Then the Kansas and Nebraska act was itself an enabling act, to all intents and purposes. No other is needed; any other would be an intervention—an unwarranted interference. It is a grant—a grant of power; with a limitation—a limitation expressed, expressed upon its face. That limitation is, that the constitution shall only be subject to the Constitution of the United States.

This grant, then, having in it, in unmistakable terms, an express limitation, all other limitations, by a well known and established principle of law, are excluded. You cannot, by any stretch of power, of implied power, make this grant subject to any implied limitation. It must be confined to the terms of the grant, to the express limitation in the grant. You cannot go beyond or outside of it. If this express limitation in the grant is complied with—is fulfilled—there is an end of it.

The distinguished gentleman in the other end of the Capitol said himself, in his Springfield speech before alluded to, that this was a limitation, and that it was subject only to the Constitution: it was the only limitation, the only qualification which could pertain to the constitution when presented. Have I not then high, ay, the highest authority, for the soundness of my argument on this point? Am I not borne out in the position that I take? Am I not right, then, in saying that you are estopped, precluded from going one step further. Have these things been done? Have the people of Kansas, according to this enabling power of the Kansas and Nebraska act, proceeded to form a constitution? Was this constitution formed in their own way? Was that way subject to the Constitution of the United States? Do they present a republican form of government in their constitution? Have all these legal requirements been complied with? If they have, why then it remains only for Congress to vote Kansas into the Union as a sovereign and independent State, according to and under these requirements. I think they all, and more, have been complied with; for, as I have before said, the only threatening question, the question to quiet which this great doctrine was inaugurated, has been fairly and legally referred to the people of Kansas for their adoption or rejection.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] said that the idea that this Kansas-Nebraska act was an enabling act was an afterthought. Was it an afterthought with Robert J. Walker, the Kansas Governor, when, in the passage of his letter from which I have already quoted, he argued that the difference between the admission of Michigan under her constitution, and the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution, was, that the Territorial Legislature of Michigan was clothed by Congress with no authority to assemble a constitutional convention and adopt a State constitution; but under the comprehensive language of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, the Territorial Legislature was clothed with such authority? Here is an acknowledgment for you, that the Kansas-Nebraska act was regarded as an enabling act; that it was no afterthought. It was so acknowledged by Governor Walker, by Mr. Stanton, and so regarded doubtless at the time of its passage, not only by its great author, but by its every advocate and supporter, when Mr. DOUGLAS said in the Senate on the 2d of July, 1856:

"All power which it is competent or possible for Congress to confer on the Territorial Legislature is conferred by that act." That Legislature must, then, be regarded as possessing the amplest of all legislative authority, that of providing for an expression of the people upon the question whether they would or not organize a State government."

Sir, for what purpose was this Kansas and Nebraska bill passed, if not to perform the functions of an enabling act? What has it accomplished? Of what value have been all the fierce conflicts concerning it, if it did not confer this power upon the Territory? Did any of its most ardent supporters—did its great author himself, then think that it was as impotent as this? Sir, I have mistaken them; I have mistaken it; I have misinterpreted its great objects and high aims, if this be so. The language employed everywhere, in all the legislation and resolves which have been had upon the subject—that of forming a constitution—does not convey to the human mind the idea of adopting it. If the imperative necessity of the submission and adoption of the constitution, by the people, after it had been formed, had been foremost in the minds of those who put this act in being, why did they not say so? Why did they studiously avoid saying so? It would have been a very easy matter to have done so.

Let me not be understood as opposing this doctrine. It may be a good one; it may be the best way. I shall not now dispute it. That is not now involved. States have been admitted under constitutions submitted and unsubmitted. The only question here is, was it obliged to be done in this instance? I say not. I took the ground at home, and I take it here, that this Lecompton convention had the power to submit this constitution or not, as they chose. That whether it was, or was not submitted, and came to me in Congress from the hands of a legally-chosen convention, representing the sovereign will of the people, I would vote for it. And so I would, having the other requirements of the Constitution of the United States—that is, subject to the Constitution of the United States, with a republican form of government. I contended there, as I do here, for the firm maintenance of that great doctrine of non-intervention. I contended, as I do now, that any act, by any power, by which the people of Kansas would be hindered or prevented from the formation and regulation of their own institutions in their own way, would have been an intervention, and violative of the act and of the principle. I thought then that Governor Walker himself, in his uncalled-for apparent attempt at dictation to the people, the mode and manner of their proceeding, as indicated in his proclamations and speeches, was such an intervention; that if the President or Congress, or any other power, slips in now to thwart the admission of Kansas under the Constitution, in the way the people have seen fit to send it, it will be an unwarranted intervention. The way they have made and adopted it is their way, be it good or bad. That is not for us to determine; and an interference with that way, from any quarter, would itself strike down the great doctrine it was the pride and glory of the party to establish.

That convention, in my judgment, fully represented the whole and entire sovereignty of the people. It was clothed with plenary power to form, to establish, to mold and fashion, just such a constitution as they chose—with slavery if they chose, without it if they chose—so that it was republican in its form of government, and subject to the Constitution; and after they had thus formed, fashioned, and established the organic law, either to let the people pass in judgment upon their action, or to present it just as it was to Congress. But this convention saw fit (wisely, doubtless) to submit to the vote of the people the only question which had rent and divided, not only that country, but the nation; and submitted, too, in the most direct and palpable form in which it could have been presented, because it was isolated, alone, separated from all other questions in the constitution.

Granting, for argument's sake, that the Kansas and Nebraska act, that the Cincinnati platform, that the doctrines of the Democratic party, that the behests of the people, all demanded that the question should be submitted to the people by the language of the act and of the platform, it is plain that the reference or submission of no other question was contemplated. The language of the act is, that its true intent and meaning is not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but, &c. The language of the Cincinnati platform, that it recognizes the right of the people to form a constitution, with or without slavery, and be admitted into the Union, &c. So, if it was contemplated that anything at all should be submitted to the people, slavery was that thing, and that alone. It is the only thing, the only institution, the only domestic institution referred to by name. It was, and is the institution; the great, absorbing, distracting element alone thought of, or that interested anybody. It was dominant in the public mind; it had lashed it into fury everywhere. Well, then, this question was plainly and palpably submitted. The legal expression of the public will speaks through the Le-compton constitution. All other constitutions, or steps taken to form a constitution, have been done without law or the form of law; not in conformity to, but in violation of, not only the Kansas and Nebraska act, but of every legally authoritative step that was taken by the people of Kansas.

But it is contended that this constitution should be rejected because it has not been passed upon by a majority of the whole people in Kansas—that they did not vote. Whose fault is it that they did not vote? If a factious and rebellious opposition refuse to avail themselves of every free and untrammelled privilege that has been afforded them to vote, who ought to be the sufferers? If, upon the first legislative step taken by the Territory to take the vote of the people upon the calling of the convention, they stubbornly refused to vote, what is to be done? If, again, they refused to vote for delegates to the convention which formed the constitution, and still again refused to vote on the slavery clause of that constitution, who, I ask, are to be made the sufferers? Are the law-abiding people then to suffer? Is the country to be continually rent and torn? Is Kansas to be kept out of the Union? Are all law and order to be trampled under foot by this lawless opposition? What sort of a doctrine is this to broach in our country? Where would it end?

But, sir, I take it that this objection (if objection it be) is effectually and finally cured by the vote for officers on the 4th instant under that constitution. It is a complete acknowledgment of the Le-compton constitution, its validity and authority. The very men, or at least a sufficient number to make a majority of the whole people, who willfully and maliciously refused to vote in the former legally-appointed elections, and especially upon the constitution, have stepped up and voted for officers to be elected under that constitution. These very men, who pronounce the constitution of Kansas a fraud, a swindle, a corrupt thing, a thing conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, by their own acts indorse this fraud; indorse this swindle; indorse this foul conception of sin and spawn of iniquity; acknowledge its authority by the very act of voting for officers under it, and by virtue of it. If it be so corrupt and corrupting, it must have imparted some of the base elements ramified throughout all its functions and functionaries. Can they now come in and say that the Le-compton constitution shall not be adopted by Congress? that Kansas cannot come in under that constitution, because they did not vote or would not vote on it when they had a chance? This objection ought not, under any circumstances, to be regarded; but by their act of voting for State officers under the constitution they are estopped and forever barred from putting in this plea. I, myself, would not care one cent, it would not affect my action in the matter one particle, if they had persisted and staid away from the polls and never voted; for I cannot for a moment subscribe to the monstrous doctrine, that because a factious party, either majority or minority, it makes no difference, refuse to avail themselves of the requirements and privileges of the law, and vote that the action of those who do vote and who thereby seek to settle disturbing elements, is vitiated, or to be considered as null and void. This would indeed be a monstrous doctrine, subversive of every principle of popular government.

But even had this argument a shadow of claim upon the consideration of Congress or the country, it is forever silenced in the fact that this constitution was in the most solemn manner acknowledged by their vote for officers under it. All these things plainly point out what course is to be pursued by Congress—by the Representatives of the people on this floor—and that is to admit Kansas under the constitution she presents, the Le-compton constitution, and put an eternal quietus to her unceasing troubles; to restore peace not only within her own distracted borders, but throughout the length and breadth of the land. The other neglected and needful legislation of the country calls for it, the people demand it, and look here to have it settled. If the people ultimately find that they do not want their domestic institutions settled according to this constitution, they can easily regulate them in a different manner. They have the sovereign power to do so at any time; and it illy becomes those advocates and defenders of the Topeka constitution—so radically sovereign as to be above and in defiance of law—I say it illy becomes them to object to the adoption of this constitution because it cannot be changed until 1864 on account of its schedule. The people are sovereign, and they can alter or abolish when they please. Law, order, sound policy, the peace of the country, the harmony and nationality of the Democratic party, and perhaps the perpetuity of the Union, depend upon this settlement of these distracting questions.

Sir, I think I can safely say that the people of the South considered themselves pledged, under the principles of the Kansas act, to vote for the admission of Kansas under the constitution she should legally and rightfully present, slavery or no slavery. However dear our southern institutions may be held; with whatsoever jealousy they may be watched; however ardent may be the desire to plant them everywhere, and especially in the virgin soil of Kansas; yet, if the constitution of the people said they did not want slavery, the Democracy South, true to the great principles of the act, would have said, without a murmur, let it be so. They were willing to stand or fall upon it. The constitution comes with a slavery form. The South stands precisely where she did when the chances were against her. And will our friends of the North now falter? Will they open afresh the bleeding wounds of this distracted Territory?

Sir, it may be that it would be different did this constitution come in an anti-slavery garb. It has ever been a struggle for a slave State to be admitted into this Union; the struggle is growing fiercer each succeeding time. It is almost as easy for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle as for a slave State to be admitted into this Union. Florida, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, all came in through great tribulation; but, thanks to the conservative, Union-loving, constitutional men of the North, they shrunk not then. Will they now? Who has forgotten how the present enlightened Chief Magistrate of this great nation stood by the Constitution in these hours of peril? How he welcomed in the lone-starred Republic to this family of sovereign and independent Republics? How, too, when the infant Arkansas was presented at the baptismal font, in the swaddling-clothes of her slavery constitution, he stood godfather and sponsor when she was baptized into the great family of States. And in the present crisis he plants himself again upon the side of the Constitution—upon the side of equal rights of all the States—upon the side of the doctrine of the platform upon which he was elected, of non-intervention. Were Congress now to interpose any obstacle to her immediate admission under the constitution of her own making, in her own way, by prescribing new and other and different modes or qualifications or conditions, would it not be an intervention? Should the President do the same, would it not likewise be an intervention? Should any power from any quarter, either Executive, judicial, State, or Federal, attempt to give direction and control to the matter, would it not be intervention, violative of the Kansas-Nebraska act, at war with the equal rights of all the States, and inimical to the Constitution?

Sir, the South has ever been loyal to the Constitution. She has ever stood on that broad and patriotic platform which guarantees to every State in this Union equal rights, the one with the other. It is all she claims, or has ever claimed. Nothing more she wants—nothing less is she willing to put up with. She has ever been amongst the foremost to vindicate those rights, in peace and in war, to crush out fanaticism, to trample under foot political heresies which tend to abridge the rights of people or State. Look to the last contest, which shook the pillars of the Republic—a contest such as never before had an existence in this Government; not a contest in which alone the peaceful establishment of great political principles was involved; not merely whether this or that policy should prevail; but it was a contest in which were deeply involved the liberties of the people, the perpetuity of the Republic, the existence of the Government. A deadly blow was aimed at the very vitals of the Federal Constitution. This battle may be to fight again. God in his providence avert it. I think that the safety of the Union rests with the conservative elements and organization of the Democratic party, North and South. It was the stay of the nation in the last struggle. Ever be it so. Stand by the Constitution; stand by the great principle which you, by your aid, have so nobly helped to inaugurate; stand by the solemn decisions and decrees of the high judicial tribunals of the land—enlightened, learned, pure, and patriotic monuments of impartial judgment, of lofty patriotism, of solid and enduring wisdom. Do this, and all will be well; but do it not, and it may be the beginning of the end.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, in the pauses of the storm which the discussion of the Le-compton constitution has raised, and will raise, if ever presented here, into fiercer convulsions, and until which time I shall defer what I may have to say on that topic, I will avail myself of a temporary lull to bring to the consideration of the committee a subject which has not yet been discussed, but to which our attention will probably be directed, even before the affairs of Kansas shall be brought up for action.

For the first time since the organization of this Government, we are called upon to authorize the increase of the Army, ostensibly for the purpose of being employed against the people of one of our Territories. Under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, article four, section three, new States may be admitted; and Congress has power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." By virtue of this provision, Congress has, from time to time, out of territory acquired by the General Government from the original States, or by cession or purchase from foreign Powers, organized territorial governments, which, after due political tutelage, have applied for admission as States, and been received, to take the rank and privileges belonging to the original thirteen States of the Union. Year after year has the tide of emigration from Europe and the eastern States surged on, and on, tracking the path of the retreating savage; plowing up the pasturage of the wild buffalo; felling the forests; harnessing the waterfall to the wheels of mechanical and manufacturing industry; gemming the landscape with towns, villages, and cities—the abodes of peace, property and refinement. Thus has the forest belt that lay around the original thirteen States been broken; the wigwam has disappeared; and double the number of coequal sovereignties now dwell in fraternal concord beneath the wide dome of the Republic! What was known as the Far West in the days of our boyhood, is now the Far East; and the representatives of millions of men stand beside us on this floor, whose tasteful dwellings have been reared where, within half a century, the war dance of the Indian was celebrated, or the panther of the wilderness made his lair. The valley of the Mississippi has become dotted with the homes of empire, fronting on that Father of Waters—to them as an inland sea and an outlet to the ocean. The trapper retreats to the head-waters of the Missouri, and gathers his spoil from the streams that thread the slopes of the Rocky Mountains. Up to their wooded bases surge the tides of advancing civilization; and beyond and over them breaks the wave, foaming on to the shores of the Pacific. Across vast plains, twelve hundred miles from the Missouri, sentinelled by mountain ramparts; the dry bed of a vast inland sea, with its salt waters sunken to an inconsiderable lake, whose margin sparkles with its white crystals, and four thousand two hundred feet above the sea level, lies the central Territory of the Republic—Utah! Ten years ago—a single decade—and not a dwelling dotted that valley; across it wound the rugged road of the trader, the bridle or war path of the Shoshone and his savage allies or foes. Standing on an eminence of the Wahstach mountains, to the east, their glittering peaks, lifting themselves eight thousand feet in the clear, silent air, and fringed far beneath by shaded masses of pine and fir and balsam, are receding ranges of hills and streams, sparkling like silver threads, and narrow gorges, looking like abysses in the distance; and westward the mountains become lower, and gradually melt away, until a valley, holding in its bosom this lake of salt, spreads out before it. All around on the slopes of the descending hills run even benches, formerly the water levels of the lake, and now used for cultivation or pasturage. At the foot of these rise the mud walls of a city, covering an area of six square miles, the abode of half the people of the Territory, which now holds more than sixty thousand souls! As by a common impulse, they have come together from all parts of the world—from Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Scotland, England, Australia, and the United States. They have become a nation in a day. They have trade, industry, manufacturing and mechanical skill; they have law, government, and a religion. They are a homogeneous people; act by a common impulse upon definite and fixed principles; and, after having applied as a Territory for an organic law in 1850, and been organized in pursuance of its provisions, received a Governor, judges, a marshal, and a district attorney, from Federal appointment; after sending their Delegate to sit in the councils of the nation, they have seen fit to repudiate the paternity and power of the General Government; to break up the Federal courts; to deny all political influence in their councils coming from or through the agency of Federal officers, and fall back upon a theocratic polity that impiously claims the immediate inspiration of the Most High as its source and authority, revealed through His servant and prophet, Brigham Young.

This leader, who rules this people with an unquestioned despotism, through a machinery I shall examine, after temporizing under Mr. Pierce as Governor and Indian agent, has at length grown desperate enough to declare openly his defiance of the General Government; and emboldened by distance and long success, gathered from the supineness of the executive power that had employment nearer home for all its energies, comes out by proclamation declaring military law, usurps all the functions of territorial government in his person, and is training and marshaling his battalions for resistance and encounter. Three thousand braves—our brothers and our sons—have, in obedience to the executive mandate, crossed the plains and rest in their tents near the mountain passes that girdle that Territory. The wintry snows have not damped their ardor, or cooled their glowing courage; the howl of the savage, impelled to run off their horses and cattle by the stimulus of Mormon craft, has not made them irresolute or desponding; the driving tempest and the icy hail rattle upon their canvas covering, but the camp is merry with glee and the martial airs of Columbia echo through the passes and linger on every lip.

Why they were ordered off at a season which compelled this inevitable exposure, contrary to all prudent foresight, and against the advice of wise and experienced councils, let those who did it explain and justify to the people and the country, if they can. Whether the loud and deep murmurs that began to roll from all parts of the land towards the capital, condemning the retention of five thousand troops in Kansas Territory, under the pretense of maintaining law and order, and compelling a free people to vote or refrain from voting under the roar of United States artillery, according to settled programme formed at Washington, had the effect of starting forward the enterprise too long delayed, it is impossible accurately to determine. Should the disasters which now threaten our brave men, and which were anticipated by the sagacious in consequence of their long and unnecessary detention and late march, eventually fall upon them; should not Providence defied, and the enemy tempted, be better than our fears or our deserts, they who were instrumental in this dreadful exposure will be held to a strict and exacting account. Men in the plenitude of power, and backed by a dominant party hurrying them on, may for a time defy public opinion; but its edicts are unsparing upon imbecility or crime, and its vengeance sure. Let them remember that! Yes, sir, let them remember it!

Such is the aspect of things at this hour. The General Government has superseded Young as territorial Governor. His successor (Cumming) has issued his proclamation, exhorting the people to lay down their arms and refrain from all disorderly and treasonable projects. The idle wind that sweeps those plains is not more idle and ineffective than these proclamations upon that people. Their imperial priest, despot, and dictator, from his dual throne, as potentate of the Saints and viceroy of the Almighty, laughs them to scorn. Entrenched behind the material bulwarks of distance and the wall of rock which nature has provided; girded by sterile plains and verdureless hills, and guarded by a blind fanaticism that knows no law beyond his will, and will shed its last drop of blood at his behest, he has become foolhardy by impunity and the unquestioning devotion that encircles him. The wily craft of the conspirator and the low cunning of the knave have given place to the grasping ambition of the chieftain and the hopeful enthusiasm of the traitor and the prince.

In his plotting brain the time has arrived to cast off the allegiance he swore to this Government, which he once needed to subdue or wheedle the savage, around whom he now believes he has thrown stronger toils. A sway of more than six years, as head of the State and of the Church—wielder at once of the sword of territorial sovereignty and the crozier of spiritual might—has compacted and cemented in his grasp a dominion he is impatient to extend, and will not surrender! Ten thousand swords will leap from their scabbards at his beck; thirty thousand hands of male and female alike, will toil incessantly to sustain his power, linked, as they believe it to be, with their best interests in time and their salvation forever.

What is this moral and political phenomenon that looms up so grandly, and has ripened so soon; defying the forces of the Republic, and attracting the attention of the civilized world.

The President says in his message:

“A territorial government was established for Utah by act of Congress, approved the 9th September, 1850, and the Constitution and laws of the United States were thereby extended over it ‘so far as the same, or any provisions thereof, may be applicable.’ This act provided for the appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of a Governor, who was to be ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs, a secretary, three judges of the supreme court, a marshal, and a district attorney. Subsequent acts provided for the appointment of the officers necessary to extend our land and our Indian system over the Territory. Brigham Young was appointed the first Governor, on the 20th September, 1850, and has held the office ever since. Whilst Governor Young has been both Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs throughout this period, he has been, at the same time, at the head of the Church called the Latter Day Saints, and professed to govern its members and dispose of their property by direct inspiration and authority from the Almighty. His power has been, therefore, absolute over both Church and State.

The people of Utah, almost exclusively, belong to this church, and believing with a fanatical spirit that he is Governor of the Territory by Divine appointment, they obey his commands as if they were direct revelations from Heaven. If, therefore, he chooses that his government shall come into collision with the Government of the United States, the members of the Mormon church will yield implicit obedience to his will. Unfortunately, existing facts leave but little doubt that such is his determination. Without entering upon a minute history of occurrences, it is sufficient to say that all the officers of the United States, judicial and executive, with the single exception of two Indian agents, have found it necessary, for their own personal safety, to withdraw from the Territory, and there no longer remains any government in Utah but the despotism of Brigham Young. This being the condition of affairs in the Territory, I could not mistake the path of duty. As Chief Executive Magistrate, I was bound to restore the supremacy of the Constitution and laws within its limits. In order to effect this purpose, I appointed a new Governor and other Federal officers for Utah, and sent with them a military force for their protection, and to aid as a posse comitatus, in case of need, in the execution of the laws.

“With the religious opinions of the Mormons, as long as they remained mere opinions, however deplorable in themselves and revolting to the moral and religious sentiments of all Christendom, I had no right to interfere. Actions alone, when in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, become the legitimate subjects for the jurisdiction of the civil magistrate. My instructions to Governor Cumming have therefore been framed in strict accordance with these principles. At their date a hope was indulged that no necessity might exist for employing the military in restoring and maintaining the authority of the law; but this hope has now vanished. Governor Young has, by proclamation, declared his determination to maintain his power by force, and has already committed acts of hostility against the United States. Unless he should retrace his steps the Territory of Utah will be in a state of open rebellion. He has committed these acts of hostility notwithstanding Major Van Vliet, an officer of the Army, sent to Utah by the commanding General to purchase provisions for the troops, had given him the strongest assurances of the peaceful intentions of the Government, and that the troops would only be employed as a posse comitatus when called on by the civil authority to aid in the execution of the laws.

“There is reason to believe that Governor Young has long contemplated this result. He knows that the continuance of his despotic power depends upon the exclusion of all settlers from the Territory except those who will acknowledge his Divine mission and implicitly obey his will; and that an enlightened public opinion there would soon prostrate institutions at war with the laws both of God and man. He has, therefore, for several years, in order to maintain his independence, been industriously employed in collecting and fabricating arms and munitions of war, and in disciplining the Mormons for military service. As superintendent of Indian affairs, he has had an opportunity of tampering with the Indian tribes, and exciting their hostile feelings against the United States. This, according to our information, he has accomplished in regard to some of these tribes, while others have remained true to their allegiance, and have communicated his intrigues to our Indian agents. He has laid in a store of provisions for three years, which, in case of necessity, as he informed Major Van Vliet, he will conceal, and then take to the mountains, and bid defiance to all the powers of the Government.”

“A great part of this may be idle boasting; but yet no wise Government will lightly estimate the efforts which may be inspired by such frenzied fanaticism as exists among the Mormons in Utah. This is the first rebellion which has existed in our Territories; and humanity itself requires that we should put it down in such a manner that it shall be the last. To trifle with it would be to encourage it and to render it formidable. We ought to go there with such an imposing force as to convince these deluded people that resistance would be vain, and thus spare the effusion of blood. We can in this manner best convince them that we are their friends, not their enemies. In order to accomplish this object it will be necessary, according to the estimate of the War Department, to raise four additional regiments; and this I earnestly recommend to Congress. At the present moment of depression in the revenues of the country I am sorry to be obliged to recommend such a measure; but I feel confident of the support of Congress, cost what it may, in suppressing the insurrection, and in restoring and maintaining the sovereignty of the Constitution and laws over the Territory of Utah.”

Mormonism as a religious system had its origin in a romance, written about the year 1810, by Solomon Spalding, a native of Connecticut, who had been educated for the ministry, but followed a mercantile employment, removed to Cherry Valley, New York, where he amused his leisure hours by weaving into a book entitled by him the "MSS. Found," the notion entertained or suggested by some writers that the American Indians are the descendants of the lost ten tribes of Israel. Hence, he starts them from Palestine, invents for them various fortunes by flood and field, wars, quarrels, turmoils, strifes, separations, until they people this continent, and leave behind them the vestiges of mounds, tumuli, fortifications, sculpture, and cities dilapidated, which are discovered in Northern and Central America. It is written somewhat in Scripture style, and uses the machinery of the Jewish economy throughout. He read his manuscript to various persons who yet remember it, but was not successful in procuring its publication. Somewhere about the year 1823, this manuscript fell into the hands of Jo Smith, a native of Windsor county, Vermont. Smith was about twenty years of age, and already exhibited that singular compound of genius and folly, of cunning and absurdity, of indolence and energy, of craft and earnestness, which distinguished him to the end of his career.

Under the new-light preachers of that day Smith became imbued with all the wild and extravagant notions of seeing sights; hearing voices; receiving revelations; meeting and fighting the devil in bodily form; which indicate a diseased imagination, and want of all solid instruction and fixed principles on religious subjects. Enthusiasm ran mad through the whole region where he dwelt, and Smith was one of its most brilliant exemplifications; ultimately having a revelation that all existing systems of religion were wrong, and that he should be made the prophet of a new faith. For more than five years he vibrated between his caution and his enthusiasm; giving out, occasionally, dark hints about certain mysterious plates to be dug up by him, containing a new revelation. Part of his time was spent in lying, swindling, and debauchery, and the remainder in visions and repentance; the vulgar habits of the brute contending with the higher functions of the prophet. At length he pretended to dig out the plates from the side of a hill, in Palmyra, Wayne county, New York; placed himself behind a curtain, permitting no one to enter, from which sanctum he translated from the plates the book of Mormon to an amanuensis, reading it all from Spalding's manuscript in his possession, one hundred and eighteen pages of it having been stolen by Martin Harris. With this new Koran our modern Mohammed started upon his career.

On the 5th of May, 1829, John the Baptist came back to earth to baptize Smith; and on the 6th of April, 1830, the first church of Latter-Day Saints was organized at Manchester, New York, consisting of four Smiths and two converts out of the family—Pratt, Rigdon, Kimball, and Young, joining afterwards. This Bible, unlike that of the Christian or Musselman, purports to be chiefly historical, and does not enunciate or enforce a system of moral and religious truth in a philosophic or didactic form; all its incidental lessons upon life or manners being derived from current doctrines of this day. It is consequently incapable of comparison with any other extant form of religious faith. One might as well compare the Christian religion with Fenelon's Telemachus, or one of James's novels.

"If it be true that the author of the Koran stole his materials, yet must a man had greatness and elevation of soul to have stolen as he has done. If on the rich fields of sacred literature he plundered, he plundered like a prince! The spoil which he gathered so largely from the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, might be likened to that with which certain learned and magnificent conquerors have graced their triumphs. They have indeed trampled upon and overturned the ancient seat of arts and learning; but yet have first snatched from the devastations of war, each signal monument of greatness and beauty."

And out of these monuments he constructed an edifice, if of grotesque, yet gorgeous proportions, and blazing with the decorations of oriental splendor; but the materials of the Mormon book, though mostly derived from the same source, are so crazily jumbled together, so infartificially constructed, that if a whirlwind had scattered the leaves of the sacred record, and combined them again with the feats of Baron Munchausen by machinery, it could not have surpassed this production of inanity and folly.

Two things may be remarked upon this Koran of Mormonism. 1st. It does not sanction the central principle of the new faith, as now practiced—polygamy: this was the growth of after years. 2d. It does not purport to be a full and complete revelation; indeed, it discloses that twenty-one plates and stones are still buried and undiscovered in the hill "Comorah," in the State of New York. But neither the plates dug up, nor those still unknown, prevented Smith from having direct visions and revelations from the Most High; and it is by this instrumentality primarily, and not by any potency in the doctrines embodied among the contemptible literature of the Mormon Bible, that the system has grown into its present magnitude. A very similar organization existed a short time before at Sing Sing, in the State of New York, headed by Matthias Folger, and others, which soon ripened and died out with a disclosure of the vices and selfishness of its founders. There is nothing whatever in the distinctive doctrines or truths of Mormonism which would tend to give it perpetuity. These elements lie in its polity, which was not at first a matured system, but grew up gradually, as circumstances gave it development:

First. An electorship of two and two was organized to preach the new system, which consisted principally of violent harangues against all existing forms of religious faith.

Second. An apostleship of twelve, after the model of the early Christian church, with plenary power over inferior orders.

Third. A commission of seventy, now very much enlarged, to go through the world and propagate the new faith.

Fourth. A location for the "new Zion," where, without disturbance from Gentile powers, it could carry out and display its inherent strength, and evince its glory on a scale proportioned to the greatness of its origin and the divine superintendence it commanded.

Fifth. A perpetual and infallible inspiration, through the high priest designated by Heaven, according to whose revelations all the personal, social, domestic, economic, political, military, and religious concerns of the church are to be regulated, in the minutest matter, without hesitation, question, or appeal.

There was an attempt, by Smith, to introduce communism while the Saints were located at Jackson, in Missouri, in 1832; but the principle of meum and tuum was yet too strong for the immature fanaticism of the early disciples, and the experiment has not been repeated.

This element of spiritual despotism pervades all the several orders, and runs through the entire line of this singular affiliation. It grasps and encompasses every interest, the vast and the minute, public as well as private. No circle is too sacred for its prying censorship and approach! Its thousand eyes gaze upon all the promptings of ambition, all the workings of its industry, all its complainings, discontents, hopes, affections. Through mysterious and hidden conduit pipes flow to the ear of this dictator the secrets of every domicile, the throbbings of every soul; and back, like a thunderclap, comes a revelation that goes crashing on its remorseless way, through heart and home of the disciple, who takes up his staff and flies to fulfill its stern decrees. It is a despotism which combines all the traditional force of Mohammedan absolutism with the shifting policy of Jesuit craft—dominant at once over State and Church, intolerant, exclusive, and fanatical. If "the priest of superstition rides an ass, and the priest of fanaticism a tiger," here is a double proof and representation of the fact.

Every convert is a zealot; every zealot a hero! To believe in these ravings and inspirations, reason and history, science and the world's progress, all the morals of Christianity and all the precious boons of civilization are first ignored and repudiated; a blind, bigoted, unreasoning, mindless faith supplants and swallows everything beside itself; and having laid down its majestic independence and its manhood, and accepted the fetters of a slave, the wilder the marvel the sooner it obtains credence. We have deemed, in our complacency, that no wide-spread delusion could roll its turbid waters over the surface of social life in these ends of the nineteenth century; but we wake up to this phenomenon growing under our eyes and at our hearthstones, that involves the reign and rage of certain principles of human nature we had hoped were long ago discarded; that comes raving for its victims in the circle of our religious and political institutions, and by the fascinations of its egregious and impudent imposture, its intemperance, its folly, its blasphemous atrocity, carries them forth to exhibit to our baffled hopes and sickened sensibilities a spectacle of credulity and virulence, such as we had hoped history recorded only for warning, and not imitation!

It discards the fanaticism of the scourge; as penances and personal inflictions are not within its policy, except so far as direct and practical devotion to the interests of the "Saints" demand individual sacrifices. It passes by the fanaticism of the brand; its lust is not that of cruelty, and its jaws do not yet reek in blood. Its common hatred has not yet risen to an immortal abhorrence, nor its wrath swelled to execration. Fear and policy, and no inherent virtue of the system, have restrained this manifestation of its nature; for if all external pressure was removed, and the gleam of American bayonets did not glitter before the Mormon eye, it would persecute instead of curse, and exterminate Gentile contumacy where it had failed to convert. But it grasps with a lusty arm the fanaticism of the banner!

Clad in the sacerdotal robes of the priest, over which are drawn the vestments of the soldier, this unscrupulous and traitorous warrior-ecclesiastic rings out the blended war cry of the chieftain with the imperial edict of the Pope! From the sacred seclusion of the cloister, he emerges with mailed glove and plumed helmet. The will of the Almighty comes from his mouth, and His direst wrath foams on his hissing lip. "To your tents, O Israel! defiance is safety! to crouch is to die! strike at once for your homes, your altars, your wives, and your little ones!" This appeal finds an echo in every heart. He covers his designs under the pretext of a religious persecution. Gog and Magog are coming up against the Saints! Patriotism, national pride, calculations of policy, motives of ambition, resentment at foreign interference, the revenge of detected hypocrisy, all mingle in profound excitement, to give it the character of a religious war!

But let me not blend the elements of its polity with the web of its historical development. One or two points more of the former, and I will then turn to the latter—its practical workings being only the outgrowth of its inner spirit. It is unlike either that fanaticism of the Papacy that swept Europe of its brave chivalry, in the crusades, and poured its best blood on the Syrian sands, to redeem and sanctify the cradle of its faith, or that fanaticism of Mohammedanism which leaped into the saddle and, flashing its cimeter in the sun, bade the nations bow to the crescent; its battle cry being, "There is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet!" Each of these was invasive, aggressive, and acted independently of the political structures existing among the people they inflamed, and with which they did not meddle; but this is defensive, secluded, intense, because driven in upon itself. It blends in one the polity of State and Church, in imitation of the Hebrew theocracy, and spends its missionary zeal in proclaiming through every clime that God has come down to men; that a millennium on earth has opened; that within its peaceful walls care and sorrow and pain are no more; that a brotherhood of love and concord is established, where, surrounded by all that can gratify the taste and please the senses, the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest. This earnest, enthusiastic proclamation and promise is one of the grand agencies of its success—the secret of its marvelous enlargement.

What wonder that the down-trodden, famishing masses from Wales, Scotland, Sweden, Germany, France, and all parts of the Old World, without education, without moral instruction, are caught by the picture, and start in troops for this earthly Paradise? What marvel that eager crowds begimed with the soot of the dark mine, or pale from the faintness of the heated factory—what marvel that the victims of an ecclesiastical system, that is known only by its oppressions and taxes and tithes, while it fails to bless or enlighten—what marvel that they crowd round the earnest man in the thronged marts of the continent, or on the corners of the rural hamlets of England, and drink in his words, blazing with his own enthusiasm, as he paints the earthly glories of the God-defended Eden of the West, which sparkles to the eye of faith in the distance, the embodiment of all excellence that the imagination ever painted; And then comes in the aid of "organized emigration;" in vast communities, with the order and precision of an army, they set their faces resolutely for their new home, along every avenue, from the Atlantic and Pacific alike, in winter and in summer, toil on with a dogged energy, that in itself is morally sublime. Sixty thousand souls at least own the sway of this occidental hierarchy. Men and women of low intelligence, burning zeal, simple habits; but guided and governed in all their affairs by this inspired priesthood—a priesthood constituted mainly of the Yankee element, as to nationality—an element, in this case, of canting, calculating hypocrisy, which first inquires whether it will pay; and, secondly, whether it promises power; and, thirdly, whether it imposes any limitation upon license and lust; and having satisfactorily settled these profound questions of the pocket and the flesh, with the cool devilry of an ordinary speculation, places itself in the priesthood council and eldership; learns about from its high seat in the sanctuary for beautiful inmates of its harem, and stimulates its palled appetites by new victims, as often as exhausted passion loaths the worn and wasted forms that cease to amuse or please, where the heart is never touched, and woman is so degraded and defiled.

Sir, are the leaders—the master-minds of this fanaticism sincere? Smith was more hypocrite than enthusiast. His whole story of the origin of his bible was a lie; and, knowing that, he could not be sincere.

Nor do I entertain a higher respect for Young, or Kimball, or Pratt, or the other leading spirits who sustain them. Power and polygamy hold them there, and not a man of American birth and education would remain any longer than he could help it, if permanently deprived of both of these luxuries.

I need not argue before a Christian people this question of polygamy. If all the Abrahams and Solomons of the Old Testament practiced it, it is no less devilish and damnable. As long as the Almighty preserves by births and deaths the average equality of the sexes, what right has one man to thirty wives, any more than one woman to thirty husbands? thus defrauding twenty-nine in the social body of their rights. As long as the human heart demands and responds to a congenial and equal sympathy in the opposite sex; as long as man is capable of honor, or woman of love, so long will this licentious system which degrades her into a plaything of idle dalliance, or a breeding animal for children—every element of self-respect, every ray of sentiment, every upspringing impulse of her bleeding and bursting heart crushed out of her; her sense of equality, her queenly pride as wife and mother, her sacred place at the board and the hearthstone, gone, lost, sunken, in the shameless contentment of herding in droves like swine, beneath the roof of a creature who regards her as at once menial, mistress, and slave; so long will nature protest, with all the force of its outraged sensibilities, against this horrid desecration.

To argue such a question is to insult the mother that bore us, despise the home of our boyhood, and the virtues that refine and exalt the society in which we live. In a word, when we reflect that the primitive institution of marriage limited it to one man and one woman; that this institution was adhered to by Noah and his sons, amidst the degeneracy of the age in which they lived, and in spite of the examples of polygamy which the accursed race of Cain had introduced—when we consider how very few, comparatively speaking, the examples of this practice were among the faithful—how much it brought its own punishment with it, and how dubious and equivocal those passages are in which it appears to have the sanction of the Divine approbation; when, to these reflections we add another, respecting the limited views and temporary nature of the more ancient dispensations and institutions of religion—how often the imperfections, and even vices, of the patriarchs and people of God, in old times, are recorded, without the express notification of their criminality—how much is said to be commanded, which our reverence for the holiness of God and his law will only suffer us to suppose were, for wise ends, permitted—how frequently the messengers of God adapted themselves to the genius of the people to whom they were sent, and the circumstances of the times in which they lived—above all, when we consider the purity, equity, and benevolence of the Christian law; the explicit declarations of our Lord and his apostle, St. Paul, respecting the institution of marriage, its design and limitation—when we reflect, too, on the testimony of the most ancient Fathers, who could not possibly be ignorant of the general and common practice of the Apostolic Church—and, finally, when to these considerations we add those which are founded on justice to the female sex, and all the regulations of domestic economy and national policy—we must wholly condemn the revival of polygamy.

Sir, the common law, as well as the law of nature, deems it a great crime. The municipal law of every State in Christendom has made it a felony; and the wretch who, in the immunity of territorial distance and ecclesiastical protection, will practice it, is worthy of the felon's character, and should receive the felon's doom.

And then this sealing process—a mystery of abominations that no devil not first brutalized could have invented. As a consequence of its polygamous intercourse, divorces are granted freely, at the parties' option, and woman goes through the process of legal transference from one master to another, as the authorities may determine, many marrying five or six times, and their husbands all living—the whole invention being hardly a veil for promiscuous intercourse.

The history of this fanaticism is soon told. The church was organized in 1830. In August, 1831, they commenced a settlement at Independence, Jackson county, Missouri—revealed to Smith as the site of the "New Jerusalem." Smith wavered long between this place and Kirland, Ohio, where, in 1833, they commenced building their first temple, which was finished in 1836, at a cost of about fifty thousand dollars. In 1839, they relaid the foundations of their temple in Missouri. They left this region again for Nauvoo, in Illinois, where another temple was soon erected. Jo Smith's life and labors ended together in Carthage jail, where, on the 27th June, 1844, he was shot by a gang of border ruffians.

And here endeth the first lesson, in the decease of the first saint of Mormonism by martyrdom. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church;" and it proved true of this, not less than of other causes. From a plotter, trickster, and buffoon, Smith ascended the ladder, and in the apotheosis became a saint and protecting divinity. Faith could now see in him qualities which light would have contradicted.

And while the heaving mass was surging to and fro, and looking for direction, Brigham Young steps forward upon the scene. With consummate tact and a master hand he seized upon the reins of authority. This modern Elisha drew upon his shoulders the falling mantle of his master, and with a will that never wavers and an eloquence of action and tongue that masters, subdues, and overwhelms, he sways the mass before him as with the stroke of an enchanter's wand.

Illinois spews them out; Missouri rejects them. Smith had aspired to the presidency, and the Saints wielded a banded political influence on which no party could count and which could at any time turn the scale in a contest between them. Dissensions grew up, blood was shed in bitter broils; and as the land became too strait and their numbers increased, in 1845 they turned their eyes westward—to Vancouver's Island, to Texas, to California, and finally to a valley in the Rocky Mountains. In 1848, as the young grass was peering from the sod and the buds were bursting into flowers, in the month of May, the exodus commenced. Pioneers having gone before, across the Mississippi they pass, and away over prairie and plain, men and women, flocks and herds—the heavy wain drawn by the lowing cattle—the patient tramp of feet, great and small—filing along the long line of fifteen hundred miles to a land naked as it came from the hand of its Maker; it was the heroism of faith! How sad that it had no worthier end!

From that day Young has reigned supreme, and thousands and tens of thousands have flocked to his standard. The unsettled religious sentiment of the lower grades of mind gravitate there. It is the Botany Bay of the world! There it stands, rampant and defying. Its hand on its sword-hilt and its eye flashing fire; a Territory and not a Territory!—a Republic in embryo!—a despotism consummate, wearing the show of popular approval and bending willingly to the nod of a tyrant. There it stands—it is before you in your path to the Pacific—it will not away at your bidding; a huge, ugly, stubborn fact, which no ignorance can disregard and no political fatuity despise.

What will you do with it? Will you turn despot and saber sixty thousand souls because they believe in Brigham Young and polygamy? Will you meet the fanaticism of folly and fraud by the fanaticism of extermination? Will you make the city a desert and the region a howling wilderness on the one hand; or, will you suffer this moral cancer, inflaming political treason, to grow on untouched until it becomes too vast to handle? Will you permit an independent and defiant despotism, organized in the very heart of this continent and embracing the vilest and most intractable elements of which a community can be composed, to compact and strengthen its defenses, to train its battalions, to call home its forces, and light a fire at your threshold which all the forces of the Republic cannot subdue?

What will you do with Utah? Will you retrace your steps, and in defiance of the principle of the Kansas-Nebraska act, legislate polygamy out of the Territory, and so declare, and not leave them free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way? Will you repeal the territorial act which they have practically nullified; annex it to adjoining States or Territories, and let them deal with this sin to the family, and this treason to the State? What will you do? As an individual, I will say what I would do: There is no way of avoiding peril; but in the face of ten thousand Kansas-Nebraska acts, and all the false principles they embody, I would pass a law making polygamy a crime in the Territories, and then send a force sufficient to scatter every harem to the four winds. If it be objected that an ex post facto law cannot reach past evils, this may be true; yet the offense has been committed in defiance of the common law and moral sentiment of the civilized world, and should receive no favor. In any event, such a law would stay the tide, and the sore would slough off in one generation.

Secondly, I would send an army there sufficient to apprehend Young and all his co-conspirators against the authority of the General Government—who will be found to include every lord of the seraglio—try them for treason, and hang every one, without distinction, who should be found guilty; excluding every Mormon from any participation in the legal processes of the court.

Thirdly, I would secure to the inhabitants a republican form of government, and see that they enjoyed their freedom without the heel of a despot, spiritual or temporal, on their necks; and I would wait patiently to see the results; and if all this failed, I would turn that city into a camp—a vast military depot, to guard and protect the highway to the Pacific.

There is but one question more: When and how shall it be done?

When? I answer now, without delay. This religious fanaticism has now assumed the form of a civil polity, and this civil polity is anti-republican and despotic; and this despotism has committed overt treason against the Government of the United States. The authority of every Federal officer is denied, or a reign of terror instituted over all their acts. War is proclaimed in fact. Forces are levied and trained for action. Slaughter is threatened. Our troops are defied, our courts closed, our officers insulted; the savages incited to plunder and ravage. Peaceful citizens, with their wives and little ones pursuing the path of emigration, are surprised and murdered in scores, with not a straggler left to tell the tale, their mangled corpses, or white skeletons, bleaching in the sun, disclosing the horrid tragedy. If anything is to be done not a moment should be lost. Every day strengthens its forces and compacts its power. Its agencies are hurrying home as fast as steam and money can speed them.

I know some think we should let them alone, and that the system must soon fall to pieces. But how long has Mohammedanism lasted? How much less reliable is the fanaticism of to-day than that of ten centuries ago? What element of this structure gives signs of impotence or decay? What limb of this hale giant is already smitten with moral paralysis, and gives tokens that its energies are spent, or even wearied? Sir, we have let them alone; and from a contemptible handful, they have grown into a nation! The citizens of Illinois and Missouri could eject them without aid; but now they stand behind a wall of ten thousand bayonets, and dare you to the encounter. The unorganized fanaticism of the world gravitates to Utah, and there it is molded into armies. Eight tenths at least of these elements are foreign, uneducated by and unaccustomed to our institutions, with no love for democracy, and no reverence for national law; restless masses, impatient of restraint, and fraternizing only on the lust of license and the hope of power.

If it might not be deemed too fanciful, I would suggest a historical parallel in that of the fanatical Jew who rebelled against the Roman power, and brought Titus Vespasian to raze his city and temple, and level with the dust every vestige of his power, and every monument of his ancestral glory—a rebellion in which the fanaticism of religious and military sentiments were equally brought into combination. Sir, this is not a religious war—a persecution for conscience sake, any more than was that. As well may the Thugs of India protest their religious principles in justification of assassination! Suppose the devotees in Utah adopt treason as an item of their religious creed: will such a baptism give them immunity for conscience sake? By no means.

But gentlemen fear the great cost of this war! They look round upon an empty Treasury and an accumulating debt; upon $6,000,000 unpaid for the Oregon war; upon unknown sums for the California campaign, to be ascertained and adjusted! They look upon commerce prostrate, manufacturing industry paralyzed, and the avenues of business closed by symptoms of derangement and distrust; our sources of national income diminished by decreasing imports, and by limited sales of the public lands. They see a system of wasteful expenditure organized in every governmental department; they discover that $100,000,000 per annum will be needed to keep us from bankruptcy; and they are appalled at the prospect of running the State into financial ruin, by an expensive intestine war!

I admit the truthfulness of the picture, in all its aggravations. But some matters are above money; there are crises in the life of a nation, when, whatever her financial burdens, she must incur heavier; when her integrity and honor, her prestige, her existence, are all at stake; when to calculate is folly, to hesitate is to perish. Did General Washington hesitate and temporize and count the cost, when a part of Pennsylvania rebelled on the whisky tax? No, sir; he sent fifteen thousand men into the field, and this promptitude, energy, manliness, itself quelled the storm, without shedding a drop of blood? The Saints of Utah may be as wise as the whisky dealers of the land of Penn., if they find the Government are equally in earnest. If they choose to risk a battle, I trust it will be such a battle as has not been seen on this continent—overwhelming, decisive, complete; such as our brave Army will fight, even if fanaticism provokes to feats of superhuman valor.

Let those who must bear the responsibility of the war determine mainly how it shall be waged, and what shall be the amount and character of its appointments—whether the additional force shall be that of volunteers, to which opinion I incline, or an increase of the regular Army—whether it shall approach from the east or the west—whether it shall employ horse or foot. But let them not have it to say to the nation that a formidable rebellion has ripened, and is rioting unchecked among us, and we refuse the agencies to counteract or destroy it. I hope this may not become a party question—a shuttlecock for political partisanship to hurl to and fro. Let us deal with it as if we felt a common danger, and were only anxious to cope with and overthrow it. While I leave myself free to vote as I shall deem best upon all details, I stand committed, for one, to give my voice and vote to stay the march of this prairie fire; to fight it out at once, before it involves our homes and ourselves in the ruin of its spreading conflagration.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois, obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 202) to appropriate money to supply deficiencies for the paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and had come to no resolution thereon.

VACANCY ON A SELECT COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed Mr. GOOCH on the special committee to investigate the official conduct and accounts of the late Doorkeeper of the House, in place of Mr. DAWES, excused.

OHIO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, from the Committee of Elections, made a report in the case of the contested election from the third congressional district of Ohio, accompanied with the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to allow further time to take testimony in this case, as asked for by the sitting member.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I simply ask that the report and the accompanying papers be printed, and I will call it up when members shall have had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. GILMER, from the minority of the Committee of Elections, submitted a minority report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That Lewis D. Campbell and Clement L. Vallandigham be, and they are hereby, allowed the further time of forty days from the passage of this order, to take supplementary evidence touching the matters set forth in the memorial of Clement L. Vallandigham.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The facts upon which these reports, majority and minority, are founded, are set forth in the papers which I have presented. I simply desire that these reports and accompanying papers shall be laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed. After members shall have an opportunity to look into them, I shall call the resolution up for action.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Is it understood that the minority report shall be printed?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It is.

The reports, with the accompanying papers, were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That Clement L. Vallandigham leave to occupy a seat upon the floor of this House, pending the discussion of the report of the Committee of Elections on the case of his contest for the seat now occupied by Lewis D. Campbell, from the third congressional district of the State of Ohio, and that he have leave to speak to the merits of said contest, and the report thereon.

This is the usual resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

NEBRASKA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to present a brief report from the Committee of Elections in the Nebraska case, accompanied by a resolution. I ask that it be read.

The report was read, and is as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Bird B. Chapman, contesting the right to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fifth Congress of Hon. Fenner Ferguson, as Delegate from the Territory of Nebraska, respectfully report that, from the evidence before the committee, there seems to have been a misapprehension of the parties in relation to the notices served heretofore for the taking of testimony, and the committee think that further time should be allowed the parties to perfect the proof in the case. They therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the parties, the contestant and contestee, in this case, be allowed the further time of sixty days from the passage of this resolution to take and return supplemental testimony.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have just been informed by one of my colleagues on the Committee of Elections, that Mr. Chapman desires to be heard on that resolution before there is any action taken upon it. I therefore beg leave to withdraw the resolution. I was not apprised of the fact at the time of its presentation.

The report was withdrawn.

INTERRUPTION OF THE TRANSIT ROUTE.

Mr. QUITMAN. I desire to offer a resolution for the purpose of obtaining some information from the President of the United States upon a subject which will shortly come before us.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not deemed incompatible with the public interests—

1. All correspondence, which has not heretofore been published, of our late Minister to Nicaragua on the subject of the interruption of the transit route through Nicaragua, and the murder of American citizens on the 13th October, 1856.

2. The correspondence between British officers and the Costa Rican authorities, which was intercepted on the river San Juan, by officers of Nicaragua, and forwarded to the State Department by our Minister, in explanation of the incentives to the war on this line of communication to the Pacific.

3. All information in possession of the Government respecting the subsequent attack of the Costa Ricans, in April, 1856, on the depot and wharf of the American Transit Company, at Virgin Bay, and whether any atonement has been made or demanded for the wanton destruction of American property, and the slaughter of our citizens on that occasion.

4. All correspondence and information in possession of the Government relative to the seizure by the forces of Costa Rica, in December, 1856, of the Transit Company, on the San Juan river and elsewhere in Nicaragua, whereby the transit route across this isthmus was broken up; and whether any steps have been taken to restore communication over said route.

Mr. BLISS. I do not know that I have any objection to the resolution; but I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Mississippi, in order to know whether I have or not. There is one branch of the resolution which, if I understand it, calls for certain stolen correspondence between Great Britain and Costa Rica—correspondence that was stolen by Mr. Walker or by some of his followers, and sent to this country. Is that so?

Mr. QUITMAN. The resolution calls for correspondence sent to this Government by the American Minister at that time near the Republic of Nicaragua, on the subject of the interruption of the transit route—a subject of deep interest to us. It is very necessary that the information should be before the House in connection with some portions of the message of the President of the United States.

Mr. BLISS. It seems, then, that my inquiry is either acquiesced in or evaded, and I must object to the resolution.

INSPECTION DISTRICT AT PADUCAH.

Mr. BURNETT, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill providing for the establishment of an inspection district at Paducah in the State of Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE SUSQUEHANNA.

Mr. RICAUD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to enable me to introduce a bill of which previous notice has been given for reference only.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, (at eighteen minutes after four o'clock.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RICAUD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, until I can get my bill in.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is a bad thing to legislate after we come out of committee.

Mr. RICAUD. I have been trying to get this bill in for several days.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, sir, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. RICAUD then by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, making appropriations to improve the navigation of the Susquehanna river; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PLYMOUTH HARBOR, MASSACHUSETTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th instant, transmitting the report of the officer in charge of the engineer department, with inclosure, furnishing the estimate for the repair of the works in Plymouth harbor, Massachusetts, and for the preservation of the same; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOUSTON, (at twenty-three minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 28, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. E. KINGSFORD, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, estimates for appropriations to pay volunteers serving in Florida; which, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, the report of Captain J. C. Woodruff, of the topographical engineers, of a survey or examination of the Potomac river in the vicinity of Washington city, accompanied by a chart thereof; which, on motion by Mr. HAMLIN, was referred to the Committee on Commerce. A motion of Mr. SEWARD that the report be printed and the accompanying map engraved, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement showing the amount of revenue collected in each collection district for each year from 1852 to 1857, inclusive, the amount expended, and the number of persons employed in each district in its collection for each of those years; which, on motion of Mr. WILSON, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter of the Secretary of State, in response to a resolution of the Senate calling for information in regard to contracts made in Europe for inland passage tickets for intending emigrants to the United States; which, with the documents by which it was accompanied, on motion of Mr. KING, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLEN presented the memorial of G. W. Lippitt, praying for compensation for diplomatic services while United States consul at Vienna; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the memorial of Daniel J. Browne, of the agricultural division of the Patent Office, praying for compensation for extra services, and for an increase of his salary; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the memorial of George M. Weston, commissioner of the State of Maine, praying for the reimbursement of expenditures by that State, in defending the territory in dispute between the United States and Great Britain prior to the treaty of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of a committee appointed at a special meeting of the Provident Association of Clerks of the city of Washington, praying for the enactment of a law to authorize the association to wind up its affairs; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a memorial of the Corporation of Georgetown, praying for an appropriation to complete the erection of lamp posts in that town; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BIGLER presented the petition of O. H. Browne, praying for indemnity for depredations in Kansas, committed by marauders during the political excitement in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of commissioners appointed by an act of the Legislature of the State of New York, to erect and take charge of the arsenals and armories in the State, praying that the United States arsenal at Rome, New York, may be ceded to the State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. BIGLER presented a memorial of underwriters of Philadelphia, praying that a steam revenue cutter may be built at that place, and stationed in the Delaware Bay and on the coast adjacent thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KING. I desire to present a petition from the masters of steamers and sailing vessels and ship-owners at Buffalo, Chicago, and other ports on the lakes, asking that a law may be passed establishing regulations for lights to be carried by sailing vessels. They allege that the law now regulating the carrying of lights by steamers in the night time answers a good purpose; but there is no law regulating the carrying of lights by sailing vessels of the United States; that the Provincial Government of Canada has recently established a good system for their ships and vessels, and the petitioners desire that one may be established similar to it, by a law of the United States, for our vessels. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY presented a petition of citizens of Florida, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Mollenville to Bay Port, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the petition of Joseph Chaires, executor of Benjamin Chaires, deceased, and Gad Humphreys, and Pedro Miranda, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Nathaniel Champe, in behalf of the heirs of John Champe, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 39) for the relief of Elizabeth Montgomery, heir of Hugh Montgomery, reported it, with an amendment; and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of William C. Fowler and others, praying to be allowed bounty land for services in the last war with Great Britain; and two petitions of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms or lots of limited size for the free and exclusive use of settlers not possessed of other lands, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of H. W. Benham, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 100) releasing to the legal representatives of John McNeil, deceased, the title of the United States to a certain tract of land. The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 47) confirming the location of land warrants under certain circumstances, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of Agatha O'Brien, widow of J. P. J. O'Brien, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 101) for the relief of Mrs. Agatha O'Brien, widow of Brevet Major J. P. J. O'Brien, late of the United States Army. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Phenix, jr., submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 102) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOOMBS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of S. De Visser & Co., reported a bill (S. No. 103) for the relief of Simon De Visser and Jose Villarubia, of New Orleans; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

TAMPICO VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the petition of S. W. Aldrick and other officers of the Tampico mounted rangers, and the memorial of Lewis Morris, reported a resolution that the prayer of the petitioners and the memorialist be rejected; and asked for the present consideration of the report.

Mr. TOOMBS. What is it about?

Mr. DAVIS. The petition asks us to compensate some persons who were mustered into the service, or irregularly called into the service, at Tampico. The object is to make a report which, if adopted by the Senate, will dispose of the subject. The report is adverse.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let us hear the report.

The Secretary read it as follows:

It appears that during the war with Mexico, after Tampico had been taken by our Army, in March, 1847, many threats were made by the enemy, in and around that city, to retake the place, and it was considered necessary by Colonel William Gates, then in command there, to call upon every American citizen and foreigner to arm themselves for the safety of the town, and the protection of themselves and property. An order was consequently issued, requiring enrollments to be made under the particular direction of Major W. W. Morris, fourth regiment artillery. Four companies were formed in this way, embracing quartermasters, men, crews of vessels in port, and American citizens generally, who offered to serve with their own horses, if forage only was allowed them, which was done; and these companies did much service at night in scouting around the town. They continued to do duty occasionally, not regularly, until October following, when there was no longer any necessity for them.

Colonel Gates, in a letter dated in October, 1848, to Adjutant General Jones, says:

"No muster-rolls were made for the purpose of mustering these men into the United States service, as I had no authority for doing so; but my force was weak, and there was a necessity for every man I could find for the defense of the place, and the safety of property and lives. I have never had any rolls made for the purpose of mustering them out of service, as I had not promised them pay or rations. The call upon them was made upon a great emergency, when the lives of all the citizens of the United States in Tampico were in danger, and when self-preservation was the actuating motive. There were officers enrolled in said companies under the same circumstances, and to some of these officers I have, as Governor, and at their request, given commissions, in order that it might be serviceable on some future occasion in giving them respectability as such. I can only say that they were useful and good volunteers."

The committee do not consider that these Tampico volunteers were ever in the United States service. It was a mere town association, organized for mutual defense, such as prudent communities resort to under similar circumstances, but for which service it has not been the practice of the Government to make compensation.

The report was concurred in; and the prayer of the memorial was rejected.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am instructed by the special committee appointed to examine into the condition of the banks in the District of Columbia, to make a report in writing, accompanied by a bill and resolution. I move that the report and bill and the resolution be printed, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate to make the consideration of this subject the special order of the day for some day that may be as near as possible. I will say the second Monday in February.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A special order has already been made for that day.

Mr. SLIDELL. Then I will say the second Tuesday of February.

The bill (S. No. 104) to prohibit the issue of bank notes by corporations, associations, or individuals, within the District of Columbia, and further to prevent the circulation of bank notes issued by any incorporated company or association of individuals, located beyond the limits of the District of Columbia, of a less denomination than fifty dollars, was read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

The report was accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to authorize the establishment, either by general or special laws, of banks of issue within the District of Columbia.

The report, resolution, and bill were ordered to be printed, and were made the special order for the second Tuesday of February, at one o'clock.

POST ROUTE IN FLORIDA.

Mr. MALLORY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail between Mollenville and Bay Port, Florida, via Apopka Lake, Harris Lake, Adamsville, Sumterville, and Spring Hill.

POST ROUTE IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law a post route from Marion, in the State of Arkansas, via Walnut Grove, Lyle's Ferry, and Neely's Ferry, to Walnut Camp in said State, and report by bill or otherwise.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the amount of expenditure for the support of the Military Academy at West Point for the past year, including compensation of cadets and all officers connected therewith.

LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law creating the Light-House Board.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. STUART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 105) to ascertain and adjust the titles to certain lands in Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. FOOT. I desire to present a proposition for the construction of a railroad from the Missouri river to San Francisco, by what has been denominated the northern route. I shall ask that it lie on the table, and be printed, in connection with the bill of the select committee, and the proposition presented yesterday by the honorable Senator from Mississippi. I do not offer this as an antagonist proposition to the bill reported by the special committee. That bill had my concurrence in the committee, and will have my vote and my support here. In the event, however, that that should be superseded by the proposition of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, I propose to offer it, not as a substitute for that proposition, but as an additional section to the bill presented by the Senator from Mississippi. In the event that the bill of the committee should be superseded by the substitute, and my amendment shall be also adopted, thus connecting the two routes, the north and the south, I shall be able to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi; and I hope that he, at the same time, will be able to vote for my proposition. I ask that it lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to my honorable friend from Vermont, that the proposition which I presented to the Senate yesterday was not for any particular route. It was across the territory, and did not locate the route.

Mr. FOOT. I had a misapprehension on that subject, not being able to see the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. It is fair I should say that I have no doubt where the road will be.

Mr. FOOT. I do not present this proposition, however, as antagonist to that of the Senator from Mississippi, or the bill of the committee.

Mr. GWIN. There was an order made yesterday evening to print another edition of the bill reported by me from the select committee, in connection with the substitute of the Senator from Mississippi. The Senator from Vermont had better make his motion that this proposition be printed with that bill, so that they shall all be printed together.

Mr. FOOT. I vary the motion in that way. The motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. TOOMBS to strike out the first section of the bill, which is in the following words:

That there shall be added to each of the regiments of dragoons, cavalry, infantry, and of mounted riflemen, two companies, to be organized in the same manner as the companies now composing these arms, respectively; and to receive the same pay and allowances, and to be entitled to the same provisions and benefits in every respect, as are authorized by the existing laws; they shall be subject to the rules and articles of war; and the enlisted men are to be recruited in the same manner as other troops, with the same conditions and limitations.

Mr. HALE. With the consent of the Senator from Georgia, who is entitled to the floor, I rise to a statement of fact which I wish to correct. The day before yesterday I stated, in my place, some facts with reference to the expenditures of the Army, and the appropriations asked for in the deficiency bill, in these words as they are reported; and I believe they are reported accurately:

"The deficiency which the Administration asks for for the War Department, for the military service is, I understand, $6,700,000. We actually spent $19,436,000, and they want about seven million dollars more, making $26,000,000 for military service last year."

That is the statement which is quoted in a newspaper printed in this city, called the Washington Union, which, I believe, is the organ of the Administration, of the Supreme Court, and of the Lecompton convention. I do not often notice attacks from such quarters when they relate to myself personally; but as this relates to a matter connected with the public service, and the accuracy of my statement is questioned, I beg leave to lay two documents before the Senate. This writer goes on to say:

"It is surprising that a member of the august Senate of the United States should consent to commit himself to statements like these—statements disclosing either inexcusable ignorance of the subject in hand, or else a most callous indifference to fact and truth."

Then he follows with about a column of twaddle, which, I suppose, he meant for wit; but I think he will have to explain it to anybody to get it understood as such. Then he comes to this statement:

"The Senator, therefore, has made the slight mistake of $5,000,000 in his statement of the aggregate expenses of the Army for the year. Instead of $23,000,000, the charge is $21,000,000; and of this charge, nearly seven millions are asked to meet the extraordinary exigency of the Utah rebellion."

I hold in my hand, sir, Miscellaneous Document No. 56 of the Senate, of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, third session, in which there is a recapitulation of the appropriations made last year; and in that recapitulation I find this item:

"Army, fortifications, and Military Academy, $19,436,190 41."

the precise sum which I stated the other day, omitting the fractions of dollars and cents. I hold in my hand another document, of which I propose to read a page, and then leave the subject. I now read from Miscellaneous Document No. 22 of the House of Representatives of the present session, entitled "Deficiencies in Quartermaster's Department:"

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE, WASHINGTON, January 6, 1858.

STR: As I had occasion to state in my report, dated 21st of November, that large appropriations would be required for deficiencies in the present year on account of transportation and other Army expenditures made by the laws and regulations through the Quartermaster's department, I have made a thorough investigation of all the business, as well as military operations of the department, and have found that from the vast extent of those operations, the deficiency to be supplied is greater than I had believed it would be at the date of my report.

It is ascertained that a deficiency existed at the close of last year, which has been a charge upon the present year, of about $1,000,000; in addition to which the extensive operations against the Cheyennes and other Indian tribes, and the extensive arrangements for the operations in Utah, have exhausted the appropriations for the present year so far that there is not a sufficient balance in the Treasury to fill the estimates now on my table for December; and the whole balance in the hands of disbursing officers will not be sufficient for the service for one half of the present month. Appropriations will therefore be required to carry the service through the year, and to make the large outfit for the operations in Utah for the following objects, viz:

For regular supplies, including fuel, forage, straw, and stationery.....	$778,000
Mounts and remounts.....	252,000
Incidental expenses.....	190,000
Barracks and quarters.....	80,000
Army transportation.....	5,400,000

Making..... $6,700,000 deficiencies, and for the service in Utah, taking the Army as it is, and limiting the expenditures to operations already determined on, as they have been communicated to me.

Should operations be carried on from the Pacific, or should a larger force be sent from this side, an increase in the appropriation in proportion to the increased force will be required.

I will have all the details ready to submit to you, so soon as they can be fairly copied, which make the several aggregate amounts above stated to be necessary.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

TH. S. JESUP, Quartermaster General.
Hon. J. B. FLOYD, Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

Having the figures with me, I leave the wit to the editor.

Mr. DAVIS. With the permission of the Senator from Georgia I merely wish to say that I think the Senator from New Hampshire falls into the error, which has been commonly committed, of charging everything that has been estimated for by the Secretary of War as the expenses of the Army. Fortifications are certainly not the expenses of the Army. The building of the Capitol extension, or of the Aqueduct, is not an expense of the Army; yet these works, being under the charge of the War Department, go into the estimates of the Secretary of War. I think the statement which has been made from year to year of the gross amounts, without reference to the object of the expenditure, and proclaiming the whole as the expense of the Army, does injustice to that branch of the service.

Mr. HALE. I have no controversy with the Senator on that point. I simply wanted to vindicate myself before the country for the use of the figures I had used, being sustained in them entirely by the public documents; and I stated distinctly, I think, that the sum I named was the whole of the appropriation, including fortifications, ordnance, &c.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no purpose at all to take up the controversy between the Senator and the Union. I have not read the article to which he refers. My remarks were merely intended to put the Army in what I think is its true position.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, the discussion on this bill seems to have taken a very wide range, into which I do not intend to follow it. Some elements unfavorable to a calm judgment and proper determination of the question have been introduced on both sides by the disputants in this case. I desire to bring the Senate back to my motion, its effect and consequences, and the reasons which I suggested, rather than argued, when I originally made it.

I propose to strike out all of the first section of this bill, except the enacting clause. The effect of that will be to prevent the addition of thirty companies to the present military establishment of the United States, consisting of ninety-six men each, making nearly three thousand men, leaving the military establishment, if this bill should then pass without further amendment, twenty-two thousand men. If the bill be passed amended as I now propose, it will fix above twenty-two thousand men as the legal establishment of the United States; not the peace establishment, for under the peace establishment many of the companies are authorized to enlist only fifty-two men, and under the existing law many of the companies are authorized to carry their numbers to seventy-four; but, under the bill on your table, the President is authorized, if the public necessities should require it, to carry the number of each company to ninety-six men. The President, therefore, will have a legal right to bring into the field above twenty-two thousand men, if this bill passes even with the amendment I propose; and without that amendment, the bill carries the Army of the United States to between twenty-five and twenty-six thousand men. That is my motion, and the immediate effect of it.

The reasons which I offered for this motion to strike out the first section when I proposed it, were based purely on the fact that the existing military establishment, and certainly with the addition proposed by the second section of the bill, is at least large enough; I think it much too large. Two years ago, I opposed the addition of the four regiments. I believe there has been no session of Congress since I have been a member of either House, at which the head of the Army, the Secretary of War, and the President of the United States, have not recommended an increase. Whether we are in peace or in war, whether we are threatened with Indians or with Mormons, or with British or any other Power, on every occasion, every newspaper rumor with reference to war is made the occasion for asking an increase of the Army. Up to a very few years ago, and I believe up to the time of the Mexican war, we had but six thousand men on the military establishment of the United States. It was adequate to all the purposes for which an army ought ever to be used.

I am at issue with the chairman of the committee, [Mr. DAVIS,] as to the greater difficulty now of defending the country than has existed from the beginning of the Government until the present time. The great power of the Government, its greatly increased physical power and its consequently increased moral power, the civilizing and the subjugation of those powerful tribes who once occupied the country east of the Mississippi, have tended to remove the grounds of alarm that formerly existed.

The Creeks, the Cherokees, and the Choctaws, of the South, have been removed beyond the Mississippi; and the powerful bands of northwestern Indians who once gave so much trouble, have been subjugated and nearly destroyed and annihilated. Those Indians at one time almost defied the entire power of the Republic, from 1790 to 1800. They are gone, and we have but a few miserable, disjointed, fragmentary tribes on this and the other side of the Rocky Mountains, without a single element of military strength. As the Secretary of War has said, they are roaming vagabonds, without culture, without any means for carrying on war except simply their bows and arrows; they are naked and defenseless, and give us no other trouble than to catch them. There is no force of Indians on this continent, within the limits of the United States, capable of fighting two thousand of our soldiers. There has not been an embodiment of Indians in the country for the last twenty-five years capable of fighting two thousand of our men.

If Senators will look into the history of the tribes west of the Rocky Mountains, they will find that it is said many of these wars are made, and they may be made for all I know, for the purpose of leading to the expenditure of public money. It shows how little the Indians are regarded by the community, if it be true. I have known similar charges wrongfully made about other sections of the country, and they may be wrongfully made about these people west of the Rocky Mountains, in regard to which we have greater difficulty in getting at the truth. But it is absolutely certain, as I have stated, that there is no prospect, nor is there scarcely a possibility that, at least within any brief space of time, before the militia of the country, the natural and legitimate and just defense of the people in all free Governments, can be collected together, a force of Indians capable of meeting two thousand United States troops can be mustered anywhere on the North American continent.

The proposition is to make this addition to the Army as a permanent peace establishment; and I admit the chairman of the committee meets it frankly and fairly. He does not base this increase of the Army on our present Mormon difficulties; he does not even base it on our present supposed Indian difficulties; but he puts it on the broad, naked principle that the public necessities require the enlargement of the military service of the United States. Upon that, I propose to meet him. It is true we are appealed to by other Senators, who refer us to the condition of a couple of regiments that, I believe, we have in the mountains between this and Utah. We are able to bring sixteen thousand men, or such portion of them as may be necessary, to their aid, whenever they can be got there. It is very certain that no great increase of the force in Utah is either necessary or possible to be used. It is not supposed, I believe, by the officers there, whose reports and letters I have looked into, that five thousand men could be used there, or would be necessary to be used if we had them there. I presume, if the President had command of one hundred thousand men, he would not place five thousand in Utah. The cost of maintaining them would be great. The whole difficulty with the enemy, according to the present opinions of the military men of the Government, it seems to me, is that we shall have to run down the Mormons from the mountains when we get to Salt Lake City; and about two regiments are within one hundred and fifty miles of that place. It is ridiculous to suppose that this man Brigham Young, is able to compete with three thousand troops of the United States. Then the Army establishment, as now proposed, will give you ten thousand men more than were ever used before, for the ordinary defense of the Republic. It will leave you twelve thousand men to take care of the Indian frontier, and give you ten thousand men to march against Brigham Young in Utah. Is not that enough?

I leave out of account the reasons adroitly seized upon by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs yesterday, that a portion of the army in Kansas had prevented one side from killing the other. I believe the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] said his side would have slaughtered the whole of their opponents; and my honorable colleague [Mr. IVERSON] said that, without the Army, his people would have killed them all. I do not know how that is, nor do I care. I think the country would never suffer much, if both of them—

Mr. IVERSON. My colleague does not misrepresent me intentionally?

Mr. TOOMBS. Certainly not.

Mr. IVERSON. I said nothing about my people killing the Mormons.

Mr. TOOMBS. I did not assert it. The statement was that they would kill the Abolitionists in Kansas.

Mr. IVERSON. Yes. I did not say my people, but I thought the Missouri people would have put them down pretty effectually. That is what I meant.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will not go into the controversy at all. The matter has not been tested. I leave that question; but I brought it up to enter my dissent to using the Army for any such purpose. I will not give a man of the Army of the United States to maintain the civil peace of this country. I tell you the history of forty centuries has demonstrated that order obtained by regular soldiers is despotism; and that peace obtained by regular soldiers is the cemetery of liberty; and I will never give a man for that purpose. I will maintain peace on no such terms; I will have order at no such cost. If the freemen of this country cannot maintain their own laws of themselves, they are unfit to govern themselves, and I shall not moan at any amount of destruction which they may mutually commit. I shall not endanger the public liberty of twenty-five millions of freemen to compose the difficulties of two, three, five, or ten thousand men, on any side of a local controversy, in any part of the United States.

I know that it is just as impossible for the Ethiop to change his skin, or the leopard his spots, as for a regular army to be the friend of liberty. Always, in all ages, in all times, and in all countries, it has been the instrument of despotism. There is not a despotism in the world that could stand ninety days without this infamous instrument of oppression. How is the glorious Empire of France upheld to-day? How are the Italian people to-day held subject to a foreign Power? It is unnecessary to designate nations; but point to a country on the face of the earth where despotism tramples liberty under foot, and I will show you a country where it is upheld, not by the people, but by military power—by a regular army. They are the natural allies of despotism everywhere. They always have been, and they always will be. We are departing from the great, sound, and fundamental principles of our ancestors when we look to a standing army to maintain public order.

Then I must throw out that element which is offered me by the honorable chairman of the committee. I do not rejoice at peace which is maintained on those terms; I do not rejoice at order which is secured by the bayonets of mercenaries in the pay of the Government. Then dismissing that as an element, I notice another objection which is made by the honorable chairman. I do not propose to alter the principle we have followed with so much success from the beginning of the Government, and for which he so justly complimented the late distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun. His proposition to add thirty companies, I say, does alter the Army as left by Mr. Calhoun, and my proposition secures it in all its just proportions and symmetry. His organization of the regiment was ten companies. It is true this is a small point; but we are urged to maintain Mr. Calhoun's principles, and I am endeavoring to do it. I am maintaining them as he left them. I am maintaining the regiments as he left them when Secretary of War, if that is to be the model. He left the regiments with ten companies as the skeleton. He left it so in order that it might be enlarged on the occasion of war with any Power great or small, for the reasons so much better stated by the honorable chairman than I can state them. Our dispute is not whether we shall maintain the skeleton system—I shall not differ from the Senator from Mississippi on that point—but solely as to the size of the skeleton; and I am maintaining it precisely on the principles which he has so well presented to the Senate. I am for preserving the skeleton of the Army as fixed by Mr. Calhoun. We have now from twelve to thirteen hundred officers; we have fifty-two men in each company on the peace establishment, capable of being enlarged, capable of letting in raw recruits to the extent of fifty other men on the war establishment. That gives you, I admit, a strongly increased effective force for an emergency, and I am for maintaining it. But in order to get more, the Senator from Mississippi wants to enlarge the skeleton, and I do not. That is the difference between us. I do not think he can take much by referring to the wisdom or acknowledged patriotism of Mr. Calhoun, for I am not only defending his principles but for exercising it just as he exercised it, and executed the military law when he was Secretary of War.

I am very glad to find so great an authority with me, though I am free to confess, that such is my jealousy of strengthening the standing Army of this country, that I should disregard all authority that attempted to shake those principles which have grown with my growth and strengthened with my strength. All experience and all history have taught me that standing armies are dangerous to public liberty. If you cannot maintain order, if you cannot maintain the law, if the regular operations of the Government cannot go along, then set up a military despotism, as they do in France, Austria, and the German States; but if you build up a standing Army, for the purpose of maintaining order, you have already subverted your Government. The very enunciation of the principle is a subversion of the fundamental ideas on which your Government was built. We have acted on the idea that the freemen of the country are capable of maintaining the law, of maintaining peace, of maintaining order. If that is wrong, if that is not true, if we have been mistaken, then our Government is a failure. It may be so; but I am not, as yet, willing to admit it. While I am not able to express the confidence that was felt twenty years ago, and which I then felt in common with many of the people of the United States, as to its final success, I am at least not yet prepared to give it up.

Then, what are the other reasons? I do not want an increase of the Army to secure public order. There is no occasion for it on account of the condition of the Indians. We have, as I before stated, not as many of them, and not as powerful races as formerly. The time was, when, on the frontier, in my own State, the Indians would bring twenty thousand men into the field. They fought your disciplined armies with one of the greatest American commanders, face to face, in some of the greatest pitched battles fought on your continent. They fought General Jackson, and other distinguished leaders. Where are they now? Where are their armies? Where is their material? Where is their organization? It is now openly charged by many gentlemen, as a reason for the increase of the Army, that Indian wars are got up by the people for the profit growing out of them. That is the allegation. So little dangerous have they become, so little do they alarm even the irregular militia, that it is openly charged in the Senate Chamber, and the other House, that the border people themselves get up these wars so that they may plunder the public Treasury. Suppose that is true. I am not indorsing it; I know nothing of it. I should hope it were not true. I do not believe it is true, as applied to any considerable body of people. But if it is true, will your Army prevent it? How will your Army prevent it? You cannot put ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand men all along the Indian border, within supporting distances, on your vast frontier. You must have a small force at various points as you have now. The difficulty is, that the people may make these Indian wars, and call out the militia for the purpose of drawing money from your Treasury, as is alleged, before any considerable regular force can be got there. There is on our table a document in relation to a quarrel between a general in the United States Army, a man distinguished in the field, and these very settlers, when he was on the ground, for refusing to use the troops of the United States. The settlers, he said, got up the war for the purpose of plunder. How is it to be prevented? There is no preventive anywhere but here. It is the business of Congress to inquire into it, to use the best means for ascertaining whether these wars are got up regularly or irregularly, and whether they are legal or not. If they are illegal, the authors of them should be punished by law, and Congress should refuse to pay the expenses of the war. If I am answered that this cannot be done, then I respond, that it is one of those evils of free government that you must pay for. If it is true that you cannot get men honest enough to inquire into the facts, and that you have no means of getting information, and are necessarily plundered, then you must submit to it as one of the necessary evils of your extension. It cannot be shown that the Army can prevent it. It is said that the Indians do not make the wars, but the settlers. Then, you want the Army not to repress the Indians, but to repress the freemen. If the argument has any force, it is that, and that alone.

He who has looked into the account of the Indian war beyond the Rocky Mountains can very readily perceive that at no time have three thousand Indians ever been embodied, unless on some treaty-making occasion, to get goods and money. Those are the only occasions now, on which we ever see three thousand Indians together. How can they maintain themselves? They are uncivilized necessarily from the condition of the country, scattered into little valleys, without the means of carrying on war; they are really helpless, and dependent on the Government of the United States for subsistence. The Senate, not more than twelve months ago, was called upon, and will no doubt, at this very session, be called upon again, to appropriate thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars to feed the poor Indians in California, in the Northwest, and in Texas. We were told that that policy was going to diminish the necessity for armies; that it was better to feed them than to fight them; that that policy was humane, philanthropic, just, and, above all, that it was economical. But while we are spending our hundreds of thousands of dollars on the "economical" idea of feeding the Indians, we are, on the other hand, spending our millions to increase our means of defense against them! That is the very inconsistent policy which this body is called upon to maintain at this session. I did not believe in the feeding policy. I do not believe savage tribes can be kept in subordination except by force. I believe it to be a necessary ingredient in their government, and I think the present Army of the United States is adequate to all the purposes of keeping them in terror. I believe they are not to be restrained by any other motive than the fear of punishment; and that is not very peculiar to Indians, but the same remark applies to a great number of other people.

We are again told, as a reason for this increase, that the militia are a more expensive arm of defense. The chairman of the committee puts it on that alone; he does not put it on the Mormon war, or Indian disturbances; but, as a reason for this permanent addition to the peace establishment of the country, it is said that the militia are a more expensive arm of defense. To prove this, the honorable Senator read some reports as to what moneys were expended in the Rogue river war. The sum of $75,000 was one of the items; $900,000 was another. Here is a fundamental error. I know it has been the Army idea; I know it has been dinned in our ears for twenty years by the persons here at the head of the Army, that the militia was an exceedingly expensive force in suppressing insurrection or Indian disturbances. I am prepared to combat that assertion; it is not true. In the first place, if the militia are called into the service of the United States, they are subject to the same rules and get the same pay as the Army, with this disadvantage, which I have felt in my own person—they are not half as good in making out accounts as those who are used to them. It is impossible that they can get more pay, or more rations, or more transportation. They are paid by the same schedule, and you cannot get one dollar more for these men, because the regular officers are generally, almost universally, the paymasters in Indian disturbances. The accounts are passed by the accounting officers of the Treasury. You call a man temporarily from his plow, from his farm, and put him in the service of the country; you pay him for the time you want him, and then discharge him to go and make his own living. But get a regiment added to the Army, and when do you get rid of it? In such cases as the great war of the Revolution your men disband easy enough, because there is nothing with which to pay them. At the end of the last war with Great Britain we disbanded them, but we soon afterwards increased the Army. After the war with Mexico we found that the difficulty was so great of disbanding the Army, even in time of peace, that the American Congress were doubtful even of their own ability to bring it within any reasonable scope. With a foreign war on our hands, the very acts raising the regiments limited their duration to the war. We got rid of those regiments by that provision in the act raising them, and in no other way; and even then, in one mode or another, by special acts increasing the general officers, many of those gentlemen are still in the service of the United States.

It is not so when you call out volunteers and militia-men, who are much better fitted for this service, and have done more of it; for I verily believe that, if the repression of Indian hostilities belonged to the Army of the United States, to this day half my State would have been covered by Indians. We never had any troops there from 1775, until the Government sent them there to protect the Indians against us. Those were the first we had. The first soldier that ever made a track on the frontiers of Georgia was there to protect the Indians against us. I believe the honorable Senator did say that volunteers were very apt to commit great cruelties and kill the Indians. I think they are apt to hurt somebody if they fight. That is one advantage of having the Army; they hurt very few Indians! They are not the description of troops who are likely to do it. Sir, you understand these regular troops; you and I know them, and probably both of us have served with them. You might just as well expect an upland colt to run down an antelope ass, with the regular troops, attempt to run down an Indian. They are not suited to it; and, therefore, when we had real Indian difficulties, you had to cover your frontier with citizen soldiers and end the war. I have seen thousands and thousands who have been subdued by volunteers, carried to the distant West by them. Very little of that work has been done by regulars.

There is a remarkable fact that I will state. I think, during the period of the independence of Texas, about four companies of rangers defended her frontier from Arkansas all the way around to the Rio Grande, and down that river to the Gulf of Mexico—a line of not less than three thousand miles. Now, we send company upon company, regiment upon regiment there, at the most tremendous cost, expending an amount of money that Texas never dreamed of in her most extravagant days, and yet they are not as well defended as they were then, notwithstanding Texas, at that time, had less than fifty thousand inhabitants, and is now supposed to have half a million. Four companies of Texas rangers were more effective for the defense of the frontier than five regiments of United States soldiers. Volunteers are ready at all times. They will break into your Army whenever you invite them. There has never been a day or an hour within thirty years, whenever you wanted volunteers for temporary purposes, to defend you against Indians or other enemies, that your volunteers and militia have not leaped forward with an alacrity that gave no other trouble than to select from among them. If they cost more for a month or a year, you can disband them when you do not need them; but get your regular regiment, and you keep it for ten years at least.

There is another very remarkable fact with reference to Mr. Calhoun's administration of the War Department. I speak from memory (but I know I speak with accuracy, for I once had this question before me) when I say that during the administration of the War Department by Mr. Calhoun, he brought down the expense per man in the Army to $273. It has now gone up, it seems, according to the estimates even of the legitimate expenses of the Army, to more than one thousand dollars a man.

Mr. HAMLIN. The legitimate expense is $1,500 per man.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator from Maine says the legitimate expense is $1,500 a man. There is nothing in the times to warrant this increased expenditure. A bushel of wheat is as cheap as it was in 1816 or 1818. The ration you give your soldier is about as cheap as it was then. You have made a small addition to the pay of the men and a large one to the pay of officers, it is true; but that is comparatively a small item. Since you have got them remote from the center, since you have got them on distant frontiers, since you have lost accountability, your expenses are daily increasing in geometrical progression, without the least regard to the cost of living; and it must be arrested. I was glad to see the Senate lay its hand on that yesterday, when only eight men here could be found who would countenance this recommendation of the addition of five regiments to the regular Army.

This bill—and I would call the attention of the Senate particularly to that fact—adds thirty companies, equal to three regiments, to the present military organization, with all their officers, except field officers. It is taking three instead of five regiments—that is the difference between the first section of this bill and the proposition of the War Department. The section which I seek to strike out adds two companies to each regiment, making an addition of thirty companies to the whole Army, equal to three regiments of ten companies each. By this section, therefore, you are adding three regiments to the Army, to the same extent as the present regiments in number, except the regimental officers. That I do not propose to do.

There has been no want of power in the President to send troops to aid our soldiers in Utah; and at any time last summer he could have added two, three, or four thousand men to the Army under the present power, for the numbers of each company can be carried from fifty-two to seventy-four, according to the existing law. If this bill should become a law, the difficulties will be settled before the first man ever reaches there, unless it be an officer. Before the first soldier, raised by your bill, crosses the Rocky Mountains, I say the difficulty there will have terminated, and the necessity for them will cease to exist. That argument is used, therefore, merely as a pretext for permanently saddling the country with an enormously expensive military establishment. An Army of twenty-five thousand men, as was justly remarked by the Senator from New Hampshire the other day, is equal to an Army of one hundred thousand men twenty-five years ago. Considering our means of transportation to the interior, the facilities of railroads and steamboats, and the power of rapid combination, twenty-five thousand men are a more effective military force to-day than one hundred thousand would have been twenty-five years ago. Where, then, is the necessity, if you do not intend to enforce your laws in Massachusetts and New York? We do not want them enforced by your Army in Georgia. There is not a soldier there, and has not been for ten years. The last one I believe that was in the State came there to help the Indians against us; but since that time there has not been a single one, and I hope never to see another—I hope never to see the sole of the foot of a Federal soldier press the soil of Georgia. If she cannot defend herself, I am willing to see her dig her own grave.

Mr. STUART. I propose to make some remarks on this subject myself; but it will be recollected that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] was entitled to the floor on another subject which was assigned for one o'clock to-day, and I therefore move to postpone all prior orders, and take up the joint resolution (S. No. 7) directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding, together with the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the same subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution on which the Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor is the next special order after the disposition of this one. What disposition does the Senator propose to make of this?

Mr. STUART. I move to postpone all prior orders. That will give us an opportunity to proceed again with this bill to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. It would be very agreeable to me to answer the Senator from Georgia at this time, but I know I am indebted to the courtesy of the Senator from Maryland for the ability to discuss this question the last two days, and therefore I shall make no objection to postponing the whole subject until he concludes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved to postpone the special order now under consideration, with a view to take up the next special order.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMODORE PAULDING.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 7) directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. Brown.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, among the strange things to which I listened during the debate on this question, nothing surprised me more than the pertinacity with which it was denied that this was a military expedition by General William Walker. That denial has been repeated so often, and in the face of such testimony, that I cannot but call to mind a little work published by Archbishop Whately, entitled "Historic doubts relative to Napoleon Bonaparte;" a work in which that learned and ingenious prelate has adduced a variety of arguments founded on the rules of evidence, to show the improbability of the historic statements we have concerning the remarkable incidents in the history of that extraordinary man, and even of his existence. It is a facetious rebuke of those skeptical minds who are so hardened in incredulity that they reject all historic statements, however founded on evidence, which has met the almost universal credit of mankind. As a specimen of it, let me read a short passage:

"But what shall we say to the testimony of those who went to Plymouth on purpose, and saw Bonaparte with their own eyes? Must they not trust their senses? I would not disparage either the eye-sight or the veracity of these gentlemen. I am ready to allow that they went to Plymouth for the purpose of seeing Bonaparte; nay, more, that they actually rowed out into the harbor in a boat, and came alongside of a man-of-war, on whose deck they saw a man in a cocked hat, who, they were told, was Bonaparte. This is the utmost point to which their testimony goes; how they ascertained that this man in the cocked hat had gone through all the marvelous and romantic adventures with which we have so long been amused, we are not told. Did they perceive in his physiognomy his true name, and authentic history?"

It really seems to me that the denial that this expedition of William Walker was a military expedition, to say nothing now of its being in contravention of our law, evidences just as much of this hardened incredulity as the Archbishop's work exhibits in regard to the romantic history, and even the existence, of Napoleon Bonaparte. It is very true, sir, that General Walker issued no proclamation to the wide world, and all mankind beside, announcing his purpose to set forth on this expedition to conquer Nicaragua; he did not in New Orleans or Mobile send out his heralds with trumpets to announce his purpose; but short of that, we have almost all the evidence which it is possible to require. We have in the papers furnished to us the proof that his agents were busy in various places engaging men; not, it is true, to take part in a military expedition, but to go out with him for the purpose of settlement; that being the flimsy pretext under which his hostile operations were disguised. But we are told that they were organized by having officers appointed; that such and such men were promised captain's commissions, or the next commission in rank. As for those who were to hold no commissions, they were not called privates, but "others than officers."

Then we find a steamboat obtaining a clearance at the custom-house by false and fraudulent representations—for this transaction is stamped with the meanness of falsehood in the very beginning; false invoices; false letters to a consignee, directing the sale of goods never put on board nor intended to be put on board, for cash, when they should arrive at San Juan de Nicaragua; passengers to go who were found with arms in their hands. The purpose is disclosed by the very first operation exhibited on reaching the coast of Nicaragua: a detachment of men, commanded by a colonel and subordinate officers, were sent up the south branch of the river, not to make a peaceful settlement, but to force a passage to Fort Castillo and capture it by military means; the vessel then running up to the harbor of San Juan, landing not only its men, but arms; depositing its ammunition, and forming a camp. No such goods as constituted the assorted cargo are found on board.

But we have an inventory of those cases and their contents. This assorted cargo, to be sold for cash, consisted of muskets, bayonets, rifles, and percussion-caps—all the ammunition and all the provision intended for a warlike expedition, and nothing which could give color to the false letter of consignment.

Then we are told that this is no proof of a military enterprise. General William Walker has avowed it himself, a hundred times over. In every speech he has made, in every letter he has written, he avowed his purpose to be to reconquer power in Nicaragua by the sword, and to maintain it by the same means.

We may be told, perhaps, that this subject has been referred to the judicial authorities; that a grand jury has ignored a bill against him, and that a judge has quashed some sort of a proceeding. I do not know that very great importance is due to the decision of a grand jury of which we know nothing but that they have written "ignoramus" on a certain piece of paper sent to them by the district attorney. Whether they had all the evidence before them which we have, whether they had any evidence at all before them, we do not know. All we know is that they have written "ignoramus" on the back of an indictment. Unless I could be satisfied by personal knowledge that the persons composing that grand jury were men of great weight of character and cultivated intelligence, or that they had not all the evidence before them, I should be very apt to think that in writing the word "ignoramus" on the back of the indictment, they were only subscribing a nomen generalissimum which would describe themselves. As to the decision of the judge, it is not every judge who is a jurist. I admit, however, that all the judicial effect due to his decision, is to be allowed in this case as in others, but no more. It has no control over the minds and opinions of men. Just so much authority is due to his decision, as springs from the force of the reasoning or the weight of the authorities cited. It cannot, at all events, affect us in the consideration of this question, as it cannot affect the decision of the Executive, which was made before the judicial investigation was held.

Nothing surprises me more than the sympathy which is expressed for General Walker in certain parts of the United States. To what qualities of his, to what part of his history is this sympathy due? He is a military adventurer, of a stout and courageous spirit, I admit; but what else? There is no evidence of skillful conduct in anything that he has ever done. All his efforts at military adventure have been failures, and although he professes that his failures have been due to the interference of the authority of this Government, we know very well that in regard to the first one the failure was as complete as it was ridiculous. I speak of his expedition to Sonora. The failure of the second, which he professes to have been occasioned by United States interference, was the result of his folly in usurping power and his subsequent abuse of power. It was his reckless ambition; his disregard of the true principles of republican government which made that experiment so complete a failure, placing him in a position of extreme distress and peril, from which, indeed, nothing but the humane interposition of Commander Davis rescued him.

I cannot see how any man who loves freedom, regulated by law and accompanied by order, who regards national obligation, and what is due to municipal regulation and statute—I do not for my life perceive how such a man can entertain any sympathy for this General Walker. He has developed his designs clearly enough for us all to understand; clearly enough for him who runs to read. He acquired power in Nicaragua by the use of the bayonets of his army—not by the free, unawed vote of the people of that country. He used his power to oppress and to injure the people over whom he exercised it. I believe that no legislative body ever sat in Nicaragua during the whole time of his presidency. Everything was done by imperial decree. There was no such thing as representative, responsible government. It was a despotism that prevailed while he was the President of Nicaragua, which mocked at popular rights and official responsibility. Is such a man entitled to our sympathies? Have we ceased to admire our own institutions? Is it following our example to establish all power in the hands of one man, and that man a foreign adventurer, who has acquired it by means of the bayonets of foreigners whom he took with him, or who have gone to his aid? Does it excite our admiration that he burned villages; that churches were plundered while he was director, and that the inhabitants suffered confiscation and pillage? No, sir; none of these things excite my sympathy, and I do not believe that they excite the sympathy of the great mass of our countrymen. In a few localities where, from peculiar circumstances, these sympathies have been awakened, he may be regarded as a hero; but the larger part of our countrymen view him as an offender against our laws, a violator of the laws of nations, and a cold, relentless oppressor of the people whom he ruled with military rigor.

Besides, are his designs friendly to this country? I say they are not, as he himself has avowed them. They are no more friendly to the United States than they are friendly to liberty. His object has been one of conquest and of despotism. He has sought, not a free Government like ours, based upon the people's choice, and regulated by sound, popular sentiment, but he has sought the establishment of a military despotism in that country, and a military despotism antagonistic to this country and its institutions. I have here General Walker's letter addressed to General De Goicouria, from which I propose to read:

"GRANADA, August 12, 1856.

"MY DEAR GENERAL: I sent your credentials, for Great Britain, by General Cazencove. They are ample, and will be, I hope, not without result. If you can open negotiations with England, and secure for Nicaragua the port of San Juan Del Norte, you will effect a great object. It will be a long step towards our end. Without San Juan Del Norte we lack, what will be in the end, indispensable to us—a naval force in the Caribbean sea. The commercial consequences of this possession are nothing in comparison with the naval and political results.

"With your versatility and (if I may use the term) adaptability, I expect much to be done in England. You can do more than any American could possibly accomplish, because you can make the British Cabinet see that we are not engaged in any scheme for annexation. You can make them see that the only way to cut the expanding and expansive democracy of the North, is by a powerful and compact southern federation, based on military principles."

So it is not the love of liberty, it is not a desire to establish law and the reign of peace, and the equal administration of justice in Nicaragua, which has prompted the adventurer, but a desire to establish a government "based on military principles," such a government as would excite the detestation of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs], who has painted to us this morning so brilliantly, the dangers of a standing army, the dangers of a system based on military principles; indeed its utter antagonism to anything like free institutions.

Well, sir, I remember to have seen, in a speech lately delivered by General Walker, in Richmond, the avowal that the Americanization of Central America is to be effected by the sword, and by the sword only. That is the power upon which he relies to Americanize this quondam Spanish territory, and to maintain the government which he proposes to institute there.

The truth is, Mr. President, that this General Walker is an ambitious dreamer. The enterprise which he has undertaken is one that does not belong to the age, and is not in accordance with its spirit. It is one that goes far back in its spirit and design, to ages which I trusted had passed away forever. It belongs rather to that dark period in the Christian era, when the hordes of barbarians from the northern hive, swarmed out and came in legions upon the fairest portions of southern and western Europe. It belongs rather to that still later period when the Vikings and Northmen went wherever they could, disregarding the obligations of national justice, making might right, and carrying rapacity and rapine wherever they went. That is the age to which an expedition of this character belongs.

I stated, upon a former occasion, when I addressed the Senate, that expeditions of this character were contrary to the recognized laws of nations—laws about which there is no dispute. Every one acknowledges the obligation of a nation at peace with another, not to allow that peace to be violated by its own citizens. Every one acknowledges that the obligations of the nation are the obligations of all the citizens, and of each and every one of them. All acknowledge, too, that private war is not justifiable in any sense; that it is expressly forbidden by the laws of nations; and it is no defense of such an expedition as this to say that the parties engaged in it have a right to expatriate themselves.

The right of expatriation is not an absolute and perfect right. It is not so pretended to be by any publicist. It is a qualified right; it is subject to various exceptions, and to any legislation which a State may think proper to adopt in regard to it. I presume that no one would contend that the right of expatriation was an absolute right when a nation was engaged in war, and needed all its citizens or subjects to defend it. That man who should run away from his country, and throw off his allegiance, under such circumstances, would not only be a renegade, but a traitor. We cannot assert the absolute right of expatriation in regard to such a man. Indeed, sir, in our own history, we have one very striking instance in regard to this right of expatriation. I think it was in 1810 that Elijah Clark, a citizen of New Jersey, went from that State to Canada, where he married, and had children. He was said also to have accepted a commission in the Canada militia; and then when the war of 1812 broke out, he was found, after having crossed the river, in our lines lurking about the American camp. He was taken up by the military authorities, tried by court-martial, and condemned as a spy; but Mr. Madison interfered. He directed him to be discharged, and to be turned over to the civil authorities to be tried for treason. He did not admit the expatriation of Elijah Clark, in that case.

Neither can it be anything but bona fide expatriation to which we can allow any weight. Such a pretext cannot be set up when the object is to violate the laws of nations, or to violate the statutes of the country, to evade the laws passed to enforce neutral obligations, and to disturb the peace and security of a people with whom we are on terms of peace and amity. These expeditions have always been regarded with singular disfavor by the Government of this country. I am proud to say that the United States, although suspicions have been cast on her integrity in this regard, has uniformly manifested a sound and true public faith. No expedition has ever been got up in this country without receiving the denunciation of the Executive and the general disapprobation of the citizens. General Washington, even before the statutes of neutrality were passed, which I believe was in 1794, issued his proclamation, based on the principles of international law, prohibiting our people from engaging unjustly in the struggles of the great nations who were then in flagrant war, which threatened to involve us also. At a later period of our history, when Miranda came here, I think in 1806, or 1807, or thereabouts, and organized his unfortunate expedition against Venezuela, it met with no favor at the hands of our authorities, either executive or judicial.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] reminds me that the individuals who were tried in New York were acquitted. That is true; but let us hear what the President said on that subject. Mr. Jefferson, after the close of his administration, wrote on this subject, on the 4th of October, 1809—it is to be found in a letter to Foranda—as follows:

"Your predecessor, soured on a question of etiquette against the Administration of this country, wished to impute wrong to them in all their actions, even where he did not believe it himself. In this spirit, he wished it to be believed that we were in unjustifiable cooperation in Miranda's expedition. I solemnly, and on my personal truth and honor, declare to you that this was entirely without foundation, and that there was neither cooperation nor connivance on our part. He informed us he was about to attempt the liberation of his native country from bondage, and intimated a hope of our aid, or connivance, at least. He was at once informed that, although we had great cause of complaint against Spain, and even of war, yet, whenever we should think proper to act as her enemy, it should be openly and above-board, and that our hostility should never be exercised by such petty means. We had no suspicion that he expected to engage men here, but merely to purchase military stores. Against this there was no law, nor consequently any authority for us to interpose obstacles."

"Although his measures were many days in preparation in New York, we never had the least intimation or suspicion of his engaging men in his enterprise until he was gone," "until it was too late for any measures taken at Washington to prevent their departure. The officer in the customs who participated in this transaction with Miranda we immediately removed, and should have had him, and others, further punished, had it not been for the protection given them by private citizens at New York, in opposition to the Government, who, by their impudent falsehoods and calumnies, were able to overbear the minds of the jurors. Be assured, sir, that no motive could induce me, at this time, to make this declaration so gratuitously, were it not founded in sacred truth; and I will add, further, that I never did, or countenanced, in public life, a single act inconsistent with the strictest good faith; having never believed there was one code of morality for a public and another for a private man."

Under the administration of Mr. Monroe, we amended the statute of neutrality passed in 1794, by the act of 1818, which was only an enlargement, to some degree, of the former act intended to prohibit these private enterprises of a warlike nature. I believe there has not been an occasion of that sort during our history, when the President for the time being, whoever he might be, has not entertained and expressed opinions like those expressed by Mr. Jefferson in the letter from which I have read. I have here a letter of General Jackson, showing what he thought of such expeditions, even anticipating one which he apprehended was on foot. This letter was addressed to William S. Fulton, then Secretary for the Territory of Arkansas, and dated December 10, 1830:

"DEAR SIR: It has been stated to me that an extensive expedition against Texas is organizing in the United States, with a view to the establishment of an independent government in that province, and that General Houston is to be at the head of it. From all the circumstances communicated to me upon this subject, and which have fallen under my observation, I am induced to believe, and hope (notwithstanding the circumstantial manner in which it is related to me) that the information I have received is erroneous; and it is unnecessary that I should add my sincere wish that it may be so. No movements have been made, nor have any facts been established, which would require or would justify the adoption of official proceedings against individuals implicated; yet so strong is the detestation of the criminal steps alluded to, and such are my apprehensions of the extent to which the peace and honor of the country might be compromised by it, as to make me anxious to do everything short of it which may serve to elicit the truth, and to furnish me with the necessary facts (if they exist) to lay the foundation of further measures."

I am glad to say that the gallant old general was mistaken in his suspicions; that such were not the purposes of the Senator from Texas, whom I now see before me, and I know that President Jackson received from him assurances that he entertained no such purposes. He did head, gallantly head, the revolution which made Texas an independent State; but it was not until the overthrow of the Mexican constitution, and the violation of the rights of the State of Texas, that her people took the last resort into their own hands. This, at all events, shows conclusively what was General Jackson's opinion, although I believe it was not altogether unfashionable at one time to suspect him of being somewhat of a filibuster himself.

It has, however, been attempted to be shown that this expedition stands on a different footing from any other hostilities which have been sought to be carried on from this country against a foreign country. It has been endeavored to be shown that, inasmuch as there were two parties in Nicaragua, it was perfectly fair, according to the law of nations, that Mr. Walker should engage his service to one of those parties in conflict with the other. I deny that entirely. When rebellion arises, we do not think it civil war; but when it has acquired such head, and the parties are so equally balanced that it can be characterized as civil war, then the rule is that both parties are to be treated as if they were independent nations at war; and the obligation of our citizens, as well as of our Government, is to regard the laws of neutrality, and not to take sides with either party. This obligation is just as perfect as if there were two independent nations engaged in lawful open war. In general, neither the Government nor the citizens of a neutral nation can, without a departure from their neutrality, take any part in such a conflict. It is true there are some extraordinary exceptional cases, as when a revolt has begun in consequence of inhuman oppression, such as justified the people of Holland in rising against the Government of Spain, in which other nations may and sometimes have taken part. The consequence of their doing so, however, always is a rupture of their peaceful relations with the country against which they have taken part. If not an act of war, it always leads to it. It did so in our own case during the war of the Revolution. It always must do so where there is sufficient power in the State which is thus opposed by hostile interference, to revenge or redress the grievance.
